Happy holidays a dream for some

Inferiority, sadness dominate emotions of depressed people

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

In the American culture, there are expectations governing how people should feel during the holidays. Because Christmas is regarded as such a time of rapture, happiness is thought to be an inherent emotion.

However, if a person does not have these feelings, they sometimes get the impression they are not a "real" person, and depression often sets in.

"Problems of depression are the biggest after holidays," said Marc Milhander, clinical psychologist at Lafene Student Health Center. He said depression can happen anytime, but post-holiday blues seem to be especially noticeable when the holidays come to an end.

Milhander said a lot of feelings come to the surface after a holiday because people realize it wasn't as good as in past years. Some of these sad emotions may stem from the loss of a family member, poor relationships at home or even not having any family to get together with during the holidays.

For Brian Spencer, sophomore in political science, going home for Christmas is often taxing emotionally. His parents are divorced and he tries to spend equal time with each of them.

"It bothers me a little that my parents and I can't be together as a family on Christmas, but I guess that's just the breaks," he said.

Spencer, who doesn't have any siblings, said Christmas can be a difficult time of year for his family.

"I feel bad, especially for my mom at Christmas time. She can really get down, so I try to spend much of my vacation with her," he said.

Milhander said there are a lot of people like Spencer who have to deal with the situation of a split family. Holidays like Christmas can remind families of loneliness.

Staff Illustration/Carlos Corredor

A primary source of depression, especially among students, occurs when people are isolated from the rest of their families during the holidays.

"Students that can't go home at Christmas often can experience depression," Milhander said.

Depression can be caused by almost anything, and sometimes it may not be very noticeable to others. He said

Traditions are followed strictly during Christmas, especially when it concerns holiday dining. Yet, North American traditions are not followed by all citizens in this country's "melting pot."

Juan Rosa, senior in biology, has been in the United States for four years. Rosa is from Puerto Rico and works at Cafe Latino, 606 N. 12th St.

Rosa said Christmas is celebrated in Latin America with many similar customs as in North America. A typical Christmas dinner in Latin America would consist of roast pig; arroz con gandules, a dish with rice and a type of bean; and pasteles.

The main ingredient in pasteles are plantains, a vegetable which looks like a banana and is grown on a tree in Latin America. Pasteles consist of plantains mashed up with olives and pork, beef or seafood. The ingredients are rolled in the plantain leaf, tied down and boiled.

Some of the dessert foods in Latin America are tembleque, a coconut and cinnamon type pudding, and arroz con dulce, similar to a rice pudding with raisins.

Rosa said Latin Americans also celebrate Dia de los Tres Reyes, the day of the three wise men on Jan. 6. Called Epiphiny in the United States, this holiday includes a big dinner and the exchanging of gifts.

For the past two years, Rosa has stayed in the United States for Christmas.

"I really miss the Latin American food. Americans eat the same thing for Christmas that they just had for Thanksgiving," Rosa said.

Claire Dehon, associate professor of modern languages, came from Belgium, a country which borders France and follows many of the same French traditions. Dehon said traditionally the important Christmas meal was eaten after coming back from midnight Mass.

"It just depends on the families now. Sometimes they eat at noon or when relatives arrive," Dehon said.

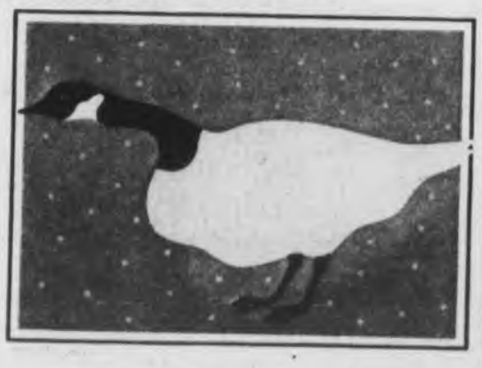
A special bread called cougnole is served. This bread is made in the shape of the baby Jesus and a little sugar candy in the same shape is placed on top. The dough is similar to the French dough called brioche.

"In both France and Belgium we eat goose. There is a lot of fat to make delicious gravy," Dehon said.

For dessert, a pastry called buchel de Noel is served. This pastry is in the shape of a log and has cream filling and cream on top of it. Other foods popular during the holidays include boullion and chestnuts.

One popular food in Italy is fruitcake, said Giovanna Cook, instructor of modern languages. In Rome, where Cook is from, a fruitcake called panettone is popular. This is a tall cake filled with raisins.

In Siena, near Florence, a very dense fruitcake called panforte is served. A white confection, tolrrone, is a hard candy of honey and nuts made in northern Italy.



The main dish is sometimes turkey stuffed with chestnuts, but more often it is cappone, a fattened rooster.

In some parts of the country, Italians eat a traditional dish for New Year's. The dish is made of lentils and cotechino, a pressed meat.

"The dish brings you good luck and pro-

n Christmas day,

Today, in the town of David, a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord. This will be a sign to you: You will find a baby wrapped in cloths and lying in a manger.

—Luke 2:11-12

By PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Reporter

In most of the world's nations, the birth of Jesus is celebrated with the same spirit of love, joy and giving; it is a rapture that has no international boundaries.

However, the extent to which Christmas is celebrated differs from nation to nation, as do the ways it is celebrated.

There are many traditional celebrations that have evolved over the centuries that are commonly thought of as being very much a part of Christmas. Some of these traditions — exchanging gifts, caroling, decorating a tree, and Santa Claus — can be found in one form or another in most countries.

But from Africa to the Orient, there's always something a little unique that each nation adds to its Christmas celebration.

The tradition of a jolly, white-bearded, gift-giving man has touched the heart of many children around the world. Robert J. Myers, a writer who has traced the history and origins of holidays in his book, "Celebrations," wrote that St. Nicholas "was a Bishop of Myra in Asia Minor during the first half of the fourth century." St. Nicholas was known for his generosity and gift-giving, especially where children were concerned, Myers wrote.

Over the centuries, the idea of St. Nicholas took the form of the more secular Christmas Man. It was the Dutch who called this St. Nicholas/Christmas Man "Sinter Klaus" around the 16th and 17th centuries.

Myer attributes the customs of caroling, exchanging cards and the burning of the yule log to the British. The Irish are said to have started the tradition of lighting Christmas candles.

St. Francis of Assisi is credited with making the first "presepio," a miniature Bethlehem manger representing Jesus' crib, Meyer wrote. Today, nativity scenes can be found during the Christmas holiday wherever Christianity is found.

Germany apparently originated the Christmas tree tradition during the 15th or 16th centuries, Myer said. Traditions such as hanging mistletoe can be credited to Norse legend, and the use of poinsettias during the holidays is credited to Mexican legend.

K-State has 839 foreign students from 93 nations enrolled this semester, and there is a wealth of international Christmas traditions that American students would find very similar to their own.

The average American might wonder what Christmas would be like in a primarily Buddhist country like Thailand, or how Christmas is observed in war-torn Lebanon. Is there Christmas in a nation that is more than 90 percent Moslem? And Africans — do they celebrate Christmas?

Alfred Dixon, graduate in agronomy, said his country of Sierra Leone is full of Christmas cheer during this time of year. Sierra Leone, located in West Africa, is more than 80 percent Christian, he said.

Dixon said in his country the traditions of singing carols, exchanging gifts, decorating trees and exchanging Christmas cards are all very much a part of the holiday.

On Christmas Day, most people go to church, and afterward, friends and relatives go from house to house visiting each other. Everyone dresses up in traditional clothing for the day, he said. Also, fireworks are set off later in the evening in the towns and villages.

A very special tradition comes with the Christmas meal, Dixon said. Because rice is a staple diet in Sierra Leone, the people will not eat rice on Christmas because it is like no other day of the year.

Instead, they prepare such dishes as porridge, boiled potatoes and soups and stews with chicken, beef or pork. Dixon said nothing will be prepared with oil on this day.

"The head of the household will treat wine, beer or gin to create merriment in people of Sierra Leone, he said, believe t a good mixture. The people want to rem from the feasting, he said.

In the streets, the shops and churche festive spirit of the season.

The people of Sierra Leone have whitewash the large rocks surrounding mood.

Wefald orders cost-saving energy measures

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

In the face of a $3.06-million budget cut mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, University President Jon Wefald has ordered "unpalatable but necessary measures" to reduce campus energy costs $167,000 during the next six months.

Wefald outlined the conservation program in a memorandum sent Monday to deans, directors and department heads. Calling the program "a basic element of our plans to protect the employees and instructional progr[a]m University," the pres[ident] four conservation steps.

—All daytime building temperatures will be capped at 70 degrees with the exception of animal facilities and lab experiments. Research experiments with documented minimum temperature requirements also will be exempted.

—Temperature control automation will be reactivated in most buildings.

—No air conditioning will be [in]cluding the Central Plant, central-building units and window air conditioners, will be deactivated.

Wefald also ordered all but strictly essential University activity curtailed and building temperatures held at 55 degrees from Dec. 24 to Jan. 5. The University is normally closed on all but four of the days during this period of curtailment, the memo said.

Few exceptions will be allowed under the cutbacks ordered by Wefald.

"For the present program to succeed, we cannot make the [number of exceptions we allowed] for conservation that met with a number of exceptions to the order.

Requests for exemptions thought to be essential must be endorsed by a dean or vice president, who would then forward the request to Wefald for consideration by the Central Administrative Staff.

"Unless we (University officials) can all work together to ensure that the contemplated energy savings are indeed realized, the alread severe budget cuts you have received would have to be increased," Wefald said in the memo. "We would have no choice."

Wefald urged University compensatory leave during the curtailed holiday schedule. This would allow employees to avoid cold buildings and uncomfortable working conditions. The holiday shutdown will not affect the distribution of payroll checks Dec. 31.

K-State spends nearly $5.25 million on energy, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"I hope everyone realizes the dollars are just as scarce today as the natural gas and oil used to be," Miller said.

Hayden announced the sweeping, [...] agencies Nov. 19. University officials have been working on ways to trim $3.06 million from K-State's budget to meet the reduction level ordered by Hayden.

Wefald has been critical of the budget cuts, saying they will cause a "serious quality blow" to Kansas' higher education system.

One of the special customs, she said, is that most of the relatives will gather at the home of the oldest and most powerful man of the family to visit and exchange holiday wishes. A big dinner is cooked, and everyone feasts on many traditional Arab dishes. The main dish is usually lamb, she said.

The stores and shopping centers are decorated in traditional Christmas decorations, as are the Christian homes. Putting up a tree at home is central to the decoration, Jumean said.

Also, the older people often visit the graves of loved ones on Christmas, she said. Gift-giving is done as well.

"But we don't emphasize gifts," she said.

Still further across the globe, the people of Norway celebrate Christmas in a grand style, said Mette Nord, junior in business. It is without a doubt the most important holiday of the year, Nord said.

At the beginning of December, Norwegians put a star in one of the windows of their home, but they do not actually decorate the house or put up the tree until the day before Christmas Eve, Nord said. A candle is lit each Sunday before Christmas during December.

Also, on Dec. 1, children are given a calendar in which a piece of candy is placed behind a small door representing each day of the month. The children open one of these doors each day to find the piece of candy, Nord said.

The big celebration, however, is on Christmas Eve, the day the family gathers to exchange gifts and have a big feast, she said. The feast usually includes pork ribs as the main dish.

Also, a special pudding is made in which one almond will be placed. This pudding is cut into enough pieces for each member of the family, and whomever gets the piece with the almond will receive a special gift. That gift is usually a marzipan pig, Nord said.

Santa Claus is very important in Norway. Usually, a friend of the family dresses up like Santa and comes to the house on Christmas Eve to hand out the children's presents. This is a special tradition, Nord said, because the children actually get to see Santa in their home.

It's traditional to leave a little bowl of porridge on the stairs for Santa the night before Christmas Eve, Nord said.

Norway, primarily a Christian nation, is in full decor during the Christmas season. The children go from house to house, caroling and wishing happy holidays to all.

Another custom in most Norwegian homes is to tie up bundles of wheat with ribbons and bells to hang in the yard for the birds to eat, Nord said.

On Christmas day, most Norwegian families have a light brunch and then visit friends and family.

Nord said the decorations in the towns and villages are all of real pine boughs, cones and other natural materials.

Amid all the holiday cheer, there is one nation that has had to feel the strain of war not only on holidays, but on every day since about 1974. This nation is Lebanon.

Celebrating Christmas in a war-torn country is difficult, said Kayed Khalil, a spring 1986 graduate of K-State.

"The people are so sad because they remember the deaths (from the war). It's hard to celebrate," Khalil said.

Before the war began, Khalil said the streets of Beirut were beautifully decorated at Christmas time. The Christian Lebanese, who at the time made up about half the population, feasted and celebrated with a truly great holiday spirit. Khalil called that time "the good old days" — days without war.

Khalil said even in the refugee camps of Beirut, a Christian family will still buy a tree to decorate and will keep the celebrations more at home and less in public.

Although Khalil, a Moslem, has not been back to Lebanon for a number of years, he remembers the days when signs of Christmas cheer were abundant in Beirut and throughout the country. Lebanon used to celebrate Christmas in a very grand way.

"It was really something to see."

Modern ornaments now passe

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

When it comes time to decorate this year's Christmas tree, most tree trimmers will shy away from the modern-type ornaments.

"People are getting away from decorating with glass-type balls and are going more traditional," said Brian Borgen, a member of the management team at Wal-Mart, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Traditional ornaments, mainly the wooden characters, are found in great numbers throughout stores this season. Wooden reindeers, santas, sleighs, soldiers and snowmen are popular ornaments to display the Christmas spirit.

"Customers buy four or five wooden ornaments each year which are added to their collection," Borgen said. "People nowadays want ornaments that look like they made the ornaments themselves."

"Our biggest seller is the homemade wooden-cut ornament," said Julie Brummett, employee at Country Ritz, 1217 Moro St. These ornaments are cut from wood and assembled to represent animals, and the wood's natural coloring is not disturbed.

The most popular ones seem to be the reindeer, penguin, teddy bear and duck, Brummett said.

"Teddy bears have been popular in recent years, and I believe they will again this year," said Don Carrell, manager at Kitchens Plus, 1310 Westloop Place.

Teddy bear ornaments come in all shapes and sizes. They are made of wood, glass, ceramic, bone china and porcelain.

"It is the trend. Everyone collects teddy bears; why not collect teddy bear ornaments?," said Bryan Taylor, manager at The Palace, 704 N. Manhattan Ave.

The handmade German ornaments, such as the minature nutcrackers and trains, are also very popular, Carrell said.

A new item this season is the New England Village scene, which is a remake of a colonial village, Taylor said.

The village scene is available as ornaments for the tree, with clip-on buildings that go over a light on the tree so that the building will light up. Miniature buildings may be collected to

Student body lucrative for area retailers

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

For any Manhattan merchant, the perfect Christmas present would be to have all K-State students do their holiday shopping locally.

While such a present is most likely unattainable, K-State students do make a sizeable contribution to the retail sales made in Manhattan during the holiday season, said Tom Whalen, director of operations at the Chamber of Commerce.

Manhattan merchants are aware of this and make a conscious, collective effort to get students to shop in town during the holidays, he said.

"The bottom line is that merchants know two-thirds of the students are leaving the community for the holiday season and want them to buy gifts before they leave," he said.

To attract students and get them to make early Christmas purchases, the merchants conduct special promotions during this period.

There are four major merchant associations in town — Aggieville, Downtown, Westloop and Village Plaza — and each association develops an advertising promotion for the Christmas season that will attract college students as well as other members of the community.

For many people, the Christmas season is a time to celebrate the birth of Christ, drink warm egg nog and eat sugar cookies while sitting around the fireplace singing favorite Christmas songs.

Within a matter of days, students will begin packing their bags in preparation for a month-long, fun-filled Christmas vacation.

Yet, while the majority of K-State students will be leaving behind all of their books, bills and troubles for a month, there will be some students who will remain in Manhattan.

Kevin Peterson, senior in radio and television, will be celebrating Christmas in Manhattan this year.

Because of a prior commitment to KSDB-FM, the campus radio station, Peterson will be spinning records and enjoying the blissful Christmas season on the third floor of McCain Auditorium this year.

"Every day during the break, I'll be at the radio station playing new album rock music. I don't think I will be too lonely, because I know many other disc jockies who will be staying here in Manhattan also," Peterson said.

He said he also decided to remain in Manhattan during the break because he is enrolling in intersession classes.

"Some students will be up here because they have chosen to do so. I will be here because I simply don't have a choice. I need the hours, or else I will not be graduating in the spring," Peterson said.

Adjusting to the loneliness is the problem to cope with during the break, he said.

"I hope my classes and the radio station occupy most of my time because I would hate to be bored throughout the vacation," he said.

Wefald orders cost-saving energy measures

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

In the face of a $3.06-million budget cut mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, University President Jon Wefald has ordered "unpalatable but necessary measures" to reduce campus energy costs $167,000 during the next six months.

Wefald outlined the conservation program in a memorandum sent Monday to deans, directors and department heads. Calling the program "a basic element of our plans to protect the employees and instructional programs of the University," the pre four conservation steps.

—All daytime building temperatures will be capped at 70 degrees with the exception of animal facilities and lab experiments. Research experiments with documented minimum temperature requirements also will be exempted.

—Nighttime and weekend building temperatures will be maintained at 55 degrees except for those buildings with the above exceptions.

—Temperature control automation will be reactivated in most buildings.

—No air conditioning will be provided on campus before May 4, including the Central Plant, central-building units and window air conditioners, will be deactivated.

Wefald also ordered all but strictly essential University activity curtailed and building temperatures held at 55 degrees from Dec. 24 to Jan. 5. The University is normally closed on all but four of the days during this period of curtailment, the memo said.

Few exceptions will be allowed under the cutbacks ordered by Wefald.

"For the present program to succeed, we cannot make the number of exceptions we allowed for conservation that met with a number of exceptions to the order.

Requests for exemptions thought to be essential must be endorsed by a dean or vice president, who would then forward the request to Wefald for consideration by the Central Administrative Staff.

"Unless we (University officials) can all work together to ensure that the contemplated energy savings are indeed realized, the alread severe budget cuts you have received would have to be increased," Wefald said in the memo. "We would have no choice."

Wefald urged University

compensatory leave during the curtailed holiday schedule. This would allow employees to avoid cold buildings and uncomfortable working conditions. The holiday shutdown will not affect the distribution of payroll checks Dec. 31.

K-State spends nearly $5.25 million on energy, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"I hope everyone realizes the dollars are just as scarce today as the natural gas and oil used to be," Miller said.

Hayden announced the sweeping, agencies Nov. 19. University officials have been working on ways to trim $3.06 million from K-State's budget to meet the reduction level ordered by Hayden.

Wefald has been critical of the budget cuts, saying they will cause a "serious quality blow" to Kansas' higher education system.

"It's already caught up with us, and it's already injuring our academic programs," he said earlier this week.

Funding for instructional programs will be cut by about 2.3 percent at K-State, while cuts to other state-funded programs will information systems, will be enjoying her Christmas vacation in Manhattan this year because it is too expensive to travel to her hometown of Jersey City, N.J.

Also, the hazardous road conditions likely during this time of year convinced Bethea it is too dangerous to embark homeward in her car.

"This will be the first year I will be unable to spend the holiday season with my parents," she said. "I know I will probably be very unhappy during the break, but somehow things will probably work out for my best interest."

Bethea said she plans to spend the majority of her time with her sister, who also attends K-State, and friends. The rest of her time will be either spent working at Burger King or relaxing.

While Bethea and Peterson must stay in Manhattan, there are some students who can go home but have decided to remain.

David Wentworth, graduate in journalism and mass communications and operations manager at KSDB, said even if he had decided to go home to Omaha, Neb., it would have only been for a day.

"I just cannot get into the holiday season anymore," he said.

"I don't need Christmas and New Year's as an excuse to drink and have a good time. During the vacation, I will be doing some individual research in the library on some aspects of my course study in which I plan to do some major writings on."

Wentworth said that between managing the campus radio station and spending time with friends, there will be no time for him to be lonely or depressed.

"Instead of myself going to visit people, I will be having people coming to see me. This vacation will also be a great chance for me to catch up on watching 'The Cosby Show' and 'Moonlighting.'"

Instead of being miserable during the vacation, Wentworth said this will be an opportune time for him to take things easy for a change.

"Between my daily duties as the operations manager at the station and 12 hours of graduate school, this would be the perfect time for me to relax and prepare for next semester," he said.

The holiday season also brings loneliness for many international students who are unable to travel homeward for the vacation.

Rei-Ying Duh, graduate in business administration and native of Taiwan, said many of her friends have already made plans to go to Florida for the vacation. Instead of joining them, Duh said she will spend her vacation with other friends in Manhattan.

Duh said she will enjoy her vacation by simply watching television, reading books, going to the movies, relaxing and enjoying the holiday season.

sperity in the new year," Cook said.

The Christmas dinner in Italy is eaten at midnight after church. Dinner usually starts with soup then continues with tortelino in the broth, a pasta in turkey broth. The gifts are opened after dinner and it usually ends up being a late night.

Cook also said putting up the manger scene is more common than Christmas trees.

ordinary every other day — food, music and plants — become more meaningful.

"We start Christmas planning in March or April," Patzell said.

Patzell said he uses records from past years, marketing concepts and information presented at trade shows to determine what and how much to purchase.

"We choose from what is available to most closely meet the needs of customers."

When the Christmas rush is through, Patzell said florists generally have to dispose of the remaining inventory.

"If we don't sell it, we have to throw it in the trash," he said.

Patzell said his biggest seller at Christmas is the poinsettia.

"It is colorful and decorative, relatively easy to care for and goes anywhere," he said. "It reminds everyone of Christmas."

Christmas also brings with it the smells and tastes of holiday breads and other goodies.

Mary Tharp, an employee at Swanson's Bakery, 426 Houston St., said almost everything sells at Christmastime.

"Pies, bubble bread, fruitcakes, German Stollen, Julekage, Pfeffernusse — all are big sellers for us," Tharp said.

"Most of the breads are ordered (in advance) by customers," she said. "Occasionally, people buy them when they come in."

Christmas is second in sales only to Valentine's Day for the bakery, said owner Nina Miley.

"Every occasion, people want something," Miley said.

"They like Christmas cookies. We have all kinds of iced cookies — reindeer and bells and Christmas trees — just about everything."

For some, the romance of Christmas is all in the making.

Homemade Christmas decorations and presents are just as popular as ever, said Linda Guebert, an employee at The Apple Tree, 2615 Anderson Ave.

"We're more of an idea store than anything else," Guebert said.

"People work on Christmas crafts year-round, so we carry some things, like Christmas ribbon, all year long.

"It's still here after Christmas for the ones who need it," she said.

Guebert said while other stores do noticeably more business during November and December, the crafts supplies store does not.

"People usually start buying crafts supplies to start crafts (for Christmas) in August while other stores do more business from Thanksgiving on," she said.

Cross-stitch, tole and folk-art painting, rag baskets and rag rugs are popular crafts for Christmas, Guebert said.

"There are so many different things to do and make, it's hard to say," she said.

"Wheat weavings for ornaments is really big, which is kind of neat for Kansas," she said.

The romance of Christmas may sometimes have a large effect.

Mike Danenberg, owner of Danenberg's Holiday Jewelers, 425 Poyntz Ave., said he has seen "a lot more people looking and trying to decide" what special items to buy for Christmas presents.

He said December is the largest month for sales in the jewelry business, followed by November.

"For the Christmas selling season, all of our product categories increase in sales," he said.

Music exists for most tastes

By PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Reporter

It's nearly Christmas again, and as sure as the after-Christmas sales will begin Dec. 26, holiday music will be sung and sung and sung. However, for those bored with the staid, tired old songs, there is some hope for new holiday versions to mix with the traditional ones.

In fact, a lot of rocking, jamming and swinging options are available this season. Traditional Christmas songs have, in recent years, been revamped into contemporary, upbeat music by the likes of Bruce Springsteen, Hall and Oates, Willie Nelson and Stevie Wonder.

No matter what the taste, there are Christmas albums on the market that cover virtually every possible rendition of the traditional Christmas carols.

At Wizards Records and Tapes, 205 Seth Childs Road, owner Susan Werts offers several pages of catalog listings of Christmas music that can be ordered.

Randy Elam, manager of Wizards, said, "Wizards is preparing for the Christmas season. If it's not on the shelf, we'll order it."

If the Motown sound is desired, there's an album called "Motown Christmas." The Jackson 5, Stevie Wonder, The Temptations, Smokey Robinson and the Miracles and other Motown greats add a bit of soul to the Christmas classics.

Besides Christmas music done by soul groups, there's lots of rock 'n' roll and country and western Christmas albums out, Elam said.

Bruce Springsteen made a successful rock hit with his version of "Santa Claus is Coming to Town." The Eagles have an album out dedicated to the holiday season called "Funky New Year."

And last year, Daryl Hall and John Oates put a twist into the classic "Jingle Bell Rock," said Mark Kahler, salesman at Wizards and senior in journalism and mass communications.

Staff Illustration/Steve Wolgast

The song was released as a single. On one side, Hall did his version of "Jingle Bell Rock," and on the other side, Oates did his version, Kahler said.

Kahler suggested a unique brand of Christmas rock music for the season. There's a group from Omaha, Neb., called Mannheim Steamroller. The group plays what Kahler calls "18th-Century classical rock."

"They take a lot of old instruments, and they make music with a contemporary sound," he said.

Mannheim Steamroller has made seven albums, Kahler said. Their fourth album, titled "Christmas," is a medieval, ethereal-sounding album dedicated to Christmas music, he said. The album features such songs as "We Three Kings of Orient Are," "God Rest Ye Merry Gentlemen" and "Stille Nacht (Silent Night)."

For country and western fans, there's an album on the market called "Seasons Greetings From Nashville." Listeners can hear Mickey Gilley, Chet Atkins, Johnny Cash, George Jones and other C&W greats sing traditional Christmas songs.

Also, Willie Nelson has a Christmas album called "Pretty Paper," on which he performs the classics. Additionally, holiday listeners can choose from Christmas albums by Alabama ("Alabama Christmas"), Emmylou Harris ("Light of the Stable"), Lynn Anderson ("Christmas Album") and Kenny Rogers and Dolly Parton ("Once Upon a Christmas").

The jazz greats have not been left out of the Christmas music scene, either. There's an album on the market called "Jingle Bell Jazz," which features such jazz legends as Duke Ellington, Carmen McRae, Miles Davis, Lionel Hampton, Herbie Hancock and others.

Punk rockers have contributed to the Christmas music scene on an album called "Christmas Rock." The album features The Malibooz singing "Santa's Gone Surfin'" and Johnny Cue singing "Punk Rock Christmas."

For an easy-listening Christmas, Barbra Streisand and Amy Grant have holiday albums titled "The Christmas Album." The Carpenters ("Christmas Portrait"), B.J. Thomas ("All is Calm, All is Bright"), Joan Baez ("Noel"), and John Denver ("Rocky Mountain Christmas") have all made Christmas albums in their careers.

For the different, the off-beat and the young at heart, there is music for them, too, this season. Weird Al Yankovic has a new album out called "Polka Party." Included in the album is his contribution to Christmas '86 — a song called "Christmas at Ground Zero." Let's not forget "Chipmunk Christmas" by The Chipmunks or "Charlie Brown Christmas" by Vince Guaraldi.

For the politically minded, there's also "Christmas at the White House," which the album directory at Wizards calls "an educational version (with) narration and hymns." The narrator is Burl Ives.

And for those yearning for an international taste in Christmas music, Wizards has listings of dozens of albums from around the world. Listeners might choose "Christmas Aloha" by the Hawaiians, "Christmas Favorites From Poland" by Li'l Wally, "Cajun Christmas" by Justin Wilson, "Greek Christmas" by The Eusebia Choir or "Christmas Carols Around the World" by the Morman Tabernacle Choir.

So remember, if one doesn't want to be stuck this season with listening to Bing Crosby or Andy Williams singing favorite Christmas carols, there's always Weird Al Yankovic to bring Christmas cheer.

Merchants

"The merchants do special advertising during the (holiday) season to get students to buy," Whalen said.

The official Christmas shopping season begins the day after Thanksgiving, he said. To get people into the "shopping spirit," seasonal music is piped through many of the stores, and Christmas decorations are put on the lamp posts and in the parking lots of the four major shopping centers in town. These decorations are put up before the first the season's official kickoff but are not lit until the first evening of the shopping season.

And if promotions, decorations and seasonal music accomplish what the Manhattan merchants hope, K-State students will contribute significantly to the city's economy.

The Chamber of Commerce has not done research to determine exactly how much each K-State student contributes to the city's retail sales during the holiday season, Whalen said.

"The percentage of retail sales made to students would be about the same during the holiday season as at any other given time the University is in session," he said.

It is estimated the typical, full-time K-State student spends $1,014 on personal expenses during the nine-month period which includes the fall and spring semesters, said Larry Moeder, associate director of Student Financial Assistance.

This estimate excludes money students spend for housing, board, books, tuition and transportation.

Assuming the typical K-State student's personal expenses total $225.34 for the months of November and December, the approximate contribution they make to the community's economy may be calculated.

In November and December of 1984, the total retail sales in Manhattan were $41,887,200. In 1985, this total was $45,552,700 during the same period.

There are about 17,630 full-time students enrolled in courses at K-State this semester, said Don Foster, University registrar. Assuming each of these students spent the estimated $225.34 in November and December, the retail sales made to students would total $3,972,744.20.

If this total represented students' actual "personal expenses" during November and December of 1985, about 8.7 percent of the total retail purchases in Manhattan would have been made by students.

Depression

there are several warning signs a depressed person may exhibit.

One includes a person acting lethargic. Milhander said people may act listless and not want to do anything. They may do a lot of sleeping and stay in bed as if there were no reason to get up.

Another sign Milhander said to be aware of is a loss of appetite. Depression may even force people to fast.

Also, an overall loss of interest in activities is cause for concern.

Despite the signs which are usually apparent, Milhander said a person may be depressed and not exhibit any of the characteristics of depression.

"It is, however, hard to tell sometimes when a person is feeling depressed."

Movies

Howard said most of the better pictures of the year are either released during the summer or Christmas holiday season, because more attend movies then.

Howard said there are not any movies with Christmas themes being played at Commonwealth Theatres this year. However, he said a number of new releases will be offered, including "Golden Child," "Startrek IV," "Lady and the Tramp," "No Mercy" and "The Morning After."

Howard said all bookings for the Manhattan Commonwealth Theatres are made through the Kansas City office.

Ornament

create a lighted scene.

Modern tin-like ornaments were popular up until two years ago, Borgen said. Shiny tin-like bells and balls are hard to sell.

Satin-covered balls have replaced the tin-like ornaments.

"People see the satin ornaments as more fashionable and they look like they were handmade," Borgen said.

But history has also returned in Christmas ornaments.

Old, historical Santa ornaments, representing the changes Santa has gone through during the years, have become popular, said Jodie Woods, an employee at Campbell's, 1227 Moro St.

The Christmas look of the 1920s is back, with businessmen dressed in 1920s clothes bearing gifts, and men and women in a 1920s scene caroling, Borgen said.

People are using ornaments in other decorating ways, Carrell said. Ornaments can be used in centerpieces and in wreaths.

"Brass horns are used quite a bit to decorate wreaths," he said.

Christmas ornaments have also become a great gift idea.

"Receivers will usually keep them (the ornament)," Carrell said, "and when the next Christmas season comes around they will reminisce about who gave them the ornament."

Wefald orders cost-saving energy measures

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

In the face of a $3.06-million budget cut mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, University President Jon Wefald has ordered "unpalatable but necessary measures" to reduce campus energy costs $167,000 during the next six months.

Wefald outlined the conservation program in a memorandum sent Monday to deans, directors and department heads. Calling the program "a basic element of our plans to protect the employees and instructional programs of the University," the president ordered four conservation steps.

—All daytime building temperatures will be capped at 70 degrees with the exception of animal facilities and lab experiments. Research experiments with documented minimum temperature requirements also will be exempted.

—Nighttime and weekend building temperatures will be maintained at 55 degrees except for those buildings with the above exceptions.

—Temperature control automation will be reactivated in most buildings.

—No air conditioning will be provided on campus before May 4, 1987. All air-conditioning units, including the Central Plant, central-building units and window air conditioners, will be deactivated.

Wefald also ordered all but strictly essential University activity curtailed and building temperatures held at 55 degrees from Dec. 24 to Jan. 5. The University is normally closed on all but four of the days during this period of curtailment, the memo said.

Few exceptions will be allowed under the cutbacks ordered by Wefald.

"For the present program to succeed, we cannot make the number of exceptions we allowed before," he said, citing a 1984 request for conservation that met with a number of exceptions to the order.

Requests for exemptions thought to be essential must be endorsed by a dean or vice president, who would then forward the request to Wefald for consideration by the Central Administrative Staff.

"Unless we (University officials) can all work together to ensure that the contemplated energy savings are indeed realized, the alread severe budget cuts you have received would have to be increased," Wefald said in the memo. "We would have no choice."

Wefald urged University employees to take annual or compensatory leave during the curtailed holiday schedule. This would allow employees to avoid cold buildings and uncomfortable working conditions. The holiday shutdown will not affect the distribution of payroll checks Dec. 31.

K-State spends nearly $5.25 million on energy, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"I hope everyone realizes the dollars are just as scarce today as the natural gas and oil used to be," Miller said.

Hayden announced the sweeping, 3.8-percent budget cuts for all state agencies Nov. 19. University officials have been working on ways to trim $3.06 million from K-State's budget to meet the reduction level ordered by Hayden.

Wefald has been critical of the budget cuts, saying they will cause a "serious quality blow" to Kansas' higher education system.

"It's already caught up with us, and it's already injuring our academic programs," he said earlier this week.

Funding for instructional programs will be cut by about 2.3 percent at K-State, while cuts to other state-funded programs will range up to 3.8 percent, Wefald said.

Wefald orders cost-saving energy measures

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

In the face of a $3.06-million budget cut mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, University President Jon Wefald has ordered "unpalatable but necessary measures" to reduce campus energy costs $167,000 during the next six months.

Wefald outlined the conservation program in a memorandum sent Monday to deans, directors and department heads. Calling the program "a basic element of our plans to protec[t] instructional [pro]grams at the University," [he] four conservation steps.

—All daytime building temperatures will be capped at 70 degrees with the exception of animal facilities and lab experiments. Research experiments with documented minimum temperature requirements also will be exempted.

—Nighttime and weekend building temperatures will be maintained at 55 degrees except for those buildings with the above exceptions.

—Temperature control automation will be reactivated in most buildings. [It] will be [re]activated in most buildings, including the Central Plant, central-building units and window air conditioners, will be deactivated.

Wefald also ordered all but strictly essential University activity curtailed and building temperatures held at 55 degrees from Dec. 24 to Jan. 5. The University is normally closed on all but four of the days during this period of curtailment, the memo said.

Few exceptions will be allowed under the cutbacks ordered by Wefald.

"For the present program to succeed, we cannot make the [ex]ceptions for conservation that met with a number of exceptions to the order.

Requests for exemptions thought to be essential must be endorsed by a dean or vice president, who would then forward the request to Wefald for consideration by the Central Administrative Staff.

"Unless we (University officials) can all work together to ensure that the contemplated energy savings are indeed realized, the alread severe budget cuts you have received would have to be increased," Wefald said in the memo. "We would have no choice."

[Wefald urged University] compensatory leave during the curtailed holiday schedule. This would allow employees to avoid cold buildings and uncomfortable working conditions. The holiday shutdown will not affect the distribution of payroll checks Dec. 31.

K-State spends nearly $5.25 million on energy, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"I hope everyone realizes the dollars are just as scarce today as the natural gas and oil used to be," Miller said.

Hayden announced the sweeping, [$3.06-million] agencies Nov. 19. University officials have been working on ways to trim $3.06 million from K-State's budget to meet the reduction level ordered by Hayden.

Wefald orders cost-saving energy measures

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

In the face of a $3.06-million budget cut mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, University President Jon Wefald has ordered "unpalatable but necessary measures" to reduce campus energy costs $167,000 during the next six months.

Wefald outlined the conservation program in a memorandum sent Monday to deans, directors and department heads. Calling the program "a basic element of our plans to protect the employees and instructional programs of the University," the president ordered four conservation steps.

—All daytime building temperatures will be capped at 70 degrees with the exception of animal facilities and lab experiments. Research experiments with documented minimum temperature requirements also will be exempted.

—Nighttime and weekend building temperatures will be maintained at 55 degrees except for those buildings with the above exceptions.

—Temperature control automation will be reactivated in most buildings.

—No air conditioning will be provided on campus before May 4, 1987. All air-conditioning units, including the Central Plant, central-building units and window air conditioners, will be deactivated.

Wefald also ordered all but strictly essential University activity curtailed and building temperatures held at 55 degrees from Dec. 24 to Jan. 5. The University is normally closed on all but four of the days during this period of curtailment, the memo said.

Few exceptions will be allowed under the cutbacks ordered by Wefald.

"For the present program to succeed, we cannot make the number of exceptions we allowed before," he said, citing a 1984 request for conservation that met with a number of exceptions to the order.

Requests for exemptions thought to be essential must be endorsed by a dean or vice president, who would then forward the request to Wefald for consideration by the Central Administrative Staff.

"Unless we (University officials) can all work together to ensure that the contemplated energy savings are indeed realized, the alread severe budget cuts you have received would have to be increased," Wefald said in the memo. "We would have no choice."

Wefald urged University employees to take annual or compensatory leave during the curtailed holiday schedule. This would allow employees to avoid cold buildings and uncomfortable working conditions. The holiday shutdown will not affect the distribution of payroll checks Dec. 31.

K-State spends nearly $5.25 million on energy, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"I hope everyone realizes the dollars are just as scarce today as the natural gas and oil used to be," Miller said.

Hayden announced the sweeping, 3.8-percent budget cuts for all state agencies Nov. 19. University officials have been working on ways to trim $3.06 million from K-State's budget to meet the reduction level ordered by Hayden.

Wefald has been critical of the budget cuts, saying they will cause a "serious quality blow" to Kansas' higher education system.

"It's already caught up with us, and it's already injuring our academic programs," he said earlier this week.

Funding for instructional programs will be cut by about 2.3 percent at K-State, while cuts to other state-funded programs will range up to 3.8 percent, Wefald said.

Congress pressures Reagan to appoint special investigator

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Under pressure from Congress, President Reagan called Tuesday for appointment of a special counsel to investigate the diversion of Iranian arms sales profits to Nicaraguan rebels and named a former CIA official as his national security adviser.

Besides seeking to invoke a post Watergate-era law providing for probes independent of the executive branch, Reagan urged members of the House and Senate to consolidate under one committee their own probes of the affair.

"If illegal acts were undertaken, those who did so will be brought to justice," the president declared as he also announced that Frank Carlucci, onetime deputy CIA director and deputy secretary of defense, will replace Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter, who resigned last week as national security adviser.

The president said he'd been informed by Attorney General Edwin Meese III earlier Tuesday that "reasonable grounds" existed to seek appointment of an independent counsel by a three-judge court.

While Reagan was speaking in a rare midday broadcast to the nation, Poindexter made a brief appearance at the site of closed-door hearings by the Senate Intelligence Committee.

According to two sources who declined to be identified by name, Tuesday's witnesses were two "top-level" intelligence officials. One source said the reason Poindexter's appearance was brief was "a request by him to have some more time to get ready before he appears," possibly Wednesday.

"What we're trying to do right now is piece together the mosaic of facts," one source said of the Iran-Contra connection. "This was clearly held extremely closely, but a lot of people knew something about it,

Israeli leaders rebuke presidential assertions of Contra funding link

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israeli leaders Tuesday denied new assertions that their country siphoned funds from arms deals with Iran to Nicaraguan rebels. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres called the reports "complete falsehood."

Denials from the top three government officials put Israel in apparent conflict with President Reagan, who was quoted in Time magazine as saying a third country channeled money to the rebels from inflated prices Iran paid for weapons.

Newspapers quoted American officials as saying Reagan meant Israel, which has acknowledged secretly shipping U.S. arms to Iran but has denied handling payments to the rebels, known as Contras.

Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin told Parliament during a 45-minute debate: "The Israeli government doesn't maintain contact or ties or supply weapons from here to the rebels in Nicaragua. It has not given approval for any Israeli to assist, supply know-how or weapons from Israel to the rebels."

He was replying to opposition demands for parliamentary supervision of Israel's extensive arms business.

The U.S Justice Department informally has told Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's government that it will seek to question some Israelis in an investigation of the Iranian arms deal, officials said privately.

They said Israel has promised to cooperate with U.S. investigators, but no formal request had been made.

Israel seeks clarification from Washington on the Reagan remarks published in Time, an Israeli legislator said. He spoke on condition of anonymity and would not elaborate.

The magazine quoted Reagan as saying: "Another country was facilitating those sales of weapons systems. They then were overcharging and were apparently putting the money into bank

Mike Brown, junior in veterinary medicine, looks over his burned mobile home Tuesday afternoon for the first time since it caught fire Sunday night about 11:30 p.m. Brown escaped with only his dog, Zack, a few textbooks and the clothes on his back.

Student, pet escape fire; home burns

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Mike Brown, junior in veterinary medicine, lived in mobile homes all his life — until Sunday night.

About 11:30 p.m. Sunday, a fire caused by a malfunctioning hot water heater destroyed the home he moved into in August.

While folding his laundry at the west end of his home, Brown said he smelled smoke. His next-door neighbor had a wood- burning stove and Brown went outside to see if the stove was causing the odor.

Instead, he found smoke and flames coming from vents in an outside door that led to the hot water heater on the east side of the trailer.

Brown lived in a sparsely populated area about 15 miles north of Manhattan on Route 2. His neighbor lived in the only house within about a half mile.

When Brown saw the flames, he immediately woke his neighbor and asked him to call the fire department. He then found a flashlight in his own home, ran to the backyard and turned off the propane storage tank.

As flames spread rapidly, Brown re-entered the home to rescue his dog, Zack. He put Zack in his truck, moving it from the driveway to an adjacent street. Brown braved the fire one last time, grabbing as many textbooks as possible.

"I stayed in as long as I could; I almost couldn't get back out," he said. "It just happened so fast. From the time I smelled smoke to the time it burned down was 10 minutes — maybe."

Brown said he wasn't sure why he decided to take his textbooks before abandoning the home.

"There was a lot of stuff that was just as valuable or more valuable than the books," he said. "But it just so happened the books were what I wanted."

He said the entire contents of his uninsured home were destroyed, including about $2,000 worth of textbooks, notes from his first two years in veterinary school, his camera and photographs.

"Those are the things that are going to be tough to replace," he said.

Fortunately, Brown's parents live about five miles from Manhattan and have given him a place to stay. He is also receiving outside aid.

"I've had classmates give me old clothes and the Red Cross is replacing the textbooks I'll need for the rest of this semester," he said.

Members of the junior class are compiling old notes to give him and the Red Cross purchased three textbooks and surgical clothing he will need this semester.

Del Petty, Riley County fire chief, arrived at the scene about 15 minutes after the fire started, Brown said. Petty said the home was destroyed by the time he arrived.

During the harsh winter two years ago, Petty witnessed five consecutive mobile home fires

Chief of state welfare agency slashes budget $14.2 million

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The chief of Kansas' welfare agency Tuesday announced projected budget cuts of $14.2 million to comply with an order Gov.-elect Mike Hayden issued three weeks ago to slash the state's current operating budget by 3.8 percent.

The budget reductions Secretary of Social and Rehabilitation Services Robert C. Harder outlined during a morning staff meeting would fall most heavily on people who receive state medical benefits, on health care providers and on operators of adult care homes.

Under the plan, about $6.65 million would be trimmed from medical benefit programs for individual recepients, $2.15 million from state reimbursements to various health card providers, $1.8 million from state payments for adult care services and $3.6 million from other programs.

Most of the cuts will go into effect Jan. 1 but Harder said specific cuts won't become final until after a public meeting Dec. 17 at the agency's offices in Topeka.

Hayden ordered across-the-board budget cuts of 3.8 percent to trim $60 million from the state's budget to meet a projected $93 million shortfall in state revenues the remainder of this fiscal year, which ends June 30.

Harder said 3.8 percent of the $334.8 million in state general fund money the Legislature had approved for his agency this year would amount to $13.2 million. He said SRS officials decided to trim an additional $1 million in case some of the cuts do not produce the expected savings.

Transitional General Assistance, the state's temporary relief program, will receive cuts totaling $2.3 million, Harder said. Of that amount, $1.6 million will come from the elimination of medical coverage for TGA recipients.

The remaining cuts in the TGA program will be the result of reductions in the temporary benefit period, from the current four months to one month, Harder said.

Other budget cuts Harder announced today include:

— Imposing a $500-per-year limit on medical assistance coverage under the department's Unrestricted General Assistance program. Harder said the plan would save between $1 million and $2 million.

— Elimination of all dental benefits to state welfare recepients, resulting in a $500,000 savings.

— Cutting off all medical benefits to adult recepients of the Aid to Dependen Children program, which should save $350,000.

— Reducing the amount the state pays for Medicaid health care claims by $2.2 million. Harder said the state

Swiss seek to prevent future spills

BERN, Switzerland — Switzerland will tighten controls on the chemical industry and seek closer international cooperation on environmental issues because of last month's Rhine River spill, President Alphons Egli said Tuesday.

More than 30 tons of toxic chemicals leaked into the Rhine on Nov. 1 following a warehouse fire at the Sandoz chemical company in Basel. The spill killed about half a million fish and endangered drinking water supplies.

The accident "destroyed in one night" Switzerland's reputation of being advanced in dealing with environmental problems, Egli told both houses of Parliament.

He said the spill did "catastrophic damage" to Europe's busiest river, adding that it was not known how long it would take the Rhine to recover.

Egli, who also heads the Environment Ministry, said the cause of the fire has not yet been determined.

He said action would be taken to present such disasters in the future, "including, if necessary, drastic action and big expenditures by the industry."

Authorities have begun compiling an inventory of all installations that could pose a threat to human health and the environment in case of an accident, Egli said.

North may seek immunity deal

WASHINGTON — Fired National Security Council aide Lt. Col. Oliver North may be seeking immunity from prosecution by telling the Senate Intelligence Committee what he knows, congressional sources said Tuesday.

Under a provision, a congressional committee can grant immunity in criminal proceedings but is required to notify the Justice Department.

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., the Senate Democratic leader, said Tuesday he would prefer that an independent counsel consider granting immunity rather than a congressional committee.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., vice chairman of the committee, said he did not recall a committee granting immunity during his time in the Senate. Leahy was elected in 1974.

During his appearance before the committee on Monday, North invoked his constitutional protection against self-incrimination, said congressional sources. One source said he used the Fifth Amendment at least 40 times.

President Reagan fired North last week after an investigation revealed that profits from the Iranian sales had been funneled to the Nicaraguan rebels. North's boss, Vice Adm. John Poindexter, resigned.

Defendant in drug case found dead

NEW YORK — The body of a missing defendant in the "Pizza Connection" drug trial was found Tuesday stuffed in a garbage bag on a streetcorner in an industrial section in Brooklyn, according to a police source.

The source, who spoke on the condition of not being identified, said the victim was Gaetano Mazzara, 51, of Sayerville, N.J., who disappeared the day before Thanksgiving and hadn't been seen since.

Mazzara, the owner of a Union, N.J. pizzeria, was one of 20 men on trial in Manhattan on charges of participating in an international drug smuggling and money laundering ring.

Officer Louis Llanes, a department spokesman, said the victim had facial injuries, but the cause of death had not yet been determined.

Former Kansan faces drug charges

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A former Overland Park woman has been arrested on federal drug charges, the result of an 18-month investigation into a heroin pipeline from Thailand to Johnson County, authorities said Tuesday.

Shelly Briggs, 30, of San Clemente, Calif., was arrested by FBI agents Monday as she arrived at Kansas City International Airport to visit relatives in the area. She was charged with conspiracy to import more than 100 grams of heroin and distributing less than 100 grams.

She was freed on $20,000 bond.

Briggs is the second suspect apprehended in connection with the alleged operation.

According to an indictment last month by a federal grand jury in Kansas City, Kan., Briggs and a police informant flew in May 1985 from Los Angeles to Bangkok, Thailand, where Briggs allegedly acquired two pounds of what was described by the FBI as "high-quality heroin."

Hayden picks new GOP chairman

TOPEKA — Gov.-elect Mike Hayden said Tuesday he wants Fred Logan, a Prairie Village lawyer, to succeed Vern Chesbro of Ottawa as state Republican Party chairman.

Republicans will elect a new chairman in late January when the 134-member state committee meets here during the party's annual Kansas Day observance.

Hayden said he will write members of the state committee, informing them of his preference for Logan. Those members, who will be chosen at county and district conventions later this month, are expected to honor Hayden's request when they vote.

Chesbro, who defeated George Parsons of Wichita for the chairmanship in January 1985, announced recently he would not seek another two-year term as chairman.

Hayden had said he wanted to change chairmen, but recognized Chesbro's contributions to the party and his election victory last month by naming him chairman of a committee advising him on issues and policy matters.

Desi Arnaz dead of cancer at 69

LOS ANGELES — Desi Arnaz, the Cuban-born entertainer who teamed with a red-headed comedian named Lucille Ball to become one of the giants of an infant television industry, died early Tuesday of lung cancer. He was 69.

Arnaz died at his Del Mar home in San Diego County at 12:05 a.m. with daughter Lucie Arnaz Luckinbill at his side, publicist Charlie Pomerantz said.

His doctor, Charles Campbell, said Arnaz had been ill for about a year or so.

"He died of lung cancer. It was from smoking those Cuban cigars, that's the truth," Campbell said.

Reports that Arnaz was seriously ill had circulated since 1981, when he was hospitalized for what his wife, Edie, said was a flareup of diverticulitis, an inflammation of the intenstinal tract for which he had received four operations in 1969 and 1970. The reports had intensified in recent months, but Arnaz refused comment.

Arnaz was best known to hundreds of millions of TV viewers worldwide as the long-suffering Ricky Ricardo, husband of the wacky Lucy on "I Love Lucy," one of television's most beloved and longest-running shows.

Meat evaluators take first in contest

Team wins 'Super Bowl' of judging

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's meats judging team won the national championship at the International Meats Judging Contest Nov. 23 in Dakota City, Neb.

Nineteen teams from major universities throughout the United States attended the contest, which took place at the IBP Inc. processing plant.

"Winning this competition is like winning the Super Bowl in football," said Michael Dikeman, professor of animal sciences and industry and team coach. "This is the final competition of the year — and the toughest. Winning it is a real achievement."

Placing in all team events, K-State won first place in lamb judging, beef judging, specification cuts, total placings, reasons and the overall contest. The team placed second in pork judging and fifth in beef grading.

In individual scores, Matt Wineinger, junior in animal sciences and industry, was first in pork judging. Alan Waggoner, senior in animal sciences and industry, was third. Wineinger and Waggoner tied for third in lamb judging.

In beef judging, Waggoner was first and Wineinger was third. Wineinger placed second and Waggoner was fifth in reasons.

In total placings, Waggoner tied for second place.

Rex Harrison, senior in animal sciences and industry, tied for first place in specification cuts.

In the overall contest, Wineinger was second, Waggoner was third and Bret Fox, senior in animal sciences and industry, was 10th. Howard Woodbury, junior in animal sciences and industry, also is a member of the judging team.

K-State's meats judging team has won three of 10 judging contests this year, tying with Oklahoma State University.

The Intercollegiate Meat Judging program began in 1927 and has had contests each year since, with the exception of 1941-45 during World War II.

Speech teams take first in regional tournament

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's debate and forensics teams placed first out of 11 Kansas universities and two-year colleges in the fall semester's regional tournament Nov. 24 at The Wichita State University.

Both squads took 10 students. Mike Krueger, junior in economics, and Ted Payne, sophomore in political science, won fifth place in the debate competition.

Individual forensics winners were Vincent Bly, senior in theater, who won first place in poetry interpretation; Jon Mertz, senior in speech education, first place in communication analysis; and Brad Atchison, pre-physical therapy, first place in prose interpretation.

"The nice thing about this trip was that we deliberately combined the debate and forensics programs this time, and it paid off," said Ed Schiappa, K-State's director of debate. "As a school, we took third place overall. The award given for this was a trophy, which will be displayed in the main office of the speech department."

A mixture of out-of-state universities and junior colleges also competed at the tournament, Schiappa said. Competing colleges included schools from Arizona, Texas, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah and Wyoming.

"I am very proud of our debate team. We are currently ranked 22 out of over 300 schools. This outcome is based on successes and wins during the year," Schiappa said.

K-State's ranking is based on a point system by the Cross Examination Debate Association, a national organization.

"Lynne Ross, director of forensics, also deserves a hand for her contributions to the tournament," Schiappa said. "One of the reasons K-State did so well was because we combined the debate team with the forensics team. I am glad we went and did so well. We impressed a lot of people."

Legislators may face salary reductions

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Legislative Coordinating Council voted Tuesday to reduce spending by the Legislature and its support agencies by $420,000, including asking lawmakers to take a 5 percent cut in their daily salary and subsistence.

The LCC, made up of the seven top legislative leaders, instructed its staff to draft a bill to be introduced in the 1987 session which opens Jan. 12 which would trim legislators' daily pay from $54 to $51 and their daily expense allowance from $65 to $62.

The total reduction of $6, which must be approved by the full Legislature, represents a 5 percent cut from the $119 they now receive in both salary and subsistence while in session. In the course of a 90-day session, that amounts to $540 per legislator.

The draft bill would not reduce the $600 per month out-of-session subsistence lawmakers receive to meet expenses of constituent services.

The $6 cut amounts to reducing the legislative budget by $89,000.

The motion approved by the LCC will require an additional $168,000 reduction in legislative staff expenses to achieve a total cut of $257,000 in the Legislature's budget of $6.5 million during the current fiscal year.

The 3.8 percent cuts ordered three weeks ago by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden also will be applied to the Legislature's four support agencies, trimming another $163,000 from the Fiscal Year 1987 budget.

Those cuts include $66,000 from the $1.74 million budget of the Revisor of Statutes Office; nearly $44,000 from the $1.14 million budget of the Division of Post Audit; $41,000 from the $1.08 million budget of the Legislative Research Department, and $12,000 from the $317,000 budget of Legislative Administrative Services.

Hayden, who still is speaker of the Kansas House and thus a member of the LCC, said it was important for the Legislature and the governor's office to set an example in joining the budget cuts he has ordered for all state agencies. Hayden earlier said he would trim the budget of the governor's office by at least 5 percent when he takes office Jan. 12.

The governor-elect ordered the 3.8 percent across-the-board budget cuts to trim $60 million from state spending to meet a projected $93 million shortfall in state revenues the remainder of this fiscal year, which ends June 30.

"It is very important that everyone shares this burden," Hayden said following Tuesday's Coordinating Council meeting. "I'm sure our legislators are willing to set an example. They understand the ramifications better than anyone if we don't make these cuts and put our financial house in order."

Sen. Michael Johnston, D-Parsons, the Senate minority leader, agreed.

"When all state agencies are asked to tighten their belts, the Legislature has a duty to follow suit and make the same kind of concessions," said Johnston. "Whatever we ask of others, we ought to be prepared to cut a like amount."

Rep. Ed Rolfs, R-Junction City, chairman of the House Assessment and Taxation Committee, said, "I think we're pretty committed to not raising taxes. To balance the budget and stay out of the red, we're just going to have to make these cuts. It's painful for the Legislature and it's painful for all the agencies, but it's just got to be done."

Revisor of Statutes Arden Ensley said he already had trimmed his budget by more than $57,000 when the budget crunch hit a month ago, and needed to cut just $8,500 more. He said the only noticeable impact may be that an updated edition of the state administrative rules and regulations may not get published until next fiscal year.

Meredith Williams, the state post auditor, said he already had adjusted his agency's spending downward by about $32,000 and would need to trim just $11,000 more from current operations. The cuts will not mean reducing his auditing staff, he said.

Richard Ryan, director of the Legislative Research Department, said he had trimmed $40,000 in anticipation of the Legislature approving Hayden's 3.8 percent cuts, so he needs only to cut another thousand dollars.

William Bachman, director of legislative services, said a revised budget he had submitted included enough cuts to cover the $12,000 reductions required of his division.

U.S., Soviets open 4-day arms reduction talks

By The Associated Press

GENEVA — U.S. and Soviet arms control negotiators opened a special four-day session Tuesday with U.S. officials voicing hope the talks would bring the two sides closer together.

In Washington, White House spokesman Dan Howard said that the special session could "set the stage for concrete new results" if the Soviets "now share our commitment to achieving real arms reductions, while ensuring a stable military balance."

The Soviets and Americans held four meetings Tuesday: one plenary session of the top three negotiators from each side, and separate meetings on each of the three areas of negotiations — space and defense systems, long-range nuclear forces and medium-range nuclear weapons.

That pattern was expected to be repeated Wednesday and Thursday, while only a plenary session was planned for Friday.

The U.S. spokesman, Terry Shroeder, declined to provide details of the talks, including where they were held or for how long.

The special session is intended to maintain momentum during the two-month recess between the last regular round of arms control talks, which ended Nov. 12, and the round that begins Jan. 15.

The chief U.S. negotiator, Max Kampelman, said Monday he hoped the session would narrow differences between the two sides.

Kampelman has said that the two sides agree in some areas, particularly as regards medium and long-range nuclear weapons. But he said one problem is that the Soviets insist agreement be reached in all three areas simultaneously.

A major stumbling block is the U.S. "Star Wars" program for researching a space-based missile defense. The Soviets want Star Wars testing confined to the laboratory for 10 years, but the United States has refused to accept the restriction.

Veto to stop students from voting on issue

Allowing each individual a say in government by voting has always been a critical aspect of democracy. Apparently, Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, doesn't believe in this system because he refuses to allow the K-State students to voice their opinion on how they want to be represented in Student Senate.

Senate passed a bill Nov. 20 calling for the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum, which would have presented the issue to the students for their vote. The referendum would call for half of Senate to be represented by living group and half by academic college. However, Johnson vetoed the bill.

Johnson said he believes there are still important aspects to be considered before the issue should be brought to referendum. He said that because the bill proposes such a dramatic change, he wants to create a task force — just what K-State needs, another task force — to explore different options for student government representation.

However, Johnson states no alternatives to the plan that would have gone to a student vote. He said he believes the system needs improvement, yet vetoed the only option for change without proposing other options. Why veto a proposal that has worked at other universities when he can't show fault with the proposed system or provide alternatives?

Johnson should have presented his own ideas on alternative solutions if he is going to deprive the students of their vote on the matter. If Johnson would have proposed viable options, his action would have been understandable.

As it is now, one must wonder if conservativism was his only excuse for vetoing the bill. Perhaps Johnson does not want a change in the representation in Senate and is avoiding the possibility of a change.

Even if this is not true, Johnson should have allowed the students a right to state their opinion on the matter. After all, it is Student Senate.

Johnson should remember that senators and presidents are elected to represent the students because it is virtually impossible to have a true democracy that would allow the students to vote on every issue. Any instance that allows the students to voice their opinion on issues becomes closer to democratic government. One must wonder whether Johnson supports democratic government or autocratic government.

Grandfather's death teaches caring

Collegian Columnist

Thanksgiving has traditionally been a time of renewal.

College students return home to renew high-school friendships that have waned since graduation. They visit the married schoolmates who had always vowed they would stay single. If a former classmate attends another university, they swap stories about their sororities or try to shock each other with the impossible class schedules they have next semester.

If a person's family is spread throughout the country, Thanksgiving means renewing old family ties. The favorite cousin who hasn't written in three years finally joins the family for one brief stay. Aunts and uncles drive up with a station wagon full of squirming brats, while grandparents greet everyone at the door with a hug, a smile and a mug of hot cider.

Most of all, Thanksgiving should be a time to reflect on the past year — to renew old goals and inspire new ones. It should be a joyous celebration of family and friends and an affirmation of hope in the year to come.

Thanksgiving should have been all this and much more for my family. Unfortunately, the circumstances surrounding my homecoming weren't the best ingredients for a truly festive occasion.

My grandfather's death was a severe blow to the family. The sentimentality of this traditional family holiday did nothing to lessen the pain.

In my hometown, Grandpa had not been a visibly important person. But the sudden outpouring of compassion from the community told us that many had appreciated him. Because of our pastor's announcement in church that Sunday morning, well-meaning visitors began stopping by the house to say a few kind words and leave food, a plant or a card.

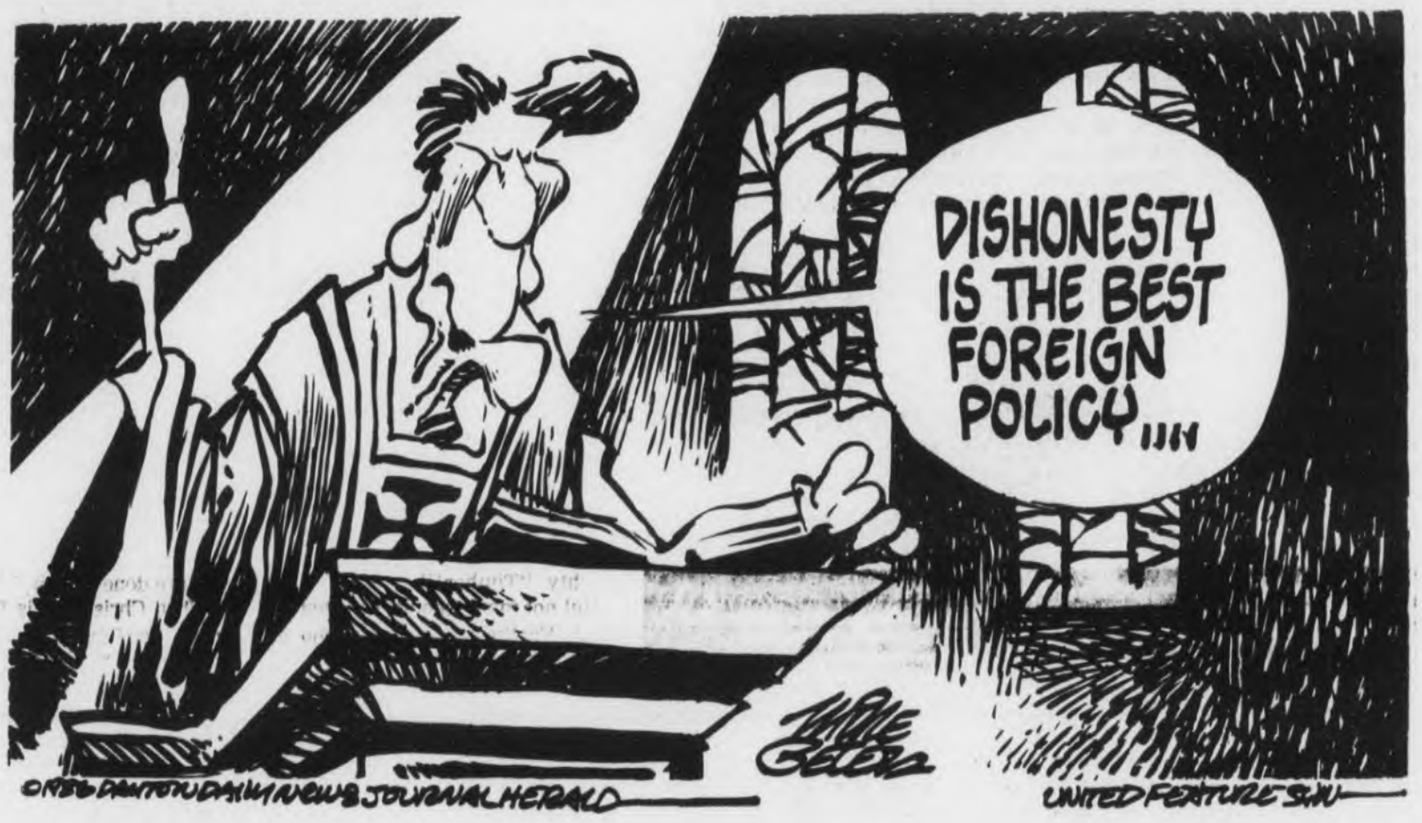
As more cards arrived, I began to read the messages inscribed on the inside. While most of the cards were from relatives or close friends, a few were from people to whom my grandparents had never been close.

One came from a family that had traded in Foodtown, the grocery store my grandfather had managed. Another came from a member of the church congregation whom we hardly knew.

While every card meant a great deal, one card in particular touched me more than the others. A former instructor of mine sent a small card with a warm message printed neatly on the inside.

When she had moved to my hometown some 40 years ago, she wrote that she hadn't known anyone. The first time she went grocery shopping, Grandpa had been cheerful to her.

She said he would always have a special place in her heart because he was the first person to show her any kindness. I was surprised that so small a gesture could make such a lasting impression.



As Thanksgiving Day approached, I found myself reflecting on the times my grandfather and I had spent together. I recalled a vacation in Colorado when I slid down a slippery slide, head first, and landed in a mud puddle. Grandpa laughed until tears ran down his cheeks.

I remembered him demonstrating the fine art of building a fire and teaching me when to turn the logs. When the burning logs became red embers, I would curl up in his lap and play possum (pretend to be asleep, for you city folks) before he tickled my feet.

I recalled the first Sunday I accompanied him to the shooting range. Wearing orange headphones to reduce the noise, Grandpa shouted, "Pull!" and raised the 12-gauge to his shoulder. A clay pigeon shattered in midair.

Of all the times I remember being with him, the simple things we did together brought back the fondest memories. I'll miss being called "Chick-a-bitty" and hearing his laugh. I'll miss the twinkle in his eye and the delighted smile he would flash at me across the dinner table.

I learned two things this Thanksgiving holiday. It doesn't matter what you do for a person so long as you're sincere about it. More important, it's the quality of time you spend with a person that counts, not the quantity.

Johnson's cabinet says bill needs examination

PATRICK MUIR
Guest Columnist

The act of vetoing a bill can be interpreted in many varying manners. It is for this reason that Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, and his cabinet would like to address the reasons that we believed warranted a veto of the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum bill. This bill would have sent to referendum a proposal to restructure Senate into half living group representatives and half representatives of colleges. The current system is based purely on representation through colleges.

We believe the question of how students are represented surely can justify a referendum. But our concerns — the concerns being voiced through this veto — deal with the proposal itself and its short history.

In examining this proposal, there are several questions in need of answering. The first asks whether there is a problem with the current method of representation. The second, if there is a problem, asks if is this the best proposal to address the problem. These are very difficult questions that some might assert are not possible to completely answer. But we believe the process this bill has been through has not addressed these questions.

How did this oversight occur? The answer can be found by looking at the way this bill was debated on the Senate floor. During debate, sponsors insisted that the discussion should be centered around the question of the referendum itself. When some senators questioned the nature of the problem, they were told they had inherent biases that prevented them from seeing a problem and, therefore, should send this bill to referendum.

This is when the oversight began to occur. When the senators were told they could not determine the nature of the problem, this prevented the discussion of whether this is the best proposal. The students, when deciding upon such a referendum, should expect their elected representatives to give them the best proposal upon which to decide. But, as I have shown, this was prevented from occurring.

How could the nature of a problem in representation be determined? We believe that a task force on student representation should be appointed. This group should reflect the diversity of living groups and colleges that we have on campus. Through research, testimony and discussion, we believe this group could determine the nature of any problem that exists and, if appropriate, develop a proposal that would best fit that particular problem. This type of proposal should then be taken to the students in a referendum. We are working on a bill to create this task force.

By not being assured this is the best proposal, we also believe this could lead to other complications. From the perspective of the sponsors of the bill, if this referendum would have been defeated, would they assume the students do not believe there is a problem or would they assume the students believe this proposal does not address an existing problem? If students believe the latter of the two while the sponsors begin to assume there is no problem, then this failure to communicate could prevent representation enhancement. To prevent this, we must know we are taking the best proposal to the students.

We hope it is clear this is not a veto to prevent enhancement of representation. We believe any attempts to enhance would be better served by working within our current system, such as through a task force, than bypassing it. We would like to thank the sponsors of the bill for bringing the situation to the forefront. We would also like to thank all the students who shared their input with us during the many hours of discussion on this action.

Support student fees

Editor,

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics needs money to compete competitively and to function to its capacity.

Athletic Director Larry Travis, the rest of the athletic department and the Athletic Fee Task Force formed by the Student Senate have worked diligently to achieve their goal of keeping the students informed. There is no doubt that the decision of the fee will be put to us with facts.

There is no "snowballing" going on here. The money generated by imposing such a fee would indeed be used for non-revenue sports.

I personally appreciate the straightforwardness of those involved in researching the fee. In addition, Larry Travis has proven his intent of "being as open to the students as possible."

Those who oppose the athletic fee are perhaps overlooking a point that Mike Jones, athletic department business manager, brought to my attention in a recent interview I had with him. The athletic department is not mandatory on this campus, but rather it is an asset — one which many of use tend to take for granted. The department is an asset for at least two reasons. The first is that it can be used as a recruiting device to attract potential students. The second is that the department serves as a retention device by providing full- and part-time jobs for students along with the financial support (scholarships) that it offers.

Aren't you tired of hearing the favorite joke in regard to K-State athletic seasons as always being in a year of rebuilding? I know I am, and I believe this might be one way to help change it.

I believe students can help the athletic department and at the same time the University by taking the time and effort to support his athletic fee. Go State!

Government necessary

Editor,

Re: Scott Miller's column, "Governments intrude on freedoms," in Monday's Collegian.

I happen to agree with Miller that the "state" isn't the best thing since sliced bread. It seems the people who are least qualified are appointed to critical posts. We have a president who says one thing and does another. Senators take junkets that cost us thousands of dollars, and our Army just spent $15.6 million on bayonets. I will be glad to help Miller rid the people of this yoke of oppression as soon as he has something better.

I got the impression Miller felt government isn't needed and he is right. If everyone would respect each other, we could live without all these rules and regulations. The problem is not everyone is respectful of individual freedoms. If we do away with one government, another will pop up in its place. Someone will gather a following. He or she will start deciding how the clique should live. Soon the clique decides everyone should live the way it does.

Perhaps it won't be a charismatic individual with a gang of brown shirts. It may be IBM with a gang of blue suits. The corporations of the world would run rough shod over you and me. Maybe the corporation would earn more money if their employees would live according to company policy. South Africa is repressive, but think of the government of Union Carbide. The people would surely rise against the corporations, but to fight an organization, people must be organized. Another government is born.

I am not a pessimist. I am a realist. If we look at nature, we see many examples. The strongest gorilla is leader of the band. Ants have a society so rigid we look like paragons of flexibility. We are stuck with some form of government. Until we come up with something better, we must make this government work as best we can. We must watch our leaders. If they lie and cheat, we have the responsibility to make sure they are not allowed to do it again. We are the people; however, we are also a part of our government. We must see, think and act clearly for a better government.

Reagan dishonesty

Editor,

Re: Dan Owens' column, "Reagan's image bluffs press, public," in the Nov. 14 Collegian, and Kirk Caraway's column, "Searching for Reagan's good deeds," in the Nov. 17 Collegian.

Thank you so very much for writing these columns! I could not believe that someone was finally standing up and speaking against Ronald Reagan and his policies.

I strongly agree with Owens when he said, "A president should be able to communicate well with the American public." And on that point, I will concede that Reagan performs well, in fact, too much so. Remember, this man convinced a majority of Americans to elect him on a platform that a relative few supported.

I also agree with Owens' analogy of Reagan being "a good frame surrounding a bad picture." Even then, I couldn't support an administration that cut social programs for the elderly and the poor but spent $50,000 on Tupperware. I am so sure the first family sits down to leftovers.

I voted against him in the last election just as I did the first time he got into office. I feel, as a nation, we hardly question his policies or motives unless they affect our student loans or drinking laws. If you ask any Reagan supporter why they voted for him, they'll say things like, "He makes me feel good," and "I now have a sense of pride in America." Well, people, if that's all it takes, go out and get a shower massage and a Springsteen album.

As a nation, we even believe what he says about the economy. What does he know? He's constantly talking about the "strength" of the economy and yet all leading indicators and critics say the opposite. Let's face it, I'll bet his idea of a smart businesswoman is a prostitute with an IRA account.

I'll make myself clear on this; I'm a black man and a college student. I have virtually no reason to support Reagan. Am I the only one who realizes that the best way to get money from the government is to become a contra rebel? It seems to me the only answers he ever has in times of crisis is either "no comment" or surplus cheese. I still remember when he set up a congressional committee to find out if there was hunger in the United States. That was a huge waste of time and money when all he had to do was ask a K-State student. Think about it. If it wasn't for Ramen noodles, a lot of us wouldn't be here.

What really cracks me up is that Reagan supporters now want the 22nd Amendment repealed so that he can run again in 1988. While I do agree the American people should have the right to choose a president as many times as they want, that doesn't mean I'd stick him back in office.

The way things are going now, in the next election, if they choose to run, I'm voting for Boy George and Liberace. At least then we'd have a first lady who knows how to dress. But then, what do I know? After all, I'm just a lowly Ramen-noodle-eating college student. I do try to stay on top of the issues so I can cast an informed vote. But then, who knows, maybe I've simply been "disinformed."

Evergreens display true holiday spirit

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reporter

Forget the gaudy plastic lawn decorations. When it comes to true Christmas beauty, trees are the standard.

There is no account of the first Christmas tree. In "The Christmas Tree Book," Phillip Snyder writes that 16th century Estonians brought evergreen branches into their homes for magical rites. Because the branches stayed green year-round, the Estonians thought they had godlike powers. They believed the branches would provide protection and ensure the return of vegetation.

Although the trees are no longer revered as gods, they are still in demand. In Manhattan, there are different ways to get a tree.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Nadine Lee, co-owner of Lee's Christmas Tree Farm, inspects a tree before tagging it. Lee and her husband, Norman, have raised Christmas trees on their tree farm southeast of Junction City for nearly 20 years.

For between $20 and $120, anyone can walk into a local department store and buy a plastic tree that will last almost as long as a Volvo. For a few dollars more, a person can buy a can of Christmas tree odor. Technology, indeed.

If the fake tree option isn't appealing, there are precut, real trees. Stoner Smith, owner of Green Thumb lawn and garden shop, 1105 Waters St., sells precut trees.

Smith said the tree season coincides with the shopping season. This year, the cost for the average tree is up about 50 cents. A 5- to 8-foot tree will cost $15, and a 10-foot tree will cost around $30.

One option is left for someone wanting an even more natural tree. To some, the best method is to meet the tree on its own grounds: forage into the wild, pick the tree out and chop it down while bellowing out a mighty, "Timber!"

But not many people own pasture land. Furthermore, those who do don't appreciate trespassers.

Floyd Huntzinger sells Christmas trees by the "choose-and-cut" method. A customer picks out the the tree, and he cuts it down for them. Huntzinger's grove is located 10 miles east of Manhattan on Highway 24.

A 10-year veteran of Christmas tree sales, Huntzinger charges $3 a foot, and he doesn't let his trees get much more than 8 feet tall. He said he expects to sell between 200 and 300 trees this year.

Next April, he will plant up to 1,000 trees. Only 60 percent of these will become Christmas trees, Huntzinger said.

As beautiful as a Christmas tree may be, it is still a fire hazard when it dries out. Huntzinger said a mixture using one cup of sugar, one-fourth cup of bleach and one gallon of water added to the base of the tree will keep it from drying out fast. Huntzinger also warned that precut trees will dry out sooner than fresh-cut ones.

"The precut trees are cut around September, and they start to dry out around Christmas time. A fresh-cut tree won't dry out until you are done with it," he said.

When Christmas is finished, the tree's usefulness is not. Chuck Beaver of the Kansas Fish and Game Commission said the trees can be used for spawning beds and fish habitat. Every year, the fish and game commission has dump sites and uses the trees to increase bass and crappie populations.

Farm Bureau president predicts staid policies

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The leader of Kansas' largest farm organization predicted Tuesday the 100th Congress will do nothing to significantly shift the direction of federal farm policy.

"I don't see any major changes being made in the 1985 farm act," Kansas Farm Bureau President Doyle Rahjes said at a press conference at the end of the bureau's 68th annual convention. Rahjes was elected to a second-two-year term during the convention.

Congress will weigh the cost of farm programs against the potential impact in the world agricultural trade marketplace before deciding if the programs should be reduced.

Rahjes said consumers benefit most from the $25 billion spent for federal farm programs last year, noting the price of food in the United States proportionately is far lower than in other countries.

Delegates to the convention expressed support for a quick move to a market-oriented farm economy. They also said federal farm program payments will be necessary during the transition. However, delegates opposed mandatory production controls.

The Farm Bureau's staff will begin studying alternatives to current farm legislation with an eye toward making proposals when a new five-year farm bill is considered in 1990, Rahjes said.

Delegates adopted a resolution urging the Kansas Legislature to carefully seek ways to cut the fat from all state programs before increasing taxes or keeping some of extra money the state expects to get as a wind-fall from new federal tax laws.

Project helps birds of prey recover, return to wildlife

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

For many injured birds, K-State is the first step on their road to recovery.

Through the College of Veterinary Medicine and Terry Campbell, assistant professor of surgery and medicine, an injured bird can be treated and, in conjunction with the Prairie Raptor Project, returned to nature in good health.

The Prairie Raptor Project, located 12 miles northwest of Salina, was started in April 1979 as a special Project of the Smoky Hills Audubon Society, said founder and director Maure Weigel, Salina.

Weigel started the Project because of his interest in wildlife. In 1979, he found a great horned owl that was hurt. Weigel nursed the owl back to health, but realized that he could have done a better job if he had a facility to use.

"What started as a small, backyard operation has developed into the largest operaton of its type in the state," Weigel said. "We had a meager beginning and saw 14 birds in our first year, but this year and next, we should see well over 200."

Campbell, an avid bird watcher, works with exotic species of birds including raptors, which are birds of prey.

"Injured birds are filtered through here and Salina," Campbell said. "At K-State, we just have the medical facility to treat the birds. We don't have a facility where they can convalesce. That exists in Salina. Without each other, the system wouldn't work out very well."

Campbell said 90 percent of the raptors that are treated have had some sort of a trauma injury, such as a broken wing. The injury is treated here, then the raptors are sent to Salina for approximately three weeks of convalescent care. At the Project, the birds are kept in outside cages, which provide a more natural environment for the birds.

"At the College of Veterinary Medicine, there is not an ideal environment for the raptors to heal in," Campbell said. "The birds hear the sounds of potential predators, there is a constant temperature, and the surroundings are very sterile. It is stressful for the birds here. They are much more comfortable outside."

After the birds have convalesced, they are sent back to K-State for a checkup. If they are healed, they go back to Salina and are put in a bigger cage to encourage flight, Campbell said.

"When they can fly well and catch live prey, they can be released," he said.

Weigel said that besides himself, two to five volunteer workers help at the Project. These people clean cages and give tours on the weekends and in the summer. Interns from K-State and Bethany College also work at the Project.

"Besides rehabilitating raptors, education and research are two of our primary goals," Weigel said. "We need a lot of money to do this."

It is for this reason that the Prairie Raptor Project will become incorporated later this year.

"Over the last five years, we've had an operating budget of $2,000 to $5,000," Weigel said. "We could easily use $50,000. We need to get a larger funding base, and we need more corporate backing."

Weigel said the Project is funded by the Kansas Fish and Game Commission, Smoky Hills Audubon Society and individual donations. Members also give educational talks for which the Project receives compensation.

Weigel said he sees no reason why the Project will not continue for many years.

"It's a heck of a work load, and it's gotten to the point where we need to have someone here all the time," Weigel said. "It's become my second full-time job."

Hindus battle Sikhs in New Delhi; police report 1,500 rioters arrested

By The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Mobs of Hindus angered by Sikh terrorism rampaged through the capital Tuesday and battled Sikhs outside their temples. Police reported 1,500 arrests as they struggled to control the 16,000 Hindu rioters.

Bloodied protesters were seen at several confrontations with club-swinging police, but there was no immediate figure on the total number of injured.

The rioting erupted during a general strike called by a Hindu party to express "anger and anguish" over the massacre Sunday of 24 Hindus in Punjab state by assailants described by police as Sikh terrorists.

"The situation is very tense. We can't say what we are going to do," area police chief R. Mohan said Tuesday evening in densely populated old Delhi, where the major sectarian battle erupted at the historic Sisganj Sikh temple.

Police fired shots in the air, burst tear gas shells and made repeated charges with steel-tipped bamboo clubs to break up the melee at the temple.

"They challenged us," temple spokeman Hardeep Singh said to explain why 150 Sikhs came out of the shrine with ceremonial swords to confront 8,000 Hindu protesters. He said the Hindus shouted curses and derisive chants.

The street in front of the temple was littered with rocks and broken bricks after the battle and a curfew was declared in the area Tuesday night.

Sikhs and Hindus also battled outside a Sikh temple in east Delhi, and police fought running battles in other areas with Hindu rioters who threw stones, blocked roads and set fires. Eight vehicles and two Sikh houses were set ablaze.

The army was put on alert after a meeting of military and government officials, and police cars with loudspeakers cruised the city's neighborhoods at nightfall warning people to stay inside.

General strikes or other protests were declared in six Indian states Tuesday, but widespread violence developed only in New Delhi, where 7,000 extra police and paramilitary troops were called in.

In Parliament, lawmakers shouted protests for a second day against the terrorist actions of Sikhs who demand an independent nation in Punjab.

Home Minister Buta Singh was jeered by opposition members as he tried to explain that Punjab's police were ill-equipped to fight terrorists "aided by Pakistan." The neighboring nation has denied claims it is behind the violence.

Sikhs make up about 2 percent of India's 780 million people but form a majority in Punjab, a rich farming state.

The militants demand an independent Sikh nation they call "Khalistan," which means "Land of the pure" in the Punjabi language. Many moderate Sikhs also want more autonomy.

The persistent Punjab attacks have embarrassed Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, who signed an accord with moderate Sikhs intended to quell the violence.

Gandhi came to power in October 1984 amid anti-Sikh riots set off by the assassination of his mother, then Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, by her Sikh bodyguards.

Soup: Simple, yet satisfying

Place setting courtesy of Kitchens Plus

Winter favorite has versatility, Grandma's OK

Grandma was right.

After extolling the virtues of soup for years while the rest of us turned a deaf (but loving) ear, grandma has proven that all of her preachings were more than the simple, unsubstantiated lore we believed them to be. Inevitably, we've discovered that soup is good food.

Moreover, we've also discovered there is something to grandma's claim that soup helps to cure a common cold. There is medical evidence to support what was previously believed to be hearsay.

Of course, coming to this realization now, after all these years, means we must do so with egg on our faces. Or make that egg drop soup.

Popular almost exclusively during the winter months, hearty soup can play a positive role in one's daily diet. Because it is a source of concentrated nutrients that are easily digested, it is an excellent dietary supplement when one is ill, said Martha Ann Olson, registered dietition at Lafene Student Health Center.

"Basically, it (soup's nutritional value) depends on what is in it and how it was prepared," Olson said. "The liquid in soup is good because fluid intake is necessary to avoid dehydration when one is ill."

Soup's nutrient value varies with the consistency of the soup, said Katharine Grunewald, associate professor of foods and nutrition. If a soup is made with a large quantity of water, the nutritional value decreases compared to a hearty soup that is thicker and contains more meats and vegetables. Essentially, soup is as nutritious as the ingredients in it, Grunewald said.

Soup is legendary for its power to relieve a stuffy nose that nearly always accompanies the common cold. In addition, soup aids in the voluntary reduction of calories consumed if one is dieting.

"On the average, people consume 50 calories less during a meal if they are having soup," Grunewald said.

Clear soups such as soupstock, broth and bouillon are lower in calories compared to cream soups such as cream of chicken or clam chowder.

Condensed soups in a can, while extremely popular among American consumers, are not popular among nutritionists, Grunewald said. That's because these soups tend to be high in salt and fat, which are linked to high blood pressure, heart attacks and strokes.

In addition, canned soups usually are low in fiber, which is thought to reduce the chances of some kinds of cancer.

Although meatier and definitely more filling, chili also is a soup popular during the winter months. Characteristically, chili contains more calories because of its ingredients.

However, it provides some added nutritional value most other soups don't have. Grunewald said chili contains more iron because of the beef and kidney beans.

Soups can have a variety of characteristics. Clear soups and hearty soups are two of the widest categories.

Clear soups can be in the form of stock, broth and bouillon, which is French for broth or stock. Basically, broth comes from stock. In the past, the liquid was stored in a pot — appropriately referred to as a stock pot — and when the stock was spooned out and used as the base for soup, it was called broth.

Broth is the liquid that meats, vegetables or fish produce when cooked. Broth, along with other ingredients, is usually the base for the soup.

Hearty soups include cream soups, chowders and gumbos. Cream soups come in thick and thin consistencies, and some start from a basic white sauce.

Hearty soups also can be thickened with egg yolks and cream, rice or vegetables. Milk, vegetable juices and pureed vegetables can be substituted for the broth.

Chowders started as typically a seafood mixture. Now, chowders can be made from vegetables, corn or meat and usually contain a large amount of solid ingredients and heavy broths.

Gumbo, a specialty of New Orleans, combines seafood, vegetables and meat or poultry in its mixture. What sets gumbo apart from the other soups is that it is thickened with a special powder.

The origin of soup goes back to biblical times. Soup mixtures are sometimes referred to as "pottages," thick mixtures usually made of vegetables. With time, pottages developed into soups as we know them today. Meats were added and clear broth soups came about either out of cooking ingenuity or necessity due to the lack of solid food ingredients.

Cease fire persists in Philippines

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines — Negotiators for communist rebels said Tuesday they will not demand a share of power immediately. The military reported no fighting anywhere in the country five days after a cease-fire agreement.

The truce is to run for 60 days, beginning Dec. 10, while the rebels and President Corazon Aquino's government seek a permanent solution to the insurgency that began 17 years ago.

In comments during a television interview, the rebel negotiators also said they "can live," for now, with the presence of U.S. military bases. Leases on Clark Air Base and Subic Bay Naval Base run until 1991, and Aquino has pledged to honor them.

The president dismissed two more ministers Tuesday in her Cabinet reorganization, and the armed forces commander reassigned armored vehicles belonging to the Defense Ministry security force, which was linked to an alleged coup plot.

Satur Ocampo, chief rebel negotiator, said the question of a coalition with Aquino would come up "only if" the two sides agreed on a plan for solving the nation's problems.

"After that it would become a tactical question as to whether, in the implementation of these agreed programs, the two forces can cooperate, coordinate or coalesce," Ocampo said.

He said he did not think the issue of a coalition government, which Aquino has rejected, would become "a breaking point" in the peace talks.

Ocampo and fellow negotiators Antonio Zumel and Carolina Malay were interviewed on the program "Viewpoint" in their first television appearance since the cease-fire agreement was signed last Thursday.

They said they would not press immediately for the dismantling of Clark and Subic, the two largest U.S. overseas military facilities.

"We have lived all these years, we have fought all these years...under the very nose of the U.S. bases, and that in itself shows that we can live with these bases," Malay said.

Zumel said the rebels are not committed to armed struggle and "if we can attain change in our country...through a negotiated political settlement, then we are willing to try it."

'The Fantasticks': return to Voltaire

Off-Broadway musical to play locally

By LISA SHEIKH
Collegian Reporter

The Opening Night Musical Theatre Co. has returned to Gregov's Dinner Theatre, 2605 Stagg Hill Road, with a new production of America's longest running off-Broadway musical, "The Fantasticks."

The musical, which will be presented for the fourth and final weekend Friday, Saturday and Sunday night, has been playing in its original off-Broadway theater in New York since 1960 and has toured the world.

The dinner theater consists of a combination meal and show. The buffet dinner begins at 6:30 p.m. on Friday and Saturday and is followed by the musical at 8. Sunday's dinner begins at 5 p.m. and is followed by a 6:30 show.

The musical is a fantasy in the style of Voltaire (an 18th-century French writer and master of satire) and is a parable of young love, said Linda Haynes Uthoff, artistic director for Opening Night and producer and director of "The Fantasticks."

In Act One, the audience is introduced to a young couple, Matt Hucklebee and Luisa Bellamy, played by Donald Pfister, senior in journalism and mass communications, and Lisa Hadorn, senior in humanities. The two are very much in love, as long as a wall separates them and they believe that their fathers disapprove. In reality, however, their fathers wish them to be married. They even arrange a flamboyant abduction scene in order to unite the two.

They hire an abductor, El Gallo, played by David Atchison, Manhattan resident, to stage a rape so that Matt may prove his valor and win parental approval. The "rape ballet," titled "It Depends on What You Pay," is one of the highlights of the production, Uthoff said. The scheme is a success, and Act One concludes with Matt and Luisa very much in love and everyone happy. El Gallo wonders how long the pretty picture can last.

Act Two opens with the lovers discovering the hoax and then becoming disillusioned and bored with each other. They quarrel and separate, and Matt goes off to see the world. On his adventure, he encounters many trials and tribulations. Luisa, meanwhile, has remained at home only to be disillusioned by El Gallo. When the two reunite at last, they are more mature and more in love than ever.

The musical was written by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt, based on a Rostand-Edmond production titled "The Romantics." Other works of Jones and Schmidt include "I Do! I Do!" and "Celebration," but "The Fantasticks" is their most famous work, Uthoff said.

The musical features such popular songs as "Try to Remember," "Never Say No" and "They Were You." It is a very theatrical production, utilizing little in the way of props, Uthoff said. The backdrop consists only of sewn-together rags, and all else needed during the play is extracted from a box on stage. Thus, Uthoff said, the audience is called upon to use its imagination in order to relate to the characters.

"There is something for everyone in this play," Uthoff said.

The musical is meant to be played in front of a small audience, Uthoff said, and it is very good for performing groups like Opening Night because it can be created new each time, she said.

The part of Mr. Hucklebee is played by David Cox, head of the Department of Biochemistry. Manhattan resident Paul Brown plays Amos Babcock Bellamy. Featured as The Old Actor is Manhattan resident Michael Musick. John Winningham, also of Manhattan, portrays Mortimer, and Victoria Lee Williams, a visitor to Manhattan from San Francisco, plays the Mute.

Commitment keys plays' 26-year run

By The Collegian Staff

Now in its 26th year, "The Fantasticks" is the longest running off-Broadway musical in America. The original producer, Lore Enoto, is still producing the original version at Sullivan Street Playhouse in New York.

Enoto's son, Thad, a one-time business manager for the show, currently resides in Manhattan and is a student at Manhattan Christian College.

Enoto said his father will continue to produce the show until his retirement. He said his father has invested a great deal of savings in the show and that he believes in it.

When the show premiered in 1960, Enoto said, it was not readily accepted by audiences. "It was not the traditional kind of show," he said. "It was a bit avant-garde for the time."

Lore Enoto continued to invest in the show, nonetheless, he said. "He had the commitment to get it started in the first place, and he has had the commitment to keep it running ever since," Enoto said. "When Dad retires, the show probably will, too."

Since its birth in 1960, "The Fantasticks" has been performed in virtually every country in the world, Enoto said. Records have been made from the versions played in New York, Spain, Mexico City, Japan and Sweden.

In 1964, the Hallmark Hall of Fame produced a special television version of the musical, starring Ricardo Montalban, John Davidson, Susan Watson and "The Wizard of Oz's" Bert Lahr.

Before "The Fantasticks," Lore Enoto co-produced several off-Broadway productions, working with such well-known actors and actresses as Peter Falk, Eva Gabor, Geraldine Fitzgerald and Patrick O'Neal. "The Fantasticks" was the first show Enoto produced on his own.

Eyewear becoming fashion spectacle

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

When it comes to fashion, the eyes have it.

Whether it's contacts or glasses, eyewear is becoming a fashion accessory, just like jewelry and belts.

There are even a few people buying glasses and lenses that do not need to wear them for vision correction, said Paul E. Bullock, Manhattan optometrist.

Although there are some eye diseases and conditions, crossed eyes for example, that cannot be corrected by contact lenses, there are many vision problems that can be corrected, Bullock said.

"More women wear contacts now for cosmetic reasons and convenience — not being in the way when they work," he said. "I was surprised at the number of males that were interested in extended-wear lenses. I think it's like not having to shave everyday."

A growing trend in contacts is colored and tinted lenses.

"There are lenses out now that can turn the darkest brown eye into baby blue," he said. "Tinted lenses are used to accent the color of the eyes."

The contact area that covers the iris is colored, but the lens area that covers the pupil is clear to allow clear vision.

Today, lenses are relatively safe, Bullock said.

"About the only time a lens will pop out of the eye during an activity is if a finger gets into the eye, as in football," he said.

"Contact lenses have problems, just like cars, when people do not take care of them right," Bullock said. "All contact lenses need to have continuous care and follow-up work done."

Although the trend is leaning toward contacts, glasses are still worn by many.

"People are finally buying what they want and are using the glasses as a fashion accessory," said Danone Martin, a Manhattan certified optician.

"College kids like the multicolored frames and the bright colors, like the reds," said Shirley Lundberg, lab and dispensary manager at Bullock's office.

"Instead of neutral brown, people are buying the bolder colors in plastic frames, like bright blues," Martin said.

The most popular frame style for young adults is the style with the temples placed high in the front, Lundberg said.

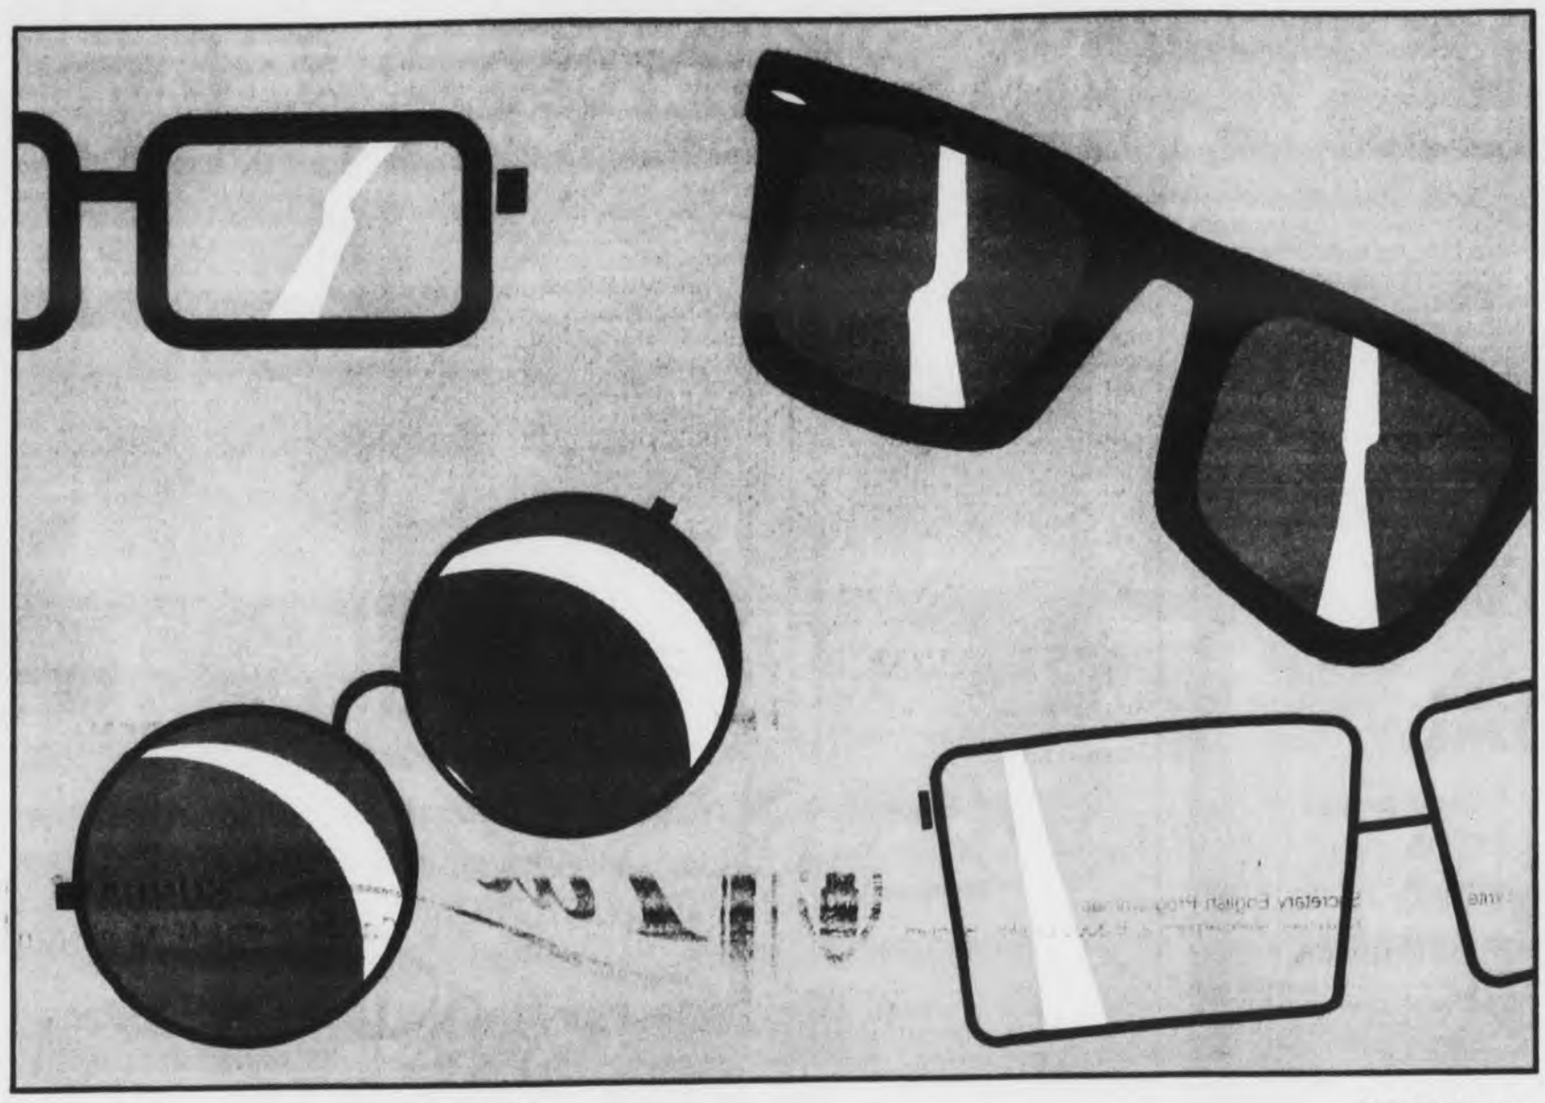
Other trends among the youth are Wayfarer's (as worn by Tom Cruise in "Risky Business"), small wire frames (like those worn by John Lnnon) and combination frames made of plastic and metal, said Martin.

In a competitive market, designer frame companies are coming up with gimmicks to sell their frames. Lundberg said there is one line of designer frames that comes with matching jewelry and another line that includes their popular brand of designer perfume.

Thick lenses can be a negative aspect of wearing glasses, but Lundberg says there are different techiniques to make them less distracting.

"Thick lenses can be made to look thinner by rolling and polishing the edges," Lundberg said, "Tinting also helps make the lens appear thinner."

Glass lenses are being replaced by plastic lenses for safety reasons and lightweight comfort. Bullock said the use of glass lenses is "practically impractical."



Contacts, as well as glasses, need special care to avoid injuring the eye permanently, said Lisa Howard, Bullock's office manager.

A new line of makeup products, Eye Care, helps preserve the life of contact lenses, Howard said. The products do not rub or flake off like other makeup products.

"If it (makeup) does happen to get on the contact lens, it will not damage the lens, because there is no oil in the product — it is all water based," Howard said. "If there is an oil content in the product, when a flake gets onto a contact lens, it just embeds itself and eats little pits in the contact, damaging the lens."

Putting the lens in before applying makeup will help avoid the lens coming out in contact with the makeup, Howard said.

Proper care will prolong the life of the equipment as well as the physical eye itself, Bullock said.

Stress counselors find alternatives to tension

By ANN CLIFFORD
Collegian Reporter

As final examinations approach, the Counseling Center in Holton Hall offers students an alternative to "stressing out."

"At this time of the year, there are extra stresses, such as end of the semester pressures, finals, poor diet and less sunshine, to deal with," said David Danskin, a counselor involved in the center's stress management and wellness programs.

Students come to the center with complaints of "blanking on a test, making dumb mistakes, lacking concentration and experiencing feelings of anxiety," Danskin said.

As they grow up, students learn the process of studying for a test, getting nervous about it, "psyching themselves up to take the test" and then being rewarded with a grade, he said.

"We are taught to get more tense than we need to be," Danskin said. "We are not taught that it's all right to relax about classes and taking tests."

During the average day, people encounter between 50 and 200 stressful events, he said. How individuals react to stress affects their performance as students and their overall health.

People need to realize they cannot change the world, but they can change the way they react to the stress in the world, Danskin said.

Headaches, insomnia and lack of concentration are all warning signs of stress overload, he said. The Counseling Center can help students learn different strategies and relaxation techniques to reduce stress.

Exercising, listening to a particular song or imagining a pleasant place are all quick relaxation techniques, Danskin said.

Students also can use intensive 15- to 20-minute periods of these exercises for total relaxation, he said. It usually takes four to six weeks of practicing the techniques for students to learn to manage stress.

In addition to relaxation exercises, the center uses biofeedback instruments to help students monitor their progress in stress reduction, Danskin said.

Because people react to stress differently, some relaxation techniques work better for different individuals, he said. Biofeedback shows which methods are the most effective for the individual.

One of the most common biofeedback instruments measures the temperature of the hand. Hand temperature reflects stress by becoming colder when under stress and warmer when relaxed, he said.

By monitoring the temperature of their hands, students can chart their progress in reducing stress by learning and practicing relaxation exercises, Danskin said.

Besides the benefits of becoming a better student, being more relaxed is beneficial to overall health. Danskin said studies have shown most illnesses to be stress-related.

College students usually do not think about the effects of stress on their future health, but by learning to manage stress for better class performance, they also can be helping to reduce the risk of illness in the future, Danskin said.

The most efficient way to cope with stress is to take steps in learning to relax before problems arise, he said.

Students should monitor their stress levels each hour and try to avoid letting stress build up, he said.

Agriculture convention offers new ideas for reaping profits

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — Thousands of farmers converged from 42 states Tuesday to hear tips on surviving the agricultural crisis, including advice to diversify from wheat and corn with such exotic crops as alligators and ginseng.

"Farmers are notorious for producing what they like and then trying to sell it," said Booker T. Whatley, a retired professor at Tuskegee Institute who is farming and consulting.

Whatley's session on how resourceful farmers can turn 25 acres into an annual income of $100,000 was among the more popular during the conference sponsored by Successful Farming magazine. About 5,500 farmers showed up to attend the 1½-day conference.

For the daring, there were sessions on breeding llamas and alligators or growing ginseng, herbs and garbanzo beans.

Whatley has been spreading his message for 15 years, but said people have only recently started listening to his program for transforming farms near metropolitan areas into operations where city dwellers pick their own fruits and vegetables.

The prescription calls for hard work and organizational skills, including finding 1,000 families willing to pay a $25 annual fee for the right to pick their own food at 60 percent of supermarket prices.

"Farmers complain that they get so small a share of the housewife's food dollar. With this plan, he gets 100 percent and he sets the price," Whatley told hundreds of farmers.

His was just one of 100 topics being presented in the ADAPT 100 conference. ADAPT stands for Agricultural Diversification Adds Profit Today.

"We can't compete in export markets with countries that grow products and give them away," said Richard Krumme, editor of Successful Farming. "We had better look for some alternatives."

Krumme said the conference was looking for opportunities in agriculture, not problems and not what the government will do to solve them.

"There is not one solution to what ails agriculture, there are 10,000 solutions," Krumme said. "They are not in Washington, D.C., or in your state capital. They are right out there in each and every farm in America."

Farmers Jim and Judy Richardson of Portage Des Sioux, Mo., raise soybeans and corn on 240 acres and not only have been plagued by low grain prices but also had their entire soybean crop wiped out by a flood last month.

Richardson said he is interested in finding ways to diversify, perhaps by using a computer to help other farmers market crops.

His wife said she is looking for ideas and encouragement, "to see other people have tried it (diversification) and that it works. Maybe they have hints for us," she said.

Robert Morrow, of Webb, Miss., was attending the conference with his brother-in-law, splitting up their schedule so that they could sit in on as many sessions as possible.

"Today, the more diversified you can become without becoming too stretched out, the better off you are," said Morrow, who raises cotton, soybeans, rice, milo, wheat and crayfish.

Not only farmers were in the audience.

Roger Zuehl, manager of agricultural advertising for Case IH, the farm equipment maker, said he was watching for clues to changes in farm practices that could affect his company.

Library reorganizes administration to avoid updating system in future

By KELLI CARR
Collegian Reporter

Farrell Library is undergoing organizational changes to create a system that will not need updating for at least five years.

The library now operates with three administrative units, Administrative Services, Public Services and Technical Services.

"We are realigning these three areas — not increasing them — so not to increase the number of administrators," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

Administrative Services oversees the official administrative functions of the library from Hobrock to department heads and staff.

Public Services includes all departments and functions of the library that provide services to users of the library, Hobrock said. An example of the work Public Services does for the library is Library Development Services, which has been created to seek support from sources outside the library and the University, he said.

The area of Technical Services will become Computer and Technical Services. Hobrock said the library administration realizes the overall computer operations of the library need to be expanded. The current system is not expandable to handle all new and current acquisitions.

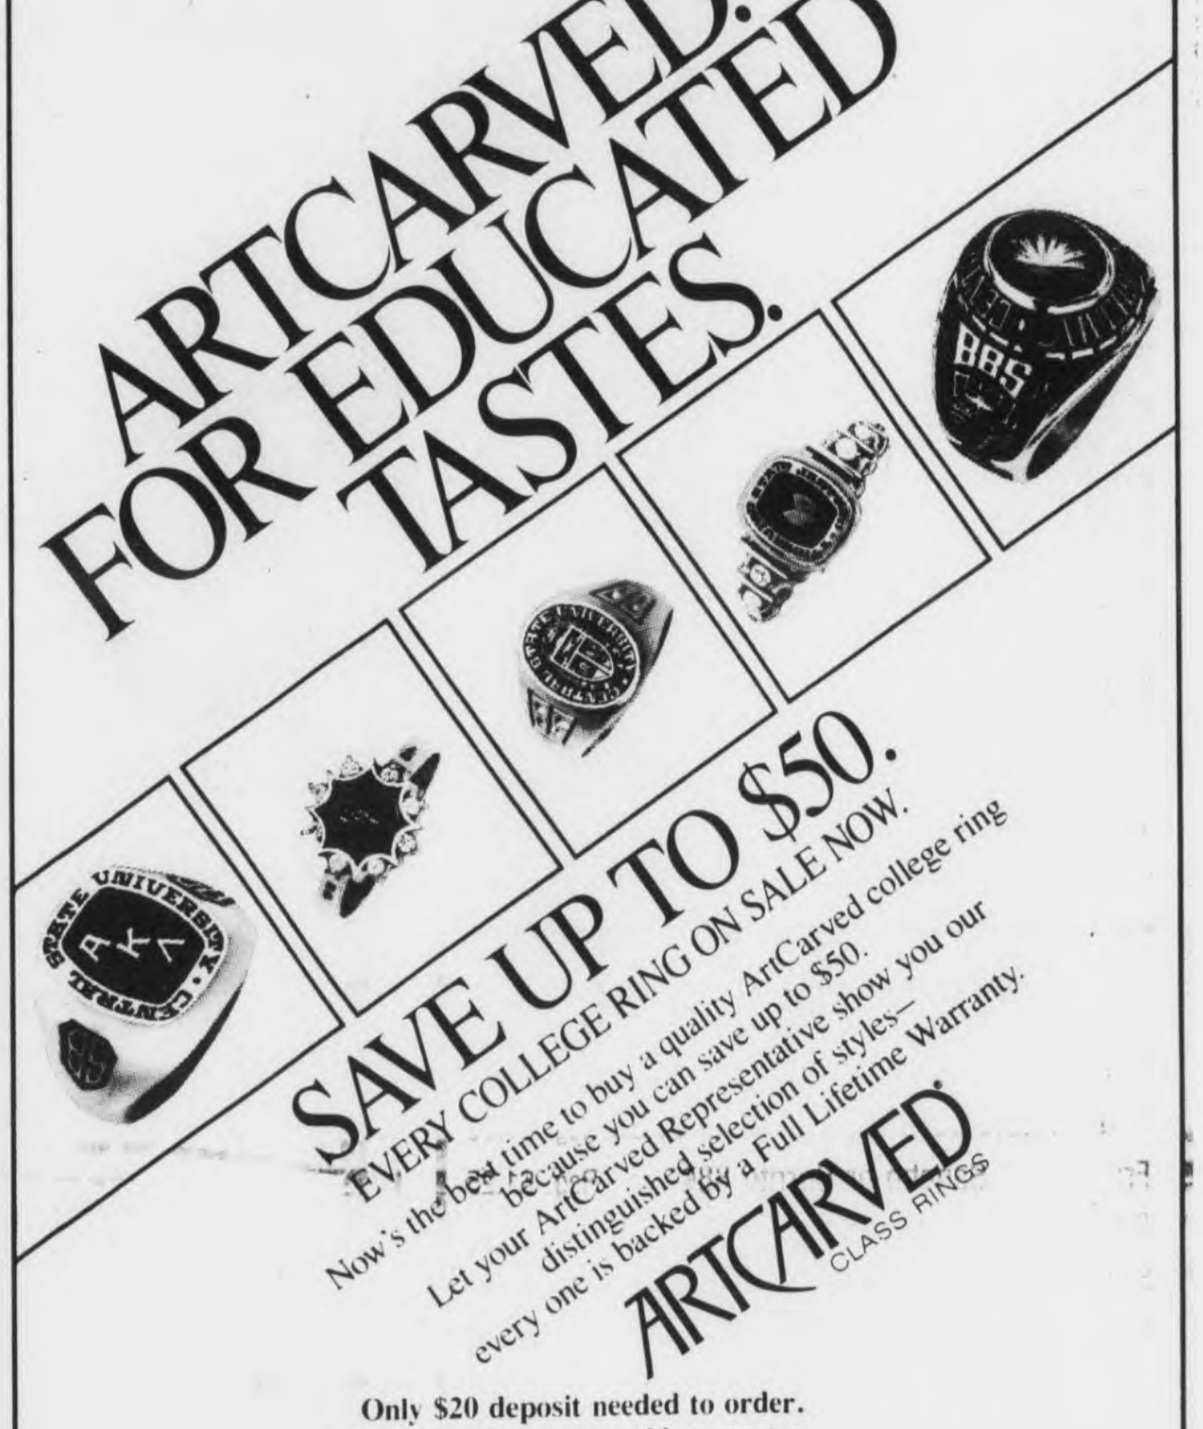
"Ultimately, we want to develop an on-line catalog that would have tremendous impact on students," Hobrock said. The on-line catalog would allow replacement of card catalogs by computer terminals, making access to catalog materials available inside and outside of the library with the use of a telephone and a microcomputer.

Hobrock said the library hopes to implement organizational changes by Jan. 19, 1987.

"(The) physical changes probably won't occur until summer, being ready for fall of '87," he said.

One of the physical changes anticipated is to create more high-quality study areas for students and to increase the number of study spaces. Currently, there are a little more than 900 study spaces in Farrell. Hobrock said the written standards for size needed for K-State's student body calls for about 4,000 seats.

Other physical changes include integrating the microformat collections with current periodicals and integration of documents and reference materials with general reference materials.



"The overall objective of these changes is to achieve a more integrated organization of the library," Hobrock said.

About 200,000 printed volumes have been moved to Nichols Hall to make space in the library. The library is adding print volumes at about 45,000 per year, leaving room on present library shelves for about four to five years of growth, he said.

"We are trying to plan for book collections until 1995. After that, we will be out of space," Hobrock said.

"The effects of these changes, both organizational and physical, should be largely beneficial to students."

'Holey cows' offer 'useful' opportunity for digestive studies

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

K-State owns some holey cows. They're not the holy cows of Hindi worship. The cattle are holey because they have been fistulated.

A fistulated animal is one with an opening from the skin into a hollow organ or internal passage. The hole is surgically made and generally permanent. In cattle, fistulas are usually placed in the rumen (a large, fermenting stomach) and less commonly in the intestines or the esophagus.

Most of about 40 fistulated cattle at K-State are used for research in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry. The Department of Agronomy also has had several fistulated cattle and bison for range management research.

Although putting a hole several inches in diameter in the animal's side may sound like a long, painful process, the operation only takes about half an hour, said Tom Avery, assistant professor of surgery and medicine.

"The rumen is right against the body wall," Avery said. "We anesthetize the animal with a regional anesthetic, which blocks the nerves going to that area. We give a regional anesthetic and do a muscular spread, then suture the rumen to the skin. We then place the cannula — the plastic plug — in the hole."

What the plug does, he said, is to keep the hole sealed somewhat. "You can't keep a lot of pressure on living tissue or it dies," he said.

Cannulas in the rumen are made of a rubbery material and contain a removable plug. Rumen cannulas are large enough that a human arm can fit through them. Esophageal cannulas are stainless steel with a rubber coating.

Bob Cochran, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, said fistulated cattle aren't in any pain, but they are treated differently than other cattle.

"Those animals are treated with the greatest of care. They are really babied along," Cochran said. "We gentle them down, curry them. We feed them range cubes by hand.

He said the animal can function as normal once fistulated. And the cannulas do not cause any apparent harm.

"We use these animals to predict the amount of forage actually being grazed, to describe the chemical composition of the digesta and also to describe the type of plants being selected by the animals," Cochran said.

To conduct this type of research, rumen-fistulated cattle are put in a pasture to graze for a fixed period of time. At intervals, the cattle are gathered off the pasture. Their cannulas are removed so a researcher can reach into the rumen and collect digested material.

Cannulas in the esophagus can be removed to measure feed intake. When the plug is pulled out of the esophagus, researchers hang a bag around the cow's neck to catch any food passing through the mouth on its way to be digested.

Once the digested material is collected, it is analyzed in Call Hall laboratories. Liquid portions are tested for products of fermentation, such as volatile fatty acids and rumen ammonia nitrogen.

In another study, animal scientists will measure feed intake and rate of food passage through the digestive system as a part of beef cattle performance in the winter.

"Voluntary intake has a great effect on the performance of an animal," Cochran said. "Understanding basic concepts such as rate of passage can help us determine what would be a good winter supplement for beef cows.

"We use cannulated animals in conjunction with other intact animals that we're measuring gross performance on. We're using these animals to better understand the response to our treatments."

Avery and Cochran said fistulas have been a part of agricultural research for about 40 years. However, Cochran said, the practice has been used more frequently in the past 15 years.

"Agricultural research is tending toward trying to explain why we see the responses we do in terms of animal performance. In order to do that, we need to be more precise than in terms of just weighing an animal," Cochran said.

Adding cannulas in certain digestive organs of cattle help animal scientists obtain and quantify their data.

"These techniques have allowed us the opportunity to develop more efficient systems. It allows you to apply agriculture from a more technological basis," Cochran said. "Rather than standing back and looking at gross animal performance, we're able to look at nutrient degradation. Hopefully, we'll end up increasing the efficiency of ag systems."

Fistulated cattle, although useful for research, also serve other needs at the University, such as in the College of Veterinary Medicine, which keeps a fistulated cow for rumen fluid transfusions.

Avery said most feedlots have at least one fistulated cow for rumen reinoculations. Rumen fluid can be removed through the animal's cannula and inserted into another rumen.

"Longterm, broad-spectrum antibiotic usage can really damage the microbial production in the rumen so the animal doesn't have good rumen fermentation," Avery said.

Fistulated cattle at the veterinary college also are used to help teach students rumen anatomy.

Veterinarians at the college place cannulas in clients' cattle with esophageal and mouth problems several times a year, Avery said.

"Anything that prohibits an animal from feeding normally, but we think we can heal up over time, we go ahead and fistulate them and feed them through the plug," he said. "The rest of the digestive tract is intact. It's been fairly successful."

Drug companies use fistulated animals to test feed additives, Avery said. For example, a researcher for the company can remove a bolus and weigh it to test its breakdown over time.

Fistulation also can be achieved on humans for medical reasons.

"People that have digestive problems for whatever reason — cancers — have unnatural openings to let material bypass," Avery said.

Rodeo team rides past financial burden to excel nationally

By JADA ALLERHEILIGEN
Collegian Reporter

Despite the lack of funding from the University, one of K-State's sports teams has continued to excel at the national level — the rodeo team.

This past year, two individuals from the rodeo team attended the national competition. And this year, chances are favorable that the entire men's team will attend.

The K-State rodeo program is structured around two groups of individuals: the supportive club members and the actual participants.

"The club members who don't participate in the events are our active supporters and the manpower to make a rodeo go off," said Neal Woollen, rodeo team coach and instructor of pathology.

"They are in charge of the behind-the-scene action of making the rodeo take place," Woollen said. "They take care of promoting the event and lining up the people and supplies.

"The rodeo is a small business organization with a large cash flow. The rodeo brings in a lot of money, but there are also many major expenses."

The rodeo program receives no funding from the University, forcing participants to pay their own expenses.

"A typical weekend will cost around $125 to $150," said Jeff Brecheisen, junior in speech and rodeo participant.

"The rodeo costs $35 (per) event, and then there are extra expenses of gas, hotel and food to be added," Brecheisen said.

The costs per participant for the entire season must be multiplied by 10 — the number of rodeos one can attend — to get a true reflection on expenses incurred by team members.

In addition to the cost of rodeo trips, the participants must pay club fees of $15 per year, plus membership fees of $100 to the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association.

"If an individual wants a good shot at going to the College National Finals Rodeo held in Bozeman, Mont., in June, he or she should attend all 10 rodeos," Woollen said.

The 10 rodeos are held within the team's region. The K-State team's region is the Central Plains Region, comprised of 25 schools from throughout Kansas and Oklahoma.

From the 10 rodeos, each individual can count five to be ranked natonally. Each event is worth 120 points, allowing a maximum of 600 points to be collected.

"Currently, the K-State men's team is ranked 12 points out of second place in their region," Woollen said. "For the entire team to go to nationals, the team has to be in the top two."

The events for the men's and women's competitions vary. The men have six events: team roping, bareback riding, saddlebronc riding, bull riding, calf roping and steer wrestling.

The women's events consist of team roping, barrel racing, breakaway calf roping and goat tying.

At each rodeo, the contestants compete against other individuals, and a big part of their success lies on the draw.

"A draw is simply picking a chip from out of a hat that is already matched by the rodeo secretaries and judges with an animal," Woollen said.

He determined the draw as being one of the items that indicates a sense of togetherness and teamwork among the rodeo participants.

"In the sense of a draw, direct opponents will help each other out," he said.

"If a bull is really bad, they'll warn their competitor, because there's that element of danger," Woollen said.

Another major part of the rodeo team is the practice time, which is done independently.

"I like to see the participants practice at least two days a week, plus extra time spent on physical conditioning," he said.

"An average week for myself consists of three nights a week at the Manhattan Roundup Club Arena for one to three hours," said Jack Davis, junior in animal sciences and industry and rodeo participant.

"The rodeo team's major hurdle is we are not an NCAA-sanctioned sport. Therefore, we receive no funds from the University," Woollen said.

"If we had a funded program, we could add recruitment options, such as scholarships," he said. "And because of our location, we could also have national championship caliber."

PROPEL YOUR CAREER TO THE TOP IN NUCLEAR PROPULSION.

Officers in today's Nuclear Navy develop their talents working with some of the most sophisticated equipment in the world. The Navy operates over half of the nuclear reactors in the U.S. Being the best in nuclear engineering takes a lot of talent and the hands-on experience the Navy provides.
As a nuclear propulsion officer candidate, you can earn $1,000 a month starting your junior year in college. Plus you get a $4,000 bonus upon acceptance and enlistment into the program, and another $2,000 when you complete your Navy studies.
After college graduation, you receive a year of graduate level education. And you get the responsibility, respect and experience that can take you to the top of one of America's high-tech industries.
And, as a Navy officer, you get exceptional benefits and a solid salary that can grow to $44,000 after ..ve years.
To qualify, you must be working toward, or have earned, a bachelor's degree and be a U.S. citizen between 19 and 25 years of age. You must also have completed a minimum of one year each of calculus and calculus-based physics with a "B" average or better.
Start your career at the top. And lead the adventure as a Navy officer. Call Navy Management Programs at 1-800-821-5110. There's no obligation. Or send transcripts to:

Wichita State elects to end football

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The financially troubled Wichita State University football program was suspended indefinitely Tuesday by WSU President Warren Armstrong, who said he had to stem the rising tide of red ink.

Armstrong said at a news conference he made the difficult decision because of deficit spending for football and recommendations of a consulting company that has been studying the athletic department since April.

The consultant, Synergos, Inc., of Reston, Va., recommended suspension of the football program to protect other sports and rescue WSU's athletic department from "the constant fear of imminent financial disaster."

The action would make it possible for the school to preserve a broad-based offering of other intercollegiate sports at competitive levels, the consultant report said.

"In the end analysis, there is no other alternative but to drop football at Wichita State University for an undetermined period of time," the report said.

Armstrong said he will appoint a task force by Jan. 1 to study what role, if any, football will have at WSU in the future. He said the task force would report its findings in 1989.

Synergos found boosters would have had to contribute $3.6 million to save the program. About $2.5 million of that would have gone to debt retirement while the remaining $1.1 million would be needed for improving funding for the football program and its facilities.

Attempts were made to raise the money, Armstrong said. The same lack of financial, personal, emotional and psychological support that put the program in the red appeared to contribute to WSU booster reluctance to provide donations, he said.

"There were no specific reasons that I can give you category by category," Armstrong said. "There was just a general disbelief that the program could become self-sustaining."

University spokesmen said the football program lost $839,000 this year. It had $667,000 in revenues and about $1.5 million in expenses.

That left the Intercollegiate Athletic Association, the organization that handles most financial affairs for WSU sports, $400,000 in the red.

Armstrong said the association's plight is bad enough that it may soon have to borrow money just to meet its payroll. With the suspension of football, operating surpluses can be used to retire debts, the consultant report said.

WSU Athletic Director Lew Perkins said head coach Ron Chismar has been offered an administrative position. His potential duties haven't been worked out, Perkins said.

Armstrong said scholarship commitments to football student-athletes would be honored and the school will assist players who want to try to transfer to other schools. The consultant report said because of WSU's lack of success on the football field, it is unlikely the majority of the players will get scholarship offers from other colleges.

Average attendance at Shocker games this season was less than 9,700 a game, the second-lowest figure since Cessna Stadium opened in 1969.

K-State's schedule left without game

By The Collegian Staff

Wichita State's choice to drop football not only left the state of Kansas with one less major college football program, it left K-State's 1987 football schedule one game short.

The Wildcats and Shockers were scheduled to play Sept. 5 in Wichita State's Cessna Stadium. The Shockers' cancellation of the contract leaves K-State currently opening their 10-game schedule against Iowa Sept. 19 in Iowa City.

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis said he was notified by Shocker athletic officials Monday that Wichita State would not be competing in football next season. He immediately began a search for a replacement and said he hopes to sign a contract with a team, possibly off of WSU's schedule, next week.

"Right now, we're trying to

K-State reaps benefits from 3-point shot

By TIM FITZGERALD

Monday night's K-State-Grand Canyon game was a vivid example of what has become a very hot issue in college basketball — the three-point field goal.

Lining up on either side of the issue are purists, who believe baskets should be counted as one or two points and never as three, and the progressives, who believe it was time for college basketball to grow into an exciting game in which the little man plays an important role.

One thing seems clear: most purists and progressives believe that if there is to be a three-point field goal, it is much too close at its present distance.

Even the 19-foot, 9-inch distance seems a bit too close in the players' eyes. In Monday's game, K-State junior-college transfers Mitch Richmond and William Scott went 6 for 8 and 5 for 7, respectively, from outside the three-point line.

That's a lot of points for hitting a 20-foot jumper — a shot most college guards find as a "drop in the bucket."

"I think the three-point line is too close," said the 6-5 Richmond, who came to K-State after being named a first-team juco All-American at Moberly (Mo.) Junior College. "Sometimes it can help a team or it can hurt them. I think the line should be at least 22 feet."

'I had no idea they were three-pointers; I just shot them. I like the three-pointer, but I think it's too close.'

— K-State guard William Scott

Scott, a 6-2 guard who transferred from State Fair (Mo.) Community College, agreed and said he is so comfortable from the distance that he wasn't even aware he was shooting from bonus territory.

"I had no idea they were three-pointers. I just shot them," said Scott, who comes from the same Sedalia, Mo., juco as Joe Wright, a former Wildcat guard and another efficient outside shooter. "I like the three-pointer, but I think it's too close."

"It will do what it was intended to do — spread the defenses out," said K-State Coach Lon Kruger at the Big Eight Preseason Press Day. And after Monday's game, he hadn't change his tune about the effect the shot has on defenses.

"That's why the rule was put in there," he said. "Every team has its players that can shoot it and, certainly, we're going to take advantage of it."

Other Big Eight coaches agree the three-point shot is good for the game, but the distance remains suspect. The one purist in the group is Iowa State's Johnny Orr.

"I don't know how it ever became a rule. I'm not in favor of the distance and I don't see any reasons for the rule," Orr said.

"I'd like to see it at 21 feet or so," said Kansas' Larry Brown. "Then it would be a risky shot, but it would be a shot you would be rewarded for."

Both Billy Tubbs of Oklahoma and Leonard Hamilton of Oklahoma State said

It would suffice to say that the minute Danny Manning set foot in Lawrence, the basketball fortunes at Kansas skyrocketed.

Manning, the Jayhawks' 6-foot-11 star, has taken the team to heights rarely achieved in Kansas basketball history. The junior forward-center has garnered enough awards in two seasons of Big Eight Conference basketball to fill even the largest campus dorm rooms.

In just two seasons under head coach Larry Brown's tutelage, Manning has reaped Big Eight Newcomer of the Year and the conference Player of the Year and National Freshman of the Year awards. He was picked the outstanding player in the 1986 Big Eight Postseason Tournament and NCAA Midwest Regional. And he was second-team All-America and a finalist for both the Wooden and Naismith Awards, given annually to the nation's top collegiate player.

The fact that Manning is even in Lawrence — or the Big Eight for that matter — is a true recruiting artifice by Brown. Brown hired Manning's father, Ed, whom he played with in the old American Basketball Association, as an assistant. Ed Manning gladly gave up his seat in the truck driving industry for a seat on Brown's bench, where he could keep an even keener eye on his son's progress.

Brown will tell you he never would have gotten a foot in the Mannings' North Carolina front door had Ed not been asked to join the Jayhawk staff. Manning was locked in the middle of a fierce recruiting war between Atlantic Coast Conference rivals North Carolina and North Carolina State.

The rest is history.

Manning has increased 10 pounds from last season to 220 in anticipation of packed zone defenses and increased scoring responsibilities that Brown placed on him this year because of the young supporting cast around him.

"If you look at our team chemistry last year, you can see that everybody had to take a back seat," the reticent Manning said. "I hope to take the front seat this year. I want to be a team leader and have the others follow me.

"I'm not so sure if my role is going to change this season. It will just be more visible. The team is counting on me to score more points this year."

Manning's soft-spoken demeanor off the court has sometimes affected his play on the court, prompting Brown to say during his freshman campaign that he wished Manning would take a more affirmative role on the court.

"I think I made a mistake two years ago by saying he needs to assert himself," Brown said. "I read that (in the media) like I read I'm leaving. Well, I'm still here and a lot of the people (the media talks) to are gone now."

Manning has come out of the starting gate this season showing he is more than capable of carrying the Jayhawks to even higher fortunes. He poured in 26 points during the team's opening night thrashing of Tennessee-Martin and chipped in another 21 Monday night in Kansas' victory over Southern, both game-high totals.

Manning entered the season amid speculations that he couldn't carry the offensive brunt for KU and may be in for a downfall after suffering a knee injury during a pickup game last spring in Allen Field House. The injury caused Manning to miss the World Games and other summer tournaments.

"The doctor assured me that everything was fine and I have approached practices and the season that way," he said.

Exactly when Manning will leave Lawrence is another question. Talk has speculated that "the next 'Magic' Johnson" will opt to leave the Lawrence campus after this season for the bright lights of the National Basketball Association, where he is guaranteed to be the top choice. Manning, however, is giving no indication.

"I'm not thinking about next year," Manning said. "I just have to go out and play the best I can and hope we have a terrific season."

Whenever Manning elects to move from the conference to the NBA, one can rest assured there will be seven coaches heaving a sigh of relief.

Manning, however, said basketball is not the only thing that occupies his time away from school, although he is well aware that the sport is his meal ticket to financial security. Manning said he and his father don't even discuss basketball at home. "We try to leave most of the basketball at the fieldhouse," he said.

"It's good that people care," Manning said, "but wherever you go in Lawrence, people recognize everybody on the team. That is good because it shows our success, but it does bother me sometimes.

"I like to do what other college students do — go out and have fun, go to the bars with friends. I have other interests besides basketball."

Manning's No. 1 interest now is to show his critics, and Brown, he is capable of leading Kansas back to postseason play, where the spotlight and pressure will be riding atop his 6-11 shoulders.

Shockers' decision makes one realize importance of success

In one fell swoop Tuesday, Wichita State moved into the second class of Kansas' funded four-year schools.

Now, before those of you in the academic world get your protractors in a tizzy, I'll just say "calm down." Read what I have to say — then write your nasty letters.

Granted, universities are established on academic principles. But unfortunately, that is not why many students select their institution of higher learning.

Prestige — that's the key. That's why a great engineer might go to MIT and a great scholar might go to Yale. But the state of Kansas has no institutions that near the academic prestige of those institutions, and none ever will.

No matter how much work an administration pumps into the academic side of its school, academic prestige is slow in coming.

The University of Texas is a perfect example. For years, Texas has been pumping cash into its academic programs, and just now, it is getting a prestigious academic image within the common American household.

As Governor-elect Mike Hayden's education spending cuts point out, highly prestigious academic programs are far from happening at any of Kansas' four-year universities.

Athletics is a short cut to national fame, glory and the hearts of numerous potential students.

The University of Kansas has been catapulted into the national spotlight by a winning basketball program and their enrollment has increased with this fame.

It is hard to prove the relation, but if one would go about the state and nation and ask the average high-school student what they know of KU, you would rarely hear of academic branches of the school.

You would hear about so much basketball you would find it difficult to calculate.

Wichita State's football program was not successful — something which should sound familar to K-State fans. But it existed, and now it doesn't.

Bad PR — who wants to go to a school which is on the retreat?

Suddenly, WSU is lacking the name recognition that accompanies even a losing football program.

Never fear, what happened to Wichita State probably will never happen at K-State. Athletic Director Larry Travis said, following WSU's announcement, that the prestige of K-State's Big Eight Conference membership will prevent that occurrence.

"We've been playing football a long time. The Big Eight is one thing that we do have that they didn't, because there are certain benefits (WSU) was not able to realize," Travis said. "We'll keep working until we get it there."

The "there" in Travis' dreams are in the land of the victor. He knows what winning on the football field will do for this University's enrollment.

Until then, K-State is guaranteed one thing — it will remain one class above the failed football program at Wichita State.

accounts of the leaders of the Contras. It wasn't us funneling money to them. This was another country."

Shamir said on Israel radio Tuesday that, whatever Reagan said, Israel would not change its declaration that it had nothing to do with the rebels "because that is the truth."

Peres professed to be "shocked" by the allegations of Israeli involvement in transferring funds, which he called "complete falsehood."

"Israel has no connection with the Contras in Nicaragua," the foreign minister added in remarks Monday night to a closed session of his Labor Party that were quoted by newspapers and Israel radio.

The arms sales to Iran caused much less stir in Parliament than in the U.S. Congress, but left-wing legislators have demanded an explanation of the alleged Contra connection.

A report in Haaretz newspaper said Shamir cabled Secretary of State George P. Shultz repeating his statement of last week that Israel "passed no money to the Contras."

Other Israeli officials refused to discuss the issue and indicated they were awaiting an explanation of Reagan's remarks. "We're trying to give him a way to quietly step out of it," one said, on condition that his name not be used.

Budget

currently pays the difference between the Medicaid reimbursement rates and Medicare rates but under the budget reduction plan, the state will pay only the lower Medicaid rate.

— Changing forumlas for reimbursment of adult care facilities, which will result in a $1.8 million savings.

— Slashing the state's welfare reimbursement rate to health care providers such as doctors, pharmacists and home health care services by 10 percent for a $1.5 million savings.

— A 10 percent reduction in the amount the state pays for housekeeping services for elderly and handicapped people, for a savings of $600,000. Another 600,000 in cuts would come from a 10 percent reduction in all state foster care payments.

— Cutting the number of paid holidays from five to two per year for employees of all state hospitals and youth centers.

they think it is an option a coach will love if he's got the talent and despise if he doesn't.

"I like it better than I thought I would," Tubbs said.

"I think you like the rule if you have the shooters and you don't if you don't," Hamilton said. "I'm neither for or against it; we're just going to play with it."

"I like the three-point play in college basketball," said first-year Nebraska coach Danny Nee. "This gives the little man more effect at the end of the game. It will affect my coaching philosophies and will affect most coaches.'"

Missouri Coach Norm Stewart already has discovered what the shot can do to a coach's philosophy. His Tigers were miserably outshot from three-point range when they competed in the Silversword Classic in Hawaii last week.

"The fans will love it," Stewart said. "But I'm not sure it's not going to take the rest of my hair."

Schedule

schedule a makeup game with someone else," Travis said. "We're trying to bring someone else here because we only have five home football games next year."

Travis said that at this late date, it is most likely only a team that was also scheduled to meet Wichita State would be available to be scheduled.

K-State's remaining non-conference schedule after the Iowa game has the Wildcats playing Sept. 26 against Army and Oct. 3 against Tulsa, both at home. The original schedule included an open date on Sept. 12.

Wichita State's dropped schedule included home dates with Lamar (Sept. 12), Austin Peay (Sept. 19), Tennessee Tech (Oct. 3), Southwest Texas State (Oct. 17), California State-Fullerton (Oct. 24) and Tulsa (Nov. 7).

The Shockers' road schedule had contests at Arkansas (Sept. 25), Florida (Oct. 3), Cincinnati (Oct. 31) and Southern Mississippi (Nov. 14).

Fire

caused by hot water heaters.

He said the chances of this kind of fire occurring are 20 to 30 times greater in a mobile home than in a house. The main reasons for the increased hazard are walls made of aluminum or steel and the position of the water heater on the outside wall rather than in an insulated basement.

Petty said heaters near an external wall aren't protected from cold air and must kick on more often to maintain heat.

Mobile home owners can decrease the problem by putting insulation around their water heaters, he said.

Brown had no idea a mobile home could burn so quickly and said owners should be aware of the risk. The incident won't prevent him from purchasing another mobile home in the future, he said.

"This wasn't enough to make me not live in a mobile home," he said.

Brown said he feels fortunate he was not asleep at the time of the fire because his bed was near the water heater.

"I just consider myself lucky I was awake, got my books and the dog," he said. "It could have been a whole lot worse."

particularly in the upper reaches of the CIA.

"What we're trying to figure out is exactly who knew what about the arms and Contras and when they knew it. It's a process of trying to track the internal workings of the intelligence community."

Both sources said the operation run by Marine Lt. Col. Oliver W. North apparently was outside of the normal intelligence chain of command, even though that chain already is highly compartmentalized.

"We learned a great deal today," Durenberger said as the committee ended its work for the day. He said he "fully expects" that Poindexter will return.

Republican congressional leaders praised Reagan for moving decisively to end the disarray wrought by the Iranian arms sales disclosures. Democrats, too, applauded his decision to seek an independent counsel. But lawmakers argued about whether investigations now under way, or planned, should be merged under the umbrella of a select committee — as was done in the Watergate period.

Members of both parties said, however, they were pleased with Carlucci's appointment. Since Poindexter's resignation Nov. 25, Alton Keel has been serving as Reagan's national security adviser on an acting basis.

In the four-minute speech from his desk, Reagan assured the nation: "If illegal acts were undertaken, those who did so will be brought to justice. If actions in implementing my policy were taken without my authorization, knowledge or concurrence, this would be exposed and appropriate corrective steps will be implemented."

The fast-moving chain of events began with Sen. Richard Lugar's demand that White House chief of staff Donald T. Regan and CIA Director William Casey resign.

Lugar, R-Ind., outgoing chairman of Senate Foreign Relations Committee and usually an ally of the president, said that U.S. foreign policy was "badly crippled" by the widening controversy.

There was no immediate indication that Regan or Casey would quit.

Other GOP figures, including Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas, offered backing for the embattled Regan, accused by congressional critics of mismanaging the White House.

"I don't see that it would serve any purpose at this time to have Don Regan leave," Dole said.

Meanwhile, White House spokesman Dan Howard said he could not confirm that Marine Lt. Col. Oliver W. North had taken the Fifth Amendment, refusing to answer several questions Monday during an appearance before the Senate panel.

North, an aide to Poindexter on the National Security Council, was fired by Reagan for his role in the funneling to Nicaraguan resistance forces of profits from the sales of U.S. arms to Iran.

Reagan had been prodded by Republicans and Democrats alike to seek an independent counsel to dig into the scheme in which up to $30 million from the sale of arms to Iran was diverted to Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

"This morning, Attorney General Meese advised me of his decision that his investigation has turned up reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation by an independent counsel would be appropriate," the president said.

"Accordingly...I immediately urged him to apply to the court here in Washington for the appointment of an independent counsel," Reagan added.

At a news conference minutes later at the Justice Department, Meese announced "we are proceeding to make that application" for a special counsel. But he declined to be more specific than that.

Meese defended himself against criticism that he waited too long to call the FBI and the Justice Department's criminal division into the case, and that he had unnecessarily delayed the decision to seek an independent counsel.

In his speech, announced just an hour before Reagan went before television cameras, he vowed that "no area of the NSC's (National Security Council) staff activities will be immune" from a separate review by a special three-member panel he named, which will be headed by former Sen. John Tower, R-Texas.

North pleads Fifth Amendment in Iran arms deal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan's former national security adviser refused Wednesday to give Congress details of the secret sale of weapons to Iran or the diversion of profits to Nicaraguan rebels. Vice President George Bush conceded that the spiraling controversy has harmed the administration, saying, "Clearly mistakes were made."

Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter became the second recently-departed administration official to invoke the Fifth Amendment in declining to answer questions from the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., vice chairman of the committee, vowed that lawmakers would piece together the facts "with or without them," and other committee members said that unspecified Cabinet secretaries will be called to the panel's heavily guarded room to testify.

While Congress continued delving into the most serious crisis of the Reagan presidency, there was increasing pressure for the departure of Donald T. Regan, the president's powerful chief of staff. But

Control of Swiss bank account continues shipment controversy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Contradictions about who controlled a Swiss bank account used to handle undercover aid to Nicaraguan and Afghan rebels added to the confusion Wednesday surrounding the arms-shipment controversy.

President Reagan, who has made some seemingly contradictory statements of his own about the matter, told a group of women entrepeneuers, "Much in this case is hard to understand, though all Americans are entitled to have their questions answered."

Meanwhile, a U.S. government source, speaking on condition he not be identified, said millions of dollars diverted from Ira-

S. Africa jails whites for dissent

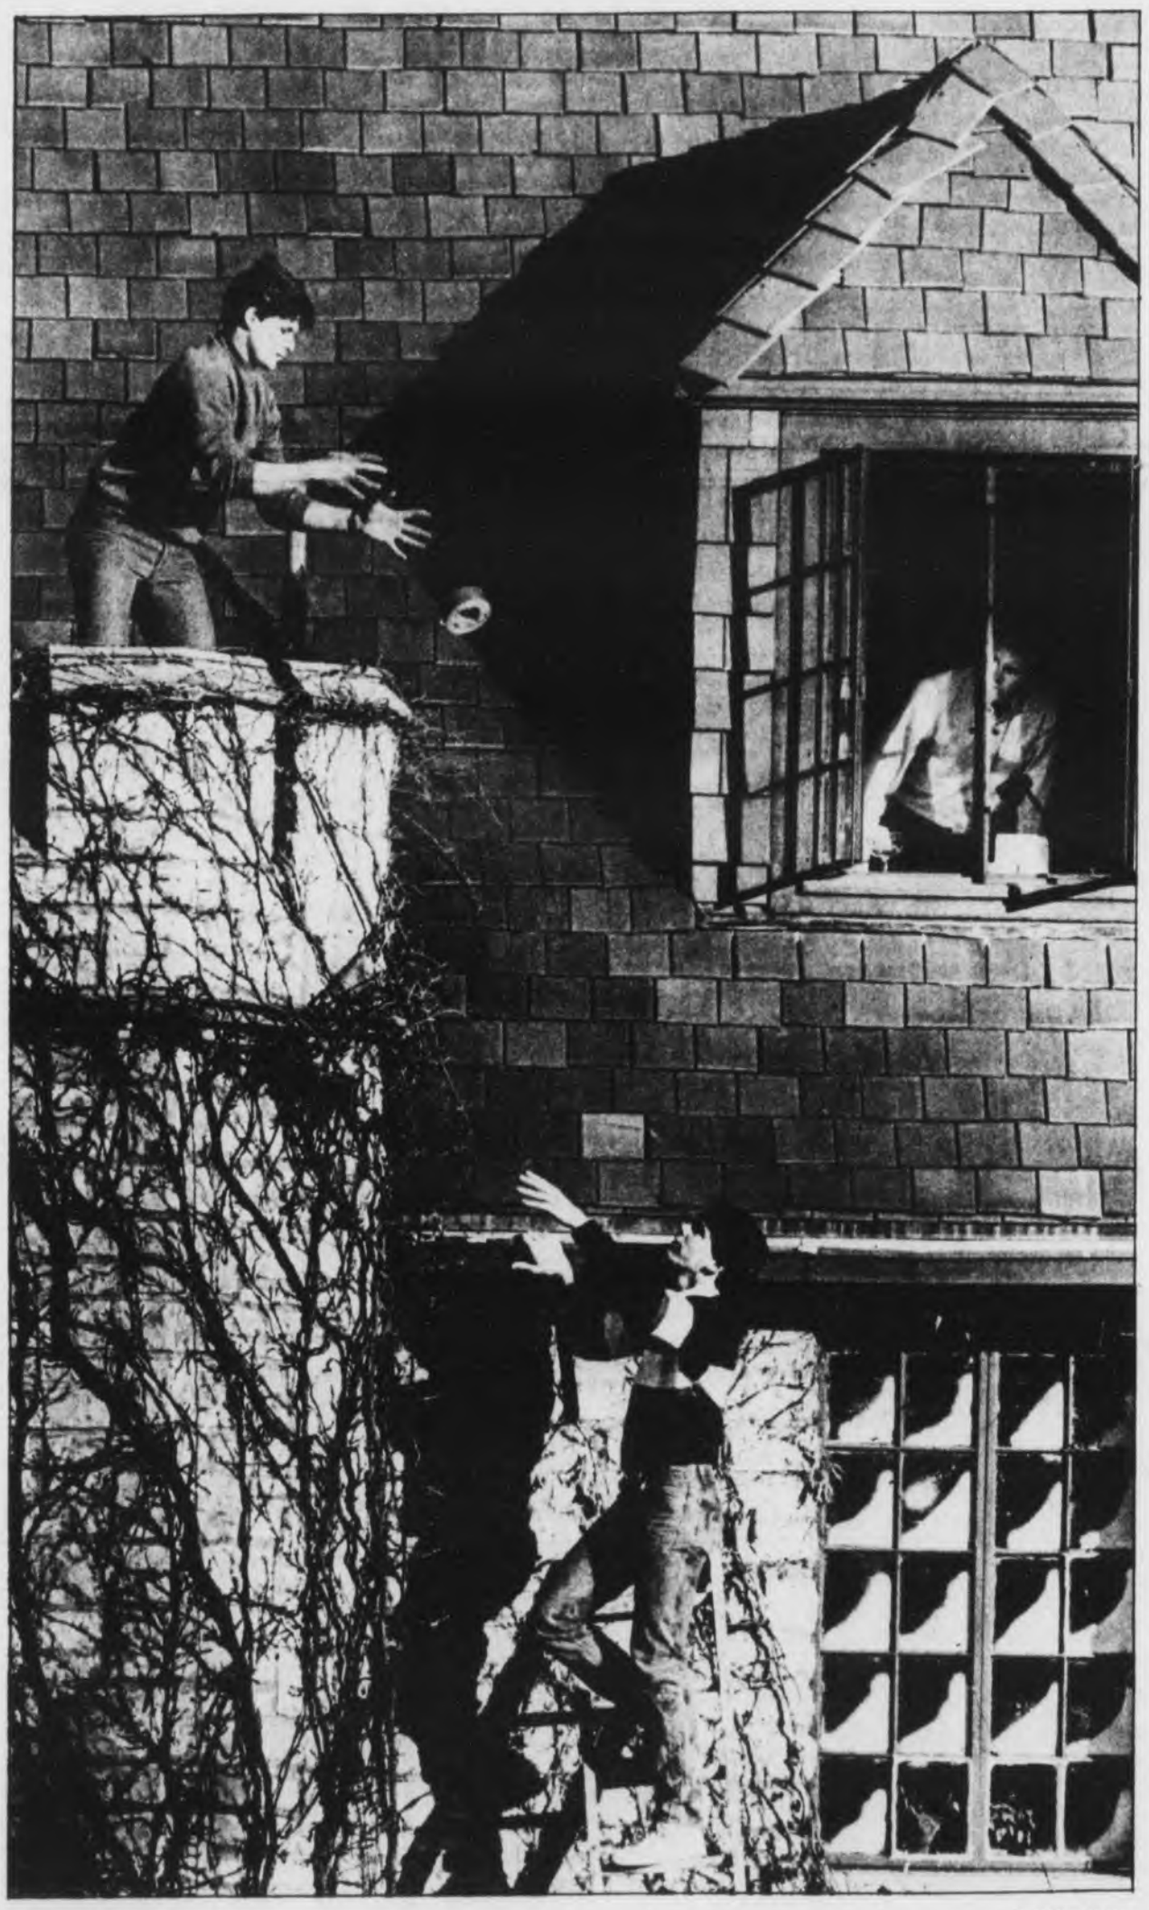
By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — The government has begun a crackdown on white foes of apartheid, detaining more than a dozen without charge and telling others to stop their activities, leaders of the movement said Wednesday.

David Shandler, secretary of the End Conscription Campaign, said security officers picked up 13 of its members in Johannesburg and Cape Town late Tuesday and early Wednesday.

His organization opposes mandatory military conscription for white youths on grounds that many will be assigned to repress residents of rebellious black townships.

'White dissidents are increasingly a target for repressive action as the state attempts to create an illusion of unanimous white support for its policies.'
— Ethel Walt



Anti-apartheid leaders said at least 18 other activists, most of them white, were ordered to halt their involvement in various groups fighting the official race discrimination policy, including End Conscription and the white women's organization Black Sash.

"White dissidents are increasingly a target for repressive action as the state attempts to create an illusion of unanimous white support for its policies," said Ethel Walt, Black Sash chairman for Transvaal Province.

Jan van Eck, a member of Parliament for the opposition Progressive Federal Party, described the action as "a vindictive act by an increasingly oppressive government set upon wiping out by all means at its disposal opposition to the present unjust system."

Monitoring groups say about 20,000 people, most of them blacks, have been detained at some point since a nationwide state of emergency was imposed June 12. The government said in September that more than 9,000 people had been detained for at least 30 days, but it has issued no subsequent figures and does not acknowledge individual detentions.

Under the emergency rules, journalists are not allowed to describe actions of security forces or publish the names of detainees without government permission. They also may not publish "subversive statements."

Emporia State sees decline in services

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — State mandated budget cuts will force Emporia State University to delay hiring administrative personnel and reduce spring and summer course offerings and student services, president Robert Glennen announced Wednesday.

Glennen outlined the school's plans to cut $625,579 from this year's budget, as required by the state to compensate for a $13 million tax-revenue shortfall.

The Kansas Board of Regents ordered its schools to cut 3.8 percent from their budgets and to submit initial proposals for the cuts by Wednesday.

Glennen said that Regents chairman Frank Becker, executive director Stanley Koplik and Regent Donald Slawson will meet with Governor-elect Michael Hayden to discuss the plans.

In a cover letter attached to Emporia's proposal, Glennen said Emporia State had lost $3,110,053 in the last five years to enrollment adjustments and other cutbacks, "which we feel have made our situation especially grave."

Proposed cuts include $175,000 for renovation and repairs to buildings and $130,000 for major equipment or computer purchase or repairs.

Glennen said administrative jobs that are now open will not be filled until next July. Several graduate assistantships also will remain open.

Some spring and summer classes and laboratories will be canceled, he said, and the school may close for Christmas and spring vacations to conserve energy.

Reductions will also be made in student services, athletic expenditures and faculty and administrative travel. Hours will be cut at the William Allen White Library, as will book and periodical purchases, he said.

The Regents will not vote on tuition increases or other system-wide money-saving measures until their December meeting.

Crack popular due to low price, availability

By DENISE URBANEK
Contributing Writer

Crack has made it to Manhattan.

In fact, this drug has been in Kansas for the past two years, said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services.

Crack is cocaine mixed with baking soda and water to form a crystalline substance. It is then cut into chips weighing about a gram each. A single chip sells for $80 to $100, depending on the purity of the cocaine used.

Crack is not hard to find, Arck said.

"You can go down to the bars, go to parties, meet friends, and you'll find it," he said.

Crack has become popular because it is easy to use and is generally cheaper than pure cocaine, Arck said. Users are drawn to the drug because of the sudden, intense "high" it produces. During a high, which may last 20 to 30 minutes, the user feels an exaggerated sense of self-worth and energy. He or she may demonstrate overly aggressive behavior or may appear hyperactive.

A person using crack for an extended period often does not feel the need to eat or sleep, Arck said. This can lead to significant weight loss, health problems, and possibly death. During "down" times the user usually sleeps a lot and is severely depressed.

"Crack is a stimulant," Arck said. "It produces physiological responses similar to those in people who take amphetamines. It affects the cortex of the brain and causes an increase in blood pressure, heart rate, and breathing."

The drug has many other side effects including nausea, vomiting, ringing in the ears, convulsions and paranoia. A long-time user may also experience "coke bugs," the sensation that bugs are crawling all over the body. Overdosing on crack can result in a coma or death.

Whether or not the drug is physically addicting is under debate, Arck said, but there is no doubt that it is psychologically addicting.

"In experiments on animals in controlled laboratory settings, the animals would respond to the euphoric feeling to the point that they would kill themselves trying to get more," Arck said.

Although cocaine and crack use is on the rise, all other drug use in the nation has decreased after reaching a peak in 1979. It has leveled off since then, Arck said. The decline in other

Secretary of state's office not negligent, attorney declares

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An assistant state attorney general told the Kansas Supreme Court Wednesday Secretary of State Jack Brier's office was not negligent in the way it conducted loan searches for a lending company.

Even if it was, it didn't cause the firm to lose $70,000, he said.

"Even if there was any negligence, it was not the cause of the plaintiffs' damages," Leon J. Patton, the assistant attorney general, argued on Brier's behalf in the state's appeal of a Marion County District Court judgment against the secretary of state's office.

The trial court awarded Borg Warner Acceptance Corp. $70,622 in damages because of allegedly defective records searches conducted by the secretary of state's office for the company between 1978 and 1984.

Borg Warner contended Brier's office was negligent in not uncovering a prior loan a Lehigh, Kan., business already had with First National Bank of Hillsboro when it applied for additional loans from Borg Warner.

Under the state's Uniform Commercial Code, business loans are recorded with the secretary of state's office, and if a debtor seeks other loans the creditor can ask for a search to determine extent of the debtor's liabilities.

Patton made two main points in defending the secretary of state's office in the appeal.

He said the manner in which the UCC searches were conducted for Borg Warner by Brier's office was normal and competent.

He also said that even if they were negligent, they did not cause the company to lose the $70,266 on the loan.

Patton said the first request for a search was made in 1977 before the UCC was enacted, and another in the summer of 1980 which was at issue in the case was not done negligently.

If other searches were done negligently, Patton contended, the secretary of state's office had no liability because they didn't cause the loss.

Computer loses holiday gift orders

GRANDVIEW, Mo. — The computer gremlins chose the worst possible moment to work their electronic mayhem at a Kansas City area business that sells toys and gifts nationwide.

Harry Lloyd, founder and president of House of Lloyd Inc., said his firm was trying to deal with a 300 percent increase in business in the last year when a computer accidentally obliterated all customer data about five weeks ago. The filling of Christmas orders has been delayed while workers scramble to re-enter information.

"It's been a disaster here as far as getting stuff out," Lloyd said. He hopes to get most merchandise out by mid-December.

House of Lloyds uses a house-party marketing strategy, in which women receive free merchandise for taking mail orders as they entertain guests in their homes. Lines include toys and gifts, Christmas decorations and candles. Lloyd estimates yearly sales at $250 million.

"Anytime, anybody can have their full refund if they just let us know," he said.

The attorney general's office has set up a 24-hour hotline for Lloyd's customers at 816-931-2410. Lloyd said that customers also can mail refund requests to P.O. Box 9999, Kansas City, Mo., 64134.

General Motors to increase layoffs

DETROIT — General Motors Corp. will lay off about 4,500 employees in Michigan and Missouri early next year and reduce production at three assembly plants to avoid offering incentive financing, the automaker said Wednesday.

"It is our intent to maintain dealer inventories in this manner in the hope of avoiding large incentive financing programs," GM Vice President William E. Hoglund said in a written release.

About 2,500 workers will be laid off at the Hamtramck assembly plant Feb. 2, and plants in Oakland County's Orion Township and at Wentzville, Mo., will lose 1,000 workers each to layoffs Jan. 5, GM said.

Last month, GM announced it would close 11 plants in Michigan, Ohio and Missouri, affecting more than 29,000 workers in the next three years. Smith said the move would reduce overcapacity and cut operating losses.

Sheriff reverses segregation order

METAIRIE, La. — A sheriff who instructed his deputies to stop blacks found in white neighborhoods as a way to fight crime backed off from his order Wednesday under accusations of bigotry and threats of lawsuits.

"I think I did make a mistake," said Sheriff Henry Lee of Jefferson Parish in suburban New Orleans. He also apologized to blacks and others whom he might have offended.

But a civil liberties advocate continued to demand the resignation of Lee, who said when he announced the order Tuesday that blacks in a white area are likely "up to no good."

"A public official can't expect to release that kind of poison and expect to be allowed to go on his way and remain in office," said Martha Kegel, Louisiana executive director for the American Civil Liberties Union.

Lee said he changed his mind about the constitutionality of what he had planned after looking at some 1983 civil rights rulings and getting a flood of calls opposed to his plan.

Lee said no blacks were stopped in the 24 hours before he canceled his order, which he said Tuesday was needed to fight a rising wave of street crime.

Suspects plead innocent to killings

BOULDER, Mont. — Two teen-agers pleaded innocent Wednesday to charges they killed the parents of "Dallas" star Patrick Duffy in a robbery last month.

Sean A. Wentz and Kenneth A. Miller, both 19, were arraigned before state District Judge Frank Davis immediately after he agreed to transfer the case from justice court without a preliminary hearing. He set a March 9 trial date.

They are accused of killing Terrence and Marie Duffy on the night of Nov. 18 in the bar owned by the couple.

The Duffys were found dead in the bar about 10 p.m. in what Jefferson County authorities said was a robbery. The Duffys each died of a shotgun blast to the chest.

The youths, who worked as janitors, were arrested later that night in Helena after a brief chase by police.

Davis ordered their bonds continued at $500,000 each and also granted a state motion for a psychiatric examination of Wentz.

They are each charged with two counts of deliberate homicide and robbery as well as assault for allegedly threatening a Boulder-area resident with shotgun shortly before the killings.

If convicted of all three charges, the defendants could face the death penalty or a maximum prison sentence of 250 years apiece, according to Jefferson County Attorney John Connor Jr.

Teacher loses job for showing film

LILLY, Pa. — Despite tearful pleas not to do so, school directors in this Cambria County community voted unanimously to fire a teacher for showing the R-rated horror movie "Carrie" to his seventh-graders as a reward for good work.

The Penn Cambria School Board decided Tuesday not to reinstate Roland Foor, 62, following his suspension with pay on Nov. 18.

Foor, a second-year teacher in the district, said he showed the film to the class this fall to fulfill an agreement to provide a movie for each 30 days of perfect attendance, completed homework assignments and above-average grades.

Foor told the board he fast-forwarded the movie past two sexually explicit scenes.

"Carrie" is about a teen-age girl who uses psychic powers to wreak revenge on a group of students who treated her cruelly.

Anesthetic cures sneezing attacks

BOSTON — A squirt of anesthetic can cure continual sneezing, even for a young woman who went "achoo!" 300 times an hour, a doctor says.

The odd case was recounted by Dr. James T. Sturm of the St. Paul-Ramsey Medical Center in Minnesota in a letter in the New England Journal of Medicine.

A 23-year-old woman went out to dinner with a group of people. During dessert, a drunk pushed ice cream covered with chocolate sauce into her mouth and nose. Unfortunately, the woman was allergic to chocolate.

Immediately she wiped away the chocolate, but to no avail. She couldn't stop sneezing.

By the time doctors saw her, she had been sneezing 300 times an hour for two hours. Sturm reasoned that the sneezing was caused by irritation of the nasal lining and the transmission of nervous signals over the trigeminal nerve to the brain.

His solution: a squirt of cocaine hydrochloride, a topical anesthetic. It worked.

"The sneezing began to abate three minutes after the nasal epithelium was anesthetized and came to a complete stop five minutes later," Sturm wrote. "The patient was observed for 20 minutes, and no further sneezing occurred."

K-State takes career counseling to high schools

By The Collegian Staff

K-State students and alumni have been taking their college and professional experience directly to high school students in five Career Counseling Nights sponsored by Student Alumni Board this semester.

High school students and their parents in Manhattan, Topeka, Wichita, Salina and Hutchinson have had the chance to meet with both current and former K-State students, said Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science and president of Student Alumni Board.

Basically, the program involves "the selling of K-State by people who have already been sold," Bradley said.

The career counseling nights provide prospective students and parents with information on housing options, available activities and making the adjustment from high school to college, Bradley said.

After the opening session, the parents and students are split up into two groups. The parents then receive more specific information on the admission process from an admissions counselor and a presentation by the Financial Assistance Office, Bradley said.

The students break up into small groups by their intended majors. A current K-State student in that major and a graduate who is working in that field present information, give advice and answer questions for prospective students, Bradley said.

The Career Planning and Placement Center also presents information to help students who are undecided about a potential major.

Student Alumni Board tries to have alumni from different academic areas attend the group sessions so there will be a little more personal communication, Bradley said.

Bradley said the program has been successful because it interests high school students in the University, and it takes advantage of valuable resources — K-State students and alumni.

Kansas glistens with holiday traditions

By CAROL LENKNER
Collegian Reporter

From the Swedish festivities in Lindsborg to Santa's helicopter arrival in front of the Capitol in Topeka, the holiday customs in Kansas towns are true slices of Americana.

In Lindsborg, Christmas is regarded as a very festive season, said Dorene Anderson, manager of the Lindsborg Chamber of Commerce.

The town is decorated in a way that reflects the Swedish heritage, she said. Hand-painted banners representing Scandinavian Christmas customs hang from the light poles in downtown Lindsborg. Jul Karve, or bundles of oats, are also hung from the poles as a gift to the birds. The shops are decorated with sparkling white lights and offer a variety of handcrafted items.

On Saturday, Dec. 13, Lindsborg will hold its annual St. Lucia Festival. Since the Middle Ages, the arrival of St. Lucia — wearing a white robe tied with a crimson sash and adorned with a crown of lighted candles — signals the beginning of the Christmas season in Swedish communities.

According to Swedish legend, it was during the Middle Ages that St. Lucia first appeared in Sweden carrying food and drink to hungry folks during the famine. Thus, she serves as the symbol of light and hope for mankind.

Lindsborg celebrates St. Lucia's arrival each year on the second Saturday in December, Anderson said. The St. Lucia character is reenacted by a senior member of the Lindsborg Swedish Folk Dancers.

The festival includes Christmas music, Swedish pastries, a performance by the Lindsborg Swedish Folk Dancers and the crowning of St. Lucia.

"People come from all over to see the festival and visit our town with its Swedish heritage," Anderson said.

In Abilene, the townspeople work together during the Christmas season to provide gifts for children through its Toys for Tots program.

"Every small town may have a Toys for Tots program, but I believe ours is unique," said Ray Powers, of the Abilene Chamber of Commerce.

Charlie Eis, a local resident, has been repairing broken toys donated by people and businesses for several years. The shelves and workbench in his basement are lined with toys. In the last few years, a couple of volunteers have helped him repair the toys, but he does most of the repair work himself, Powers said.

The toys are picked up and taken to the National Guard Armory. Parents can go to the Armory and select toys for their children.

"It's amazing the number of toys we end up with to give to the children," Powers said. "Last year, we actually had a surplus of toys. We called a minister from Salina, and he picked up the toys to give to the children there."

Topeka's Christmas festivities include the Topeka Festival of Carols and a special tree decorating event on the second floor rotunda of the Capitol.

This year's Festival of Carols is the final event in the Governor's celebration of the 125th birthday of Kansas, said Charolette Adair, chairwoman of the festival. The festival is always takes place the Friday after Thanksgiving.

The theme for this year's celebration is "Home for the Holidays." Several famous Kansans have been invited back for the celebration, including Charles "Buddy" Rogers, actor; Sam Ramey, opera singer; and James McCain, former president of K-State.

The governor will present Kansas medallions to the famous Kansans, and a reception in the Judiial Center will honor them.

During the celebration, the governor does a countdown to turn on the Christmas lights. The downtown lights come on and Santa lands in the middle of 10th Street in a helicopter. Santa then goes to his sleigh and distributes presents to the children, Adair said.

In conjunction with the Topeka Festival of Carols, various ethnic groups in Kansas will perform music on the second floor rotunda of the Capitol.

Each ethnic group has a tree decorated to represent its customs, said Nel Richmond. There are trees decorated by the Swedish, German Americans, Irish, Croatians, Volga Germans, Czechs, Hispanics, Greeks and blacks.

"One year, the black community decorated their tree in jazz instruments," Richmond said. "The tree looked very nice with all of the brass ornaments hanging from its limbs."

The Czechs use wheat decorations on their tree, she said. The wheat speaks of harvest and plenty. They believe if a family decorates their tree with wheat, they will have a good wheat harvest.

Croatians use a lot of hearts on their tree. The tree has a lot of lace and colored ribbons, she said.

The Volga Germans use a cottonwood tree with no leaves, but they wrap every limb with cotton batting. When the early settlers arrived in Kansas, there were no fruit trees, so they used the cottonwood as their Christmas tree.

All the ethnic groups use live trees, Richmond said. They also incorporate a table display near their tree showing the Christmas customs of the group. The Swedish always have the customary straw Christmas goat.

The night of the Festival of Carols, all the ethnic groups perform, Richmond said. There is an assortment of music and dance, including bagpipers and the Volga German Oompah dancers from Ellis County.

Local group matches volunteers with jobs

By LAURA HACKLEY
Collegian Reporter

For Linda Spire, volunteerism is one commodity of which there will never be a surplus. Spire is program coordinator of Manhattan's Volunteer Clearinghouse, a program that matches people with an organization or person in need of help.

The Clearinghouse gets calls from volunteers and agencies and, after learning about the needs of each, it can suggest to the volunteer the areas where they are needed most or would do the most good. When a volunteer calls in, the Clearinghouse finds out where that volunteer's interests lie.

If an organization calls in, the Clearinghouse finds out what volunteers are needed to do, how long it will take and how many people it will involve. After the contact is made, a list of agencies that fit their interests is given to the volunteers, and they are responsible for calling the agencies they prefer on the list.

There is a wide variety of agencies that work with the Clearinghouse, including the Riley County Humane Society and the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

Also, Big Brothers and Big Sisters, The Riley County Senior Citizen's Center, The Fone and Crisis Center and U-LearN work with the Clearinghouse. Some organizations, such as the Fone and Crisis Center, require some training before volunteers can work there. The Clearinghouse also places students who enroll in K-State's Introduction to Social Work class in a volunteer situation.

Spire said volunteers are in great demand, but the volunteer opportunities do not require a great amount of time.

"Some elderly people want volunteers to just go for walks or help with the mail or help write letters," Spire said.

Other agencies want a group of people for one project that may take a day or so and require building or maintenance skills. Spire said volunteers are important to a number of people, and these volunteers are recognized during National Volunteer Week each April.

Other areas in which the Clearinghouse is involved include various Christmas projects. One of the projects includes volunteers who read and answer letters written by children to Santa Claus.

Another project is a series of spring workshops which include discussions on volunteerism, board relations, how volunteer time is useful on resumes, and the best way to market an agency and let the community know about volunteers.

Committee chooses K-State senior as 1987 Rhodes scholar candidate

By The Collegian Staff

Kelly Welch, senior in economics and agricultural economics, was selected Wednesday as one of two Kansas candidates for Rhodes Scholarships.

Welch said he learned of being selected as a regional nominee about 5 p.m. Wednesday.

"I'm definitely very anxious about it, and I don't know how it will come out," Welch said. "Everything is coming about all of a sudden."

Welch joins David Mehnert, a Kansas high school graduate from Roeland Park who is currently a senior in English and creative writing at Princeton University, as a Kansas Rhodes scholarship finalist.

Two nominees each from Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota and South Dakota will also be interviewed by a regional selection committee Saturday in Minneapolis.

Welch said he first applied for the scholarship on the K-State level, then was nominated for the state of Kansas level by a selection committee before reaching his present level as regional Rhodes scholarship nominee.

If he is selected as one of four students in the region, he will receive a scholarship to attend Oxford University in London. If selected, he plans to study philosophy, politics and economics.

Welch and Mehnert were selected as nominees over nine other finalists. One other finalist from K-State was Sheila Farrell, senior in life sciences.

Welch said the financial award for being a Rhodes scholar is about $30,000 for living expenses, plus tuition to attend Oxford for either two or three years.

Welch said Nancy Twiss, pre-law adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences and coordinator for both the Marshall and Rhodes scholarship committees, has helped him greatly in preparing for his scholarship interviews on the University, state and regional levels.

"She teaches us very well how to prepare our mind," Welch said.

LEAD THE FIELD.

As a nuclear officer, you could lead the field in nuclear propulsion technology. The Navy operates the most advanced nuclear equipment in the world. Including more than half the nuclear reactors in America. The men who maintain and operate these reactors are among the best.

The Navy is accepting applications from qualified sophomores, juniors and seniors for the prestigious nuclear program. This program pays you $1,000 a month during your junior and senior years. Plus $2,000 upon graduation.

After graduation, as a Navy officer, you receive a year of graduate-level training unavailable anywhere else at any price. You become a highly trained member of an elite group leading the adventure in today's nuclear Navy. And, after five years, you can be earning as much as $44,000.

To qualify, you must be working toward, or have earned, a bachelor's degree and be a U.S. citizen between 19 and 25 years of age. You must also have completed a minimum of one year each of calculus and calculus-based physics with a "B" average or better.

Call the Navy Management Programs Office for information on how to apply. If you'd like to lead the field, join the best in the nuclear field. PLEASE CALL 1-800-821-5110 OR SEND TRANSCRIPTS TO:

Playboy's stereotypes misrepresent K-State

If one can overlook that the report is riddled with half-truths, deception and stereotypes, Playboy magazine's ranking of K-State as the 27th most partying college in the nation is relatively harmless.

More than anything, the magazine's rating of the top 40 party colleges in the United States is a gimmick. Not only will it sell magazines; it will provide cheap, trivial entertainment on the way to the centerfold.

Nonetheless, the report could have strived to be at least a little accurate. Consider what the report said about K-State and its students:

— "The students are hell-raising aggies here to party." Not only is the implication erroneous, but it also does nothing to help the University dispel of its image as a solely agricultural institution. K-State has risen above just being an ag school, and reports such as this do nothing to promote the University as the well-rounded school it is.

— K-State students are "wild Western-campus kids in a half-inch of cow ----." It's relatively safe to say most K-State students don't party in a half-inch of anything, much less a half-inch of the animal excrement Playboy reported they partied in.

— K-State students have "car-ramming riots in the parking lot" after sports events. That's news to nearly everyone in Manhattan, including a 12-year veteran of the city's police department who said he has never heard of that event. Some of the news of the Aggieville disturbance must have filtered to the magazine after being altered by several sources.

— A campus fraternity plays practical jokes on its members by placing mannequins in their beds. The fraternity's president flatly denied that ever happening.

With Playboy constantly emphasizing its in-depth writing and down-playing the nubile females that grace its pages, it's surprising the magazine would choose to publish a report filled with so many errors. We can only assume other universities received the same half-baked treatment.

We'll make a deal with you, Playboy: Don't stereotype us as hell-raising aggies, and we won't stereotype you as a worthless skin magazine.

Reagan blames press for hostage captivity

President Reagan warned the press that if it did not keep quiet about the secret arms shipments to Iran, it would endanger the future release of hostages. How the press could do this is still a mystery.

Was the president worried that sensitive information would fall into the hands of the enemy? If so, the enemy, whoever that might be this week, could just have easily gone to the Soviets, the Iranians or the Syrians for information. After all, they knew about the arms shipments before the American public.

Earlier this week, Reagan insinuated that it was actually the press that was responsible for the hostages' captivity. He said, "We got three people back. We were expecting to get two others. The press has to take responsibility for what they have done."

Is it possible Reagan knows something that he's not telling us? Is it possible that the press, and not Moslem fundamentalists, are behind the disgraceful acts of the Islamic Jihad? How many gun-toting journalists from the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal are running around Lebanon endangering American lives?

Will the U.S. Air Force carry out a surgical strike against the office of the Washington Post, or will the National Security Council decide instead to send arms to an extremist group of journalists led by Dan Rather?

Is the press really to blame, or is this just a lame excuse for a major blunder made by a couple of enthusiastic colonels operating from the basement of the White House?

Bill favors wealthy

Editor,

Tonight Student Senate will vote on a campaign expenditures bill designed to remove all spending restrictions for candidates running for student government offices.

The current limitations are roughly $60 for Student Senate and $600 for student body president candidates.

The bill claims that spending restrictions violate a student's "right to free speech." If we accept the premise of that argument, the restrictions must go. But, since poverty also limits a student's "right to free speech," poverty must also go.

If Student Senate removes spending restrictions, then it will be obligated to find a way to subsidize the candidacy of low-income students. Student Senate must ensure the "right of free speech" for every fee-paying student, and must give every student an equal chance to participate.

The fact is that, until student government is wealthy enough to subsidize candidates, spending restrictions are the only way to give everyone a fair chance.

Speak out against this bill in the open period of the Student Senate meeting at 7 p.m. in the Big Eight room of the K-State Union.

Being governed by the wealthiest students is something this student body can ill afford.

Aggieville solution

Editor,

I have a solution to the Aggieville disturbance problem.

One gentleman suggested that bottled beer not be sold that day. I have come up with an even more radical solution: sell no alcohol at all the entire day, period.

Close the bars but keep the other businesses that do not sell alcohol open. With less alcohol available to be consumed, drunkenness would naturally go down and logically, the irresponsible behavior.

Veto of referendum undemocratic

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

The issue of the week is presidential controversy. First, we have Reagan waging insane foreign policy. This is not new, but it has become more visible in the past week.

Student Body President Steven Johnson seems to be afflicted with some of Reagan's insanity. This week he has shown students that he has the ultimate power over student government by vetoing a bill that would have allowed the students to decide if they like the way they are represented in Student Senate.

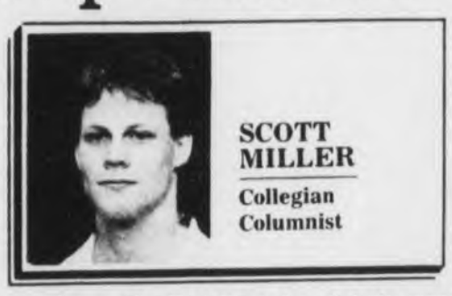
Doesn't Johnson think the voters who elected him are smart enough to vote on an issue? Never in recorded history has a K-State student body president vetoed a referendum bill. In fact, the only piece of legislation ever vetoed by a student body president was a resolution passed by Student Senate a few years ago. That resolution stated an opinion on national policy and was not designed to take action.

What kind of insane reasoning does Jonhson use to justify this veto of the students' right to vote on an issue? For the past couple of days, this newspaper has printed these reasons in columns by Phil Nordhus, a fraternity brother of Johnson, and by Patrick Muir, who is on the president's cabinet. These so-called "reasons" do not stand up to rational analysis and tend to be little more than propaganda.

One of the reasons cited for the veto is that there is nothing wrong ith the current system. Because Student Senators were elected under the current system, they may be unable to see problems in that system. To let a member of student government judge the student government system is a conflict of interest. This is why the students should decide this question, not Johnson.

For there to be a basis for a referendum, there must be some concern about the current system. In this case, there is inequity between living groups represented on Student Senate. Currently, there are 35 senators who are members of greek houses, compared with 11 off-campus senators and only one residence hall senator. Considering that off-campus and residence hall students make up three quarters of the campus population, some questions must be raised about the election procedure. But these questions must be answered by the students, not the student body president.

Supporters of the veto insist they want to give students the best proposal on which to vote. Again, this is a conflict of interest. The reason for the referendum is that Student Senate cannot effectivly criticize its own system. If it could, there would be no need for a referendum.



The idea of forming a task force to study this situation runs into similar problems. It will have Student Senators serving on it, who will have the same conflict of interest already mentioned. And, as a Student Senator serving on the Athletic Fee Task Force, this idea of a task force is ludicrous. All this University needs is another task force without a clear mission or direction.

Mike Kadel, chief of staff under Johnson, told sponsors of the bill he would like to see a task force study the question for an entire year. What are they going to study? Johnson has never pointed out a part of the bill he dislikes. He said he wants to send the students the best proposal possible, yet he has no idea of what a better proposal would be. For the president to veto this bill to allow more study (Student Senate worked on this for four weeks, twice the usual time) and not have any objections to the question itself sounds more like a stalling tactic than good politics.

This task force may not be needed anyway. The sponsors of the bill have started a petition drive to get the question on the ballot in February. One of Johnson's stated concerns was that if the question were defeated by voters, the issue would disappear forever. Well, if the petition drive manages to get the question on the ballot and it is voted down, then a task force will have something to study.

Governments promote self-interest

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

"And at all times too, there appeared sorcerers, prophets, priests and heads of military organizations who attempted to establish and to strengthen their authority over the people."

— Peter Kropotkin

The other day I made some rather rash statements in my column about government. Such is life when one is a Collegian columnist — one makes hasty statements and must later retract them. For example, I think I said something to the effect that governments are generally immoral and that they can only perform "token good." I now submit that government can do no good.

There are no just laws. There are no just governments. Furthermore, there can never be such a creature as a just government. The very act of being a government renders justice impossible. Is it justice to have the fruits of one's labor taken by threat or force and used to perpetuate an organization to which one does not belong?

And make no mistake about it, I am not part of the government. That is my perogative, but anyone can run, right? Anyone who has the millions of dollars needed to conduct a campaign can run for office. We, the People are not we, the State, unless we happen to be independently wealthy. Does that say anything about whose interests are served by the State?

But to truly understand the State, perhaps we should do as Thomas Hobbes did and start by considering the individual. Every person acts to satisfy his or her own interests. That is one of the few maxims of human behavior we can say with any degree of certainty. If I rob a bank, I do so because I have an interest in money. Likewise, if I give the money to charity, it is to satisfy a desire to see the poor fed and clothed.

Even the most humanitarian actions are performed by people to serve their own interests. While the interests of Jesus may have differed from those of Joseph Stalin, the motivating principal was the same. When people form organizations it is no different. Just as the International Red Cross was formed to serve the interests of its founding members, The Red Brigades of Italy were formed to serve their interests.

Such is the nature of the State. Somewhere in the catacombs of quasi-history, people formed an army and then added a bureacracy to oversee it. It is impossible to say if the State began as an organization to serve the interests of all or if it was an elitist, exploitative institution from the start. It is irrelevant whether the State began as an oppressive institution or if it acquired that nature along the way. What matters is that it is such now.

But so often we hear that, without the State, our lives would be infinitely worse. People cite the selfishness of human nature as the evil from which the State protects us, yet they never question the causes of that selfishness. The Bible-beaters attribute all problems to man's inherently evil nature; they say there will always be problems in society because mankind will always be sinful.

There may be some truth to what they say — I will not deny that everyone has the potential to act in anti-social ways. But this is precisely the reason we should not surrender the unlimited power of the State to one person, a group of people, a thousand people or to anyone. Or are we, like the ancient Egyptians, to assume that the rulers of the State are infallible gods?

But surely there is some other reason for anti-social acts. And it is here that we move from politics to ecomomics — from the evils of the State to its partner in crime, the capitalist system. We are forever taught the importance of money; we are led to believe that a good job is not one we enjoy doing, but one by which we can make the most money in the least amount of time.

We then throw up our hands in despair and exclaim, "What is wrong with people today?" when it is obvious that it is the same thing that has been wrong throughout history — economic inequality and restrictions on personal freedom. But to say such things invites criticism from the conservative masses against the ever present threat of "creeping socialism" or even worse — "Godless communism."

Immediately we are confronted by the government official, the economist, the capitalist multi-national buisnessman, who in true psuedo-scientific fashion quotes Darwin and says something about survival of the fittest, that all men are not born equal and that some are destined to starve because they do not possess the physical, intellectual or financial capabilities of others.

Never do they consider the overwhelming abundance of peaceful cooperation among other animal species. Never do they admit that animals rarely kill one of their own species and that when they do, it is almost always because of environmental constraints on resources. In human societies, there are no such shortages of resources — there is enough food in the world to sustain the world's population and then some. Never do these people who supposedly look at the laws of nature consider such things.

The United States has 6 percent of the global population and more than 50 percent of its wealth, yet contrary to the callous statements of Attorney General Edwin Meese and others, there are poor and homeless people in this country.

Perhaps I've strayed from the topic at hand (the State) and then again, perhaps not. As I said, any organization is designed to serve the interests of its members. Those who still consider themselves part of the government should ask themselves if the State, which is exclusively composed of wealthy to semi-wealthy individuals, serves the interests of the people. Then, we should ask ourselves if the State is something to which we wish to attach our names.

K-State takes career counseling to high schools

By The Collegian Staff

K-State students and alumni have been taking their college and professional experience directly to high school students in five Career Counseling Nights sponsored by Student Alumni Board this semester.

High school students and their parents in Manhattan, Topeka, Wichita, Salina and Hutchinson have had the chance to meet with both current and former K-State students, said Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science and president of Student Alumni Board.

Basically, the program involves "the selling of K-State by people who have already been sold," Bradley said.

The career counseling nights provide prospective students and parents with information on housing options, available activities and making the adjustment from high school to college, Bradley said.

After the opening session, the parents and students are split up into two groups. The parents then receive more specific information on the admission process from an admissions counselor and a presentation by the Financial Assistance Office, Bradley said.

The students break up into small groups by their intended majors. A current K-State student in that major and a graduate who is working in that field present information, give advice and answer questions for prospective students, Bradley said.

The Career Planning and Placement Center also presents information to help students who are undecided about a potential major.

Student Alumni Board tries to have alumni from different academic areas attend the group sessions so there will be a little more personal communication, Bradley said.

Bradley said the program has been successful because it interests high school students in the University, and it takes advantage of valuable resources — K-State students and alumni.

Kansas glistens with holiday traditions

By CAROL LENKNER
Collegian Reporter

From the Swedish festivities in Lindsborg to Santa's helicopter arrival in front of the Capitol in Topeka, the holiday customs in Kansas towns are true slices of Americana.

In Lindsborg, Christmas is regarded as a very festive season, said Dorene Anderson, manager of the Lindsborg Chamber of Commerce.

The town is decorated in a way that reflects the Swedish heritage, she said. Hand-painted banners representing Scandinavian Christmas customs hang from the light poles in downtown Lindsborg. Jul Karve, or bundles of oats, are also hung from the poles as a gift to the birds. The shops are decorated with sparkling white lights and offer a variety of handcrafted items.

On Saturday, Dec. 13, Lindsborg will hold its annual St. Lucia Festival. Since the Middle Ages, the arrival of St. Lucia — wearing a white robe tied with a crimson sash and adorned with a crown of lighted candles — signals the beginning of the Christmas season in Swedish communities.

According to Swedish legend, it was during the Middle Ages that St. Lucia first appeared in Sweden carrying food and drink to hungry folks during the famine. Thus, she serves as the symbol of light and hope for mankind.

Lindsborg celebrates St. Lucia's arrival each year on the second Saturday in December, Anderson said. The St. Lucia character is reenacted by a senior member of the Lindsborg Swedish Folk Dancers.

The festival includes Christmas music, Swedish pastries, a performance by the Lindsborg Swedish Folk Dancers and the crowning of St. Lucia.

"People come from all over to see the festival and visit our town with its Swedish heritage," Anderson said.

In Abilene, the townspeople work together during the Christmas season to provide gifts for children through its Toys for Tots program.

"Every small town may have a Toys for Tots program, but I believe ours is unique," said Ray Powers, of the Abilene Chamber of Commerce.

Charlie Eis, a local resident, has been repairing broken toys donated by people and businesses for several years. The shelves and workbench in his basement are lined with toys. In the last few years, a couple of volunteers have helped him repair the toys, but he does most of the repair work himself, Powers said.

The toys are picked up and taken to the National Guard Armory. Parents can go to the Armory and select toys for their children.

"It's amazing the number of toys we end up with to give to the children," Powers said. "Last year, we actually had a surplus of toys. We called a minister from Salina, and he picked up the toys to give to the children there."

Topeka's Christmas festivities include the Topeka Festival of Carols and a special tree decorating event on the second floor rotunda of the Capitol.

This year's Festival of Carols is the final event in the Governor's celebration of the 125th birthday of Kansas, said Charolette Adair, chairwoman of the festival. The festival is always takes place the Friday after Thanksgiving.

The theme for this year's celebration is "Home for the Holidays." Several famous Kansans have been invited back for the celebration, including Charles "Buddy" Rogers, actor; Sam Ramey, opera singer; and James McCain, former president of K-State.

The governor will present Kansas medallions to the famous Kansans, and a reception in the Judiial Center will honor them.

During the celebration, the governor does a countdown to turn on the Christmas lights. The downtown lights come on and Santa lands in the middle of 10th Street in a helicopter. Santa then goes to his sleigh and distributes presents to the children, Adair said.

In conjunction with the Topeka Festival of Carols, various ethnic groups in Kansas will perform music on the second floor rotunda of the Capitol.

Each ethnic group has a tree decorated to represent its customs, said Nel Richmond. There are trees decorated by the Swedish, German Americans, Irish, Croatians, Volga Germans, Czechs, Hispanics, Greeks and blacks.

"One year, the black community decorated their tree in jazz instruments," Richmond said. "The tree looked very nice with all of the brass ornaments hanging from its limbs."

The Czechs use wheat decorations on their tree, she said. The wheat speaks of harvest and plenty. They believe if a family decorates their tree with wheat, they will have a good wheat harvest.

Croatians use a lot of hearts on their tree. The tree has a lot of lace and colored ribbons, she said.

The Volga Germans use a cottonwood tree with no leaves, but they wrap every limb with cotton batting. When the early settlers arrived in Kansas, there were no fruit trees, so they used the cottonwood as their Christmas tree.

All the ethnic groups use live trees, Richmond said. They also incorporate a table display near their tree showing the Christmas customs of the group. The Swedish always have the customary straw Christmas goat.

The night of the Festival of Carols, all the ethnic groups perform, Richmond said. There is an assortment of music and dance, including bagpipers and the Volga German Oompah dancers from Ellis County.

Committee chooses K-State senior as 1987 Rhodes scholar candidate

By The Collegian Staff

Kelly Welch, senior in economics and agricultural economics, was selected Wednesday as one of two Kansas candidates for Rhodes Scholarships.

Welch said he learned of being selected as a regional nominee about 5 p.m. Wednesday.

"I'm definitely very anxious about it, and I don't know how it will come out," Welch said. "Everything is coming about all of a sudden."

Welch joins David Mehnert, a Kansas high school graduate from Roeland Park who is currently a senior in English and creative writing at Princeton University, as a Kansas Rhodes scholarship finalist.

Two nominees each from Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota and South Dakota will also be interviewed by a regional selection committee Saturday in Minneapolis.

Welch said he first applied for the scholarship on the K-State level, then was nominated for the state of Kansas level by a selection committee before reaching his present level as regional Rhodes scholarship nominee.

If he is selected as one of four students in the region, he will receive a scholarship to attend Oxford University in London. If selected, he plans to study philosophy, politics and economics.

Welch and Mehnert were selected as nominees over nine other finalists. One other finalist from K-State was Sheila Farrell, senior in life sciences.

Welch said the financial award for being a Rhodes scholar is about $30,000 for living expenses, plus tuition to attend Oxford for either two or three years.

Welch said Nancy Twiss, pre-law adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences and coordinator for both the Marshall and Rhodes scholarship committees, has helped him greatly in preparing for his scholarship interviews on the University, state and regional levels.

"She teaches us very well how to prepare our mind," Welch said.

Local group matches volunteers with jobs

By LAURA HACKLEY
Collegian Reporter

For Linda Spire, volunteerism is one commodity of which there will never be a surplus. Spire is program coordinator of Manhattan's Volunteer Clearinghouse, a program that matches people with an organization or person in need of help.

The Clearinghouse gets calls from volunteers and agencies and, after learning about the needs of each, it can suggest to the volunteer the areas where they are needed most or would do the most good. When a volunteer calls in, the Clearinghouse finds out where that volunteer's interests lie.

If an organization calls in, the Clearinghouse finds out what volunteers are needed to do, how long it will take and how many people it will involve. After the contact is made, a list of agencies that fit their interests is given to the volunteers, and they are responsible for calling the agencies they prefer on the list.

There is a wide variety of agencies that work with the Clearinghouse, including the Riley County Humane Society and the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

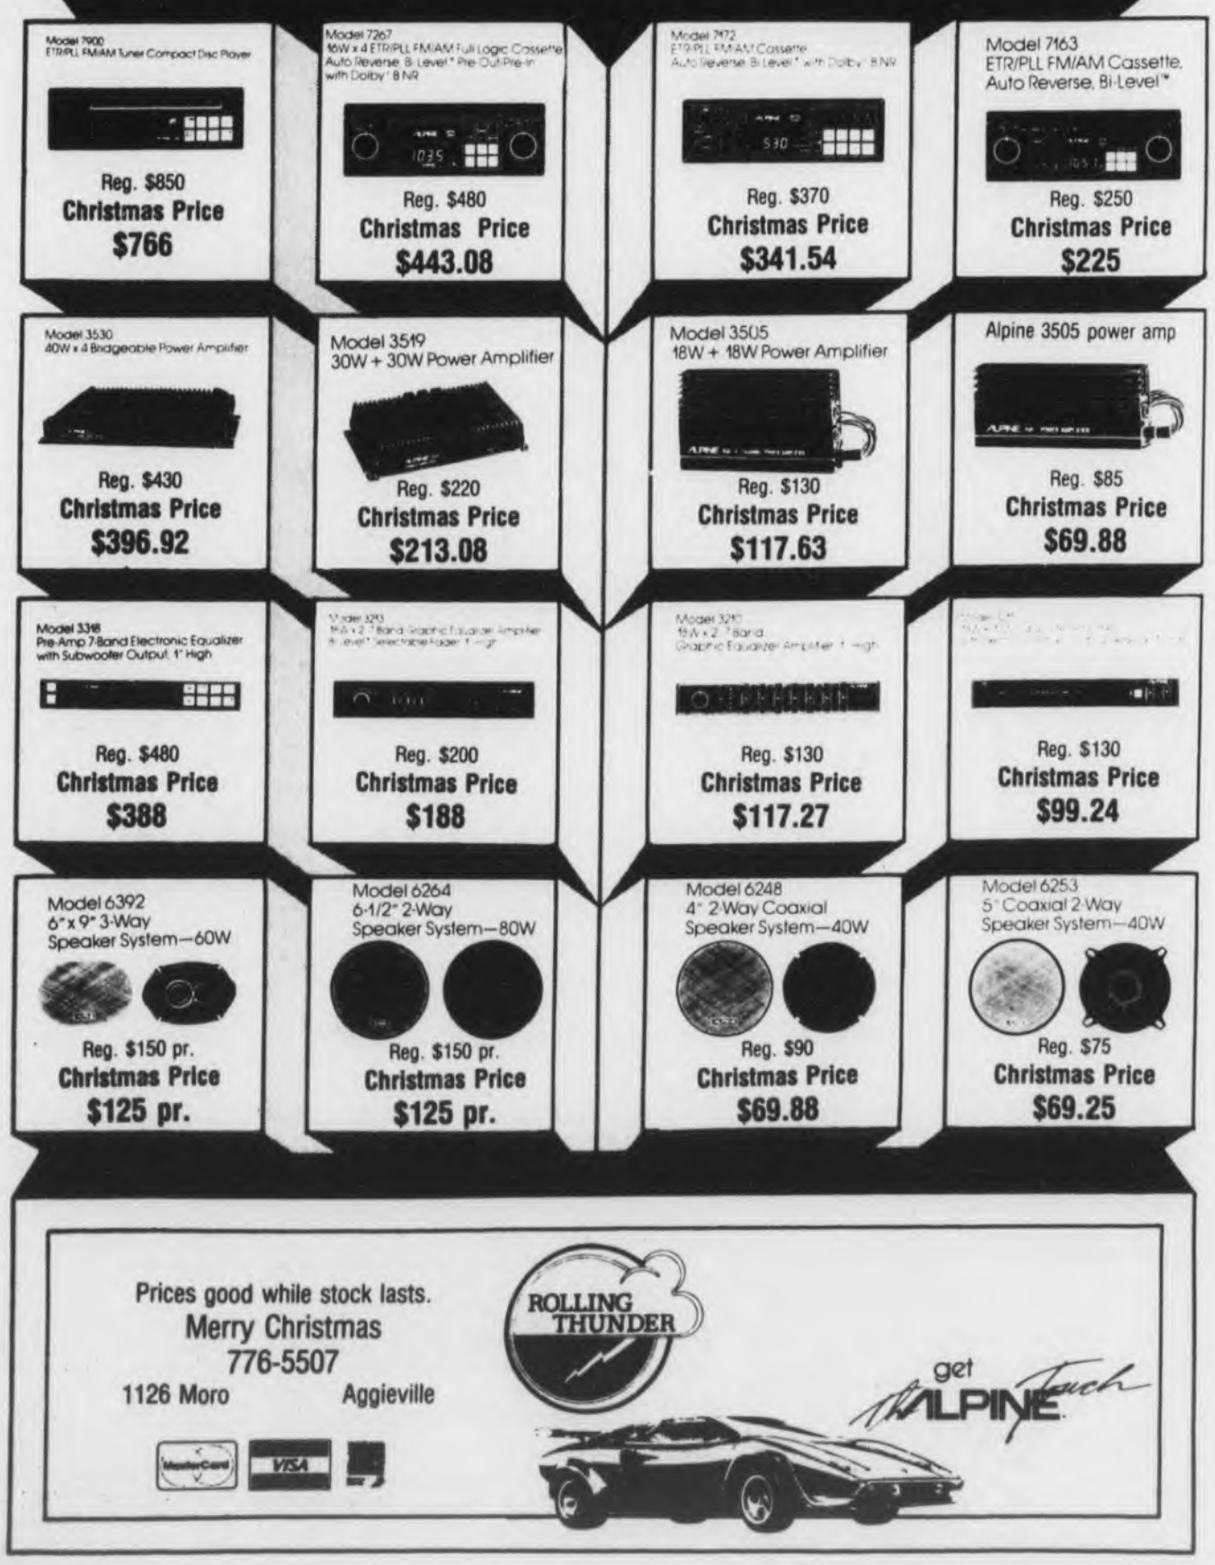
Also, Big Brothers and Big Sisters, The Riley County Senior Citizen's Center, The Fone and Crisis Center and U-LearN work with the Clearinghouse. Some organizations, such as the Fone and Crisis Center, require some training before volunteers can work there. The Clearinghouse also places students who enroll in K-State's Introduction to Social Work class in a volunteer situation.

Spire said volunteers are in great demand, but the volunteer opportunities do not require a great amount of time.

"Some elderly people want volunteers to just go for walks or help with the mail or help write letters," Spire said.

Other agencies want a group of people for one project that may take a day or so and require building or maintenance skills. Spire said volunteers are important to a number of people, and these volunteers are recognized during National Volunteer Week each April.

Other areas in which the Clearinghouse is involved include various Christmas projects. One of the projects includes volunteers who read and answer letters written by children to Santa Claus.



Another project is a series of spring workshops which include discussions on volunteerism, board relations, how volunteer time is useful on resumes, and the best way to market an agency and let the community know about volunteers.

LEAD THE FIELD.

As a nuclear officer, you could lead the field in nuclear propulsion technology. The Navy operates the most advanced nuclear equipment in the world. Including more than half the nuclear reactors in America. The men who maintain and operate these reactors are among the best.
The Navy is accepting applications from qualified sophomores, juniors and seniors for the prestigious nuclear program. This program pays you $1,000 a month during your junior and senior years. Plus $2,000 upon graduation.
After graduation, as a Navy officer, you receive a year of graduate-level training unavailable anywhere else at any price. You become a highly trained member of an elite group leading the adventure in today's nuclear Navy. And, after five years, you can be earning as much as $44,000.
To qualify, you must be working toward, or have earned, a bachelor's degree and be a U.S. citizen between 19 and 25 years of age. You must also have completed a minimum of one year each of calculus and calculus-based physics with a "B" average or better.

Banned pesticides await resting place

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Drums of cancer-causing pesticides moved out of Kansas City, Kan. after protests from officials there are being stored in Kansas City, Mo., federal environmental officials said Wednesday.

The pesticides containing ethylene dibromide have been sitting on truck trailer beds at a former construction company site for about a week, said Rowena Michaels, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's regional office.

She said the storage is only temporary and the chemicals should be moved within a week to a chemical plant in Liberty.

Health department officials of Kansas City, Mo. learned of the chemical storage from a reporter and said they were angry that they were not told the chemicals were being moved to the city.

"No one told us the chemicals would be brought in here," said Raja Ranade, chief engineer for the Health Department. "We had talked to the EPA some time ago and they had promised us they would let us know if they were going to move it here."

There are 107 drums on two trailer beds at the site, said Bill Jaekel, response manager for for Riedel Environmental Services Inc., a transport company hired by the EPA to move the chemicals. He said the state of Missouri has approved temporarily storing the chemicals at the site.

Michaels said it was the trucking company's responsibility to notify city officials of the storage site.

The movement of the banned pesticide has triggered protests from several communities in Kansas and Missouri. Earlier this year, Kansas City, Kan., officials discovered that the chemicals had been moved into their community from St. Joseph and passed an emergency ordinance and sought a court-ordered injunction against moving more into the city.

After two weeks of negotiations, city officials and the EPA agreed that the barrels would be moved out of Kansas City, Kan., by Dec. 1.

The EPA is trying to get all the chemicals moved to Liberty, where they are being pumped into new storage containers at the Douglas Chemical Co.

The EPA banned the use of EDB in 1983 as a pesticide for spraying on the ground, and in 1984 as a fumigant for stores grain. Tests showed the chemical caused cancer in laboratory animals.

About 60 percent of the all the EDB in the nation is stored in Missouri.

Professor wins award for excellent teaching

By The Collegian Staff

A professor of psychology was named Wednesday as the first recipient of the Dean's Teaching Fellow, an award created to recognize outstanding teaching in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Jerome Frieman will receive $1,000 each year for the next two years to fund seminars on teaching strategies for University faculty and graduate students and visits to Kansas high schools as a representative of K-State.

"One of my guiding principles is there's always a better way to teach a class," Frieman said. "My feeling is if you think you can't improve it, you might as well give up. Everything can be improved, particularly teaching."

Frieman was chosen by a selection committee of faculty and members of the Arts and Sciences Council, Blue Key and Mortar Board.

The Dean's Teaching Fellow, the second Distinguished Teaching Award offered in the college, will be presented to Frieman as part of December commencement ceremonies.

In addition, Frieman will receive a "small grant to be used for entertainment expenses, such as lunches with students and faculty or other expenses if the fellow chooses to initiate seminars or symposia on education of issues," said William Feyerharm, associate dean of the college.

The money for the award and the grant comes from arts and sciences resources in the KSU Foundation account, Feyerharm said.

The award is intended to stimulate and enrich the general climate of the college by acting as a catalyst to generate ideas, research and teaching techniques, Feyerharm said.

Feyerharm said although the "direct results of the award may not always pertain to teaching," it will improve the University's image by showing "how serious we are about education."

"Ultimately, in a time of more affluence, the fellow may even receive release time to pursue research or conduct a special semester long seminar on a topic of general interest," he said.

Feyerharm said this type of exchange in ideas helps students "get the feel for how the world works," and is the main reason for the creation of the new award.

Fraternity lacks funding to keep house

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

Due to a declined membership of eight members and the inability to maintain monthly mortgage payments, the men of Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity must move out of their house at 315 N. 14th St.

Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for minority affairs and adviser of the Beta Psi chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi at K-State said, "during the last several years, we have experienced major financial difficulties in maintaining the fraternity house due to a small live-in membership, therefore it gave us no choice than to consider the option of selling it."

The fraternity members have lived in the house for the past 15 years and must be moved out by the end of the semester.

"It wasn't easy for me to support the notion of selling the house due to the invested time and impact that it had on us, but we had to make this unfortunate decision nonetheless," he said.

However, Switzer said he feels good that his fraternity was able to successfully manage the house in good condition despite doubts and criticisms due to the low enrollment of black students at the University.

"These men have not failed at all," he said. "I think that this experience of managing a house while in college has proved them to be very successful young gentlemen.

"When the house opened in 1971, it was one of the only houses for a local chapter owned by Kappa Alpha Psi in the Midwest," Switzer said. "Back then there were doubts that the house would be open for even one year, due to the low black enrollment at K-State."

Despite the frustrations of losing the house, Switzer said that he would never loose faith in the actions of his fellow fraternity brothers.

"Over the years, I have adopted each of the undergrad members of the fraternity as part of my extended family because we have had very close relationships over the years," he said.

To compensate the worries and miseries of having to move out of their house during the end of the semester, Switzer and many of the fraternity members have already located an inexpensive, two-story home for the men to reside in for the remainder of the school year.

Percy Eddie, senior in radio and television and member of the fraternity, said because there is such a low percentage of black students on campus and because there are three other black fraternities at K-State, it is rather difficult to sustain a high membership rate all of the time.

"I was upset when I noticed that we had lost the house because there was a lot of tradition and memories that we shared within it," Eddie said. "Now, we have a much smaller house to live in and we will just have to work with what we got."

Eddie said that now since the fraternity has a much smaller house, it can afford the bills because of the "house fund" that it has.

Helicopter crash causes delay in nuclear winter experiment

By The Associated Press

SAN DIMAS, Calif. — A long-awaited experimental brush fire to study whether smoke and dust from an atomic war would trigger a "nuclear winter" was scrubbed Wednesday after a helicopter crashed while igniting a test burn.

The pilot escaped serious injury, but the accident left in doubt when the $750,000 experiment would be performed.

Gordon Rowley, fuels management officer for the U.S. Forest Service and the official with the final say on the burn, said the fire would be rescheduled for Friday at the earliest. If it does not take place by Dec. 15 or 16, it will probably have to be delayed until June because of difficulty in assembling the needed firefighting aircraft under favorable weather conditions, he said.

Two of the planes that were to have observed the burn promptly left the area to watch another, smaller controlled burn Wednesday near San Diego, said Bernie Zak, scientist with Sandia National Laboratory in New Mexico.

"It's very disappointing," said Joel Levine, atmospheric chemist for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. "No other experiment will answer the questions we were planning to address. I think everyone's disappointed."

The chopper was dumping thickened gasoline to start a 5-acre preliminary burn around 10:40 a.m. when the cable suspending the torch from the bottom of the aircraft snagged on telephone lines, causing the crash, county fire Capt. Garry Oversby said. He said smoke from the test burn may have blocked the pilot's view of the wire.

Eyewitness Bob Turr, a helicopter pilot reporting for radio station KFWB, said the Los Angeles County Fire Department "heli-torch" chopper caught on a wire across Lodi Canyon and lost its tail. He said the pilot escaped the wreckage, but the helicopter tumbled down the canyon afterward.

"He went through the smoke, and at the very top of the ridgeline there is a set of ... wires. What happened was the copter came across those ... wires and snagged. The front portion of the helicopter rolled over and went down the hill, disintegrating," Turr said.

Helicopter pilot Gary Lineberry, 46, of Valencia suffered "some minor abrasions on his forehead," said chief nurse Pat Titus at Foothill Presbyterian Hospital in Glendora.

Oversby said the Bell 260 helicopter was badly damaged. The tail rotor dug into the ground, breaking on impact, he said. A piece of the rotor flew off and hit the door of a nearby Forest Service fire truck carrying several people.

About 200 scientists and firefighters had gathered near Johnstone Peak, 30 miles northeast of downtown Los Angeles, to observe the oft-delayed burn. The controlled fire, which was to have consumed 320 to 480 acres, had been expected to create a 10,000-foot-tall smoke plume for study, said Philip Riggan, the U.S. Forest Service's scientist-in-charge of the experiment.

The fire, previously delayed by rain and strong wind, was meant to be a first step toward resolving uncertainties in the nuclear winter theory, said atmospheric scientist Richard Turco, who proposed the theory in 1983 with astronomer Carl Sagan and other researchers.

They suggested that, in addition to the immediate devastation caused by nuclear war, smoke from burning cities and forests would block enough sunlight to plunge Earth into months of near-darkness, causing disruptive climate changes, mass starvation and possibly extinction of numerous species, including humans.

Deficient thyroids may cause PMS

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Thyroid hormone pills can relieve premenstrual syndrome for many women whose symptoms appear to be linked with sluggish thyroid glands, suggests a new, preliminary report.

The study found often-mild thyroid deficiencies in 94 percent of the victims of premenstrual syndrome who were tested. Those who took thyroid pills "reported complete relief from the symptoms of PMS."

However, several experts said they doubt that underactive thyroids — what's known as hypothyroidism — contribute to premenstrual syndrome for most victims of the common disorder.

The apparent link between the thyroid gland and premenstrual syndrome was discovered by Dr. Nora D. Brayshaw of the Biopsychiatry Center in Watchung, N.J. The results of her preliminary experiments were published as a letter in today's New England Journal of Medicine.

In an interview, she said she has found more than 300 women "where the correlation is absolutely profound" between premenstrual syndrome and underactive thyroids, and said she has used thyroid pills routinely to treat them.

"I am so sure I know it works that when it doesn't, I've been able to find a problem," such as drinking or drugs, that interferes with the thyroid supplements, Brayshaw said.

Brayshaw said low thyroid function may not actually cause PMS. Instead, the two problems could be the result of some broader underlying hormonal disorder. But she said she believes virtually everyone with premenstrual syndrome has thyroid deficiencies.

The reaction of several other experts to Brayshaw's work ranged from cautious support to skepticism.

At the National Institute of Mental Health, Dr. David Rubinow said he found it amazing that nearly all the PMS victims showed thyroid abnormalities and that all of them could have responded to the treatment.

Dr. Arthur Prange of the University of North Carolina and president of the American College of Neuropsychopharmacology, said the research doesn't mean that all or even most cases are caused by low thyroid function, "but I bet there is a subset in whom it really can be demonstrated."

But Dr. Lawrence Wood of Massachusetts General Hospital noted that one in 10 women have failing thyroid glands by the time they reach age 45.

"I don't think her hypothesis that everyone who has PMS is thyroid deficient is necessarily true, and I'm quite sure from our own patient experience that there are people who are on thyroid (hormone) and still have PMS," said Wood, president of the Thyroid Foundation of America.

KSU KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

Program addresses children's stress

By The Collegian Staff

The effect of economic crises on rural and urban children will be the focus of a television special originating at 7:30 tonight from KKSU radio, in the basement of McCain Auditorium.

Titled "Heartache in the Heartland," the program is targeted at parents, with the intended goal of helping rural and urban children through economic crises.

The program, which will be beamed via satellite throughout Kansas and other Midwestern states, is currently scheduled to be shown locally from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. in Durland 154.

The program will attempt to communicate to rural and urban adults the effect of economic stress on their children, said Chuck Smith, associate professor of human development and family studies.

Ralph Titus, professor of extension information and program host, will introduce professionals from areas such as education and mental health during the two-hour program, with the effects of the farm crisis and other economic crises on children to be discussed at the beginning of the special.

A live question-and-answer session, during which viewers may call in, is scheduled for the last 30 minutes.

The TV special is a joint venture by the College of Education, Department of Human Development and Extension 4-H.

Union to present musical events

By The Collegian Staff

Student vocal and instrumental performances today in the Union Courtyard are among activities planned for K-State Christmas Union Day.

Students will be singing and giving instrumental performances from 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Willie the Wildcat and the K-State cheerleaders will be available for pictures from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.

Mortar Board will also sponsor a Christmas stocking contest between student honoraries in the courtyard. The stockings will be on display following judging.

Members of Mortar Board will choose the winning stocking based on creativity, originality and effort, said John Hummer, senior in economics and president of Mortar Board.

Christmas decorations were hung in the Union Wednesday night by members of Mortar Board, Blue Key, Chimes and Spurs.

Mortar Board will also be sponsoring "A K-State Christmas and Musical Celebration" at 3 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

Tickets for the show will be sold today and Friday in the Union and McCain ticket box offices.

Cooperative predicts further decline of small family farms

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Dramatic change is coming to Farmland Industries after the regional cooperative survived the worst year of its history.

Farmland, a Kansas City based co-op that is one of the nation's largest, sees the future of agricultural as a continued decline in the number of small, family-owned farms.

James L. Rainey, the new Farmland President, said most of the agricultural production of the future will come from larger farms, which will make different demands on the cooperative.

"There is a strong likelihood that we will conclude that we will have to propose some pretty dramatic changes," said Rainey, who will preside over his first Farmland annual meeting on Thursday.

"We are not precluding ... any structural change. We are not going to regard the so-called federated structure as sacred."

Farmland is in the second phase of a three-phase soul-searching that Rainey hopes will put the cooperative in a good position for the future. He described it as a determined and in-depth investigation of the Farmland business philosophy.

The third phase will be long-range planning to meet the changing market.

Phase one was painful. Farmland lost $159 million in the fiscal year that ended Aug. 31, and 750 employees were let go.

Preliminary indications from the first quarter of the fiscal year now underway are encouraging, so much so that Farmland could reach the break-even point by February, Rainey said.

Farmland does expect a loss for the year, but not nearly of the size of the 1986 loss, which was blamed on the stunning fall in oil prices.

"It's kind of a catchword around here," Rainey said. "We bled to death in 1986 and no matter what happens it could not be as bad as '86 because it (the oil price) could not fall as far."

Rainey said Farmland's relationship with its member co-ops remained strong, although in October it canceled $142.7 in equities the co-ops held.

"Naturally, local managers and boards were disappointed," Rainey said. "(But) there was a strong consensus among our management group that we were going to continue to be supported by those locals. Make no mistake, however, that that support would not continue if we performed the way we did in 1986."

Rainey said in this fiscal year, "there is no doubt that we are being well supported."

He said "the single most important thing" was that local associations view the survival and growth of Farmland as critical to their own survival.

Rainey said he was working hard to change what he called "a lack of profit orientation" at Farmland. He said the co-op had become more concerned with trying to meet all the needs of its member associations rather than with making money.

"When I first got here and sat down and read the mission statement," Rainey said, "it said to me, 'Be all things to all people all at the same time.' It was a concept of practicing a religion as opposed to running a business."

Rainey said he felt the traditional cooperative practice of giving each and every member an equal voice in the operation of the co-op would have to change.

"There is a longstanding rule in the business community that the democratic process and good business decision-making don't mix," he said. "Local associations that are successful and have become dominant are not managed by the democratic process."

Rainey, the sixth president in Farmland's 57-year history, was elected president of Farmland on May 12. A former executive of Kerr-McGee Corp., he official took over Farmland in mid-summer when a planned transition period was cut short after it became apparent how huge the financial loss was going to be.

"I will stress the criticality of change," Rainey said of his message to the annual meeting.

Drinking habits remain unchanged despite rise in legal age

Liquor laws fail to stop underage students from drinking

By ANNE BRANDSBERG
Collegian Reporter

Bright neon lights flash in the dark. Cars with blaring music cruise the streets. Groups of young women stand in small circles giggling, while young men sit back and have a few cold ones to relax.

Welcome to another night in Aggieville.

With as many pitchers of golden, foamy brew being passed around as there are, an outside observer would probably never guess that almost three-fourths of the students at K-State are under the legal drinking age.

Liquor laws are changing, and so is the behavior of students who choose to drink. However, this change isn't exactly what legislators hoped it would be.

"I go to the bars and drink. If you're underage, they just mark your hand with a big X and you drink any way," said Lori Lee, freshman in business.

"Sometimes I go to Aggieville and I don't drink, but getting beer isn't any problem," Lee said. "...a bunch of us were sitting at a table and we all had Xs on our hands and the guy came up and asked if we wanted a pitcher. He sold us one right there, and we were all underage.

"I've never been afraid of getting caught. If you see a cop you just put your glass down," she said. "I've never seen anyone being arrested, but you hear about it."

"I go to the bars all the time," said Patricia Chapa, freshman in accounting. "Everyone just goes to the bathroom and washes the marks off. Everyone does it."

Geoff Gobble, manager of Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro St., said, "They still come in and legally we can't serve them. I'm sure people still buy them beer. We don't condone that.

"We try not to let them drink. I don't sell beer to them. It's against the law," Gobble said.

"I'd rather have them in here than out in their cars with coolers, drinking. Then we could call them a cab," he said. "It defeats the purpose of the law when they cruise around drinking because the idea behind the law was to cut down on drunk driving."

The city ordinance which allows minors in taverns has cost the bar owners a lot in profits. Gobble said the ordinance is a good idea because it lets the younger students come and party with their friends, but it's hard to control who drinks and who doesn't.

George Martin, a junior in electrical engineering, is a residence assistant in Goodnow Hall. He said most of the students on his floor are underclassmen and can't legally drink.

"Some of them go to Aggieville or over to Charlie's (1800 Claflin Road) to drink, or they have an older friend get alcohol for them," Martin said. "At the beginning of the year, they were all told the rules Goodnow has about alcohol and what would happen to them if they broke any state laws and were found with alcohol. They're going to drink no matter what the law says."

The students on Martin's floor are more cautious about drinking in Aggieville or at Charlie's, Martin said.

New drinking policies have little effect on dorm residents

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

Raising the drinking age to 20 may have affected some individual practices, but it has had little influence on the drinking policies in K-State living groups.

However, emphasis at parties may have shifted from drinking to other activities, said Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing, and Barb Robel, director of Greek Affairs.

"I think there's been less emphasis on getting drunk and more on having a good time, regardless of whether the diversions are food, costumes or games or just other people," Proite said.

Robel agreed, saying that more alternatives to drinking were provided at Rush Week parties this year than in the past. Food and games were the most popular diversions, she said.

Residence halls and greek houses have not changed their rules regarding alcohol since the legal drinking age in Kansas rose from 18 to 19 in 1985. The legal age climbed to 20 on July 1, 1986.

Both organizations follow the guidelines of the University Alcohol Policy, which applies to all living groups on campus. The policy states that only 3.2 percent beer may be consumed by those of legal age in the groups' residences.

About 3,000 students live in greek houses, and Robel estimated that half of those are minors. The residence halls house 3,487 students, about 75 percent of whom are underage, Proite said. One exception to this is Edwards Hall, a graduate and upperclass student residence hall, where nearly all residents are over 21.

With nearly half of the greeks under 20, the system has been careful to control consumption at parties.

"Most houses now are checking IDs and marking (minors) in some way with hospital bands or stamps," Robel said. "We don't anticipate that there will be fewer parties but there will be a more concentrated effort to deal with underage people."

At the Beta Theta Pi fraternity, party policies are the same as in years past but members are more aware of the drinking age, said Gib Benschoter, freshman in veterinary medicine and Beta president.

"If (minors) were to get liquor on their own, no one could stop them, but we don't provide it to them by any means," Benschoter said.

Residence halls have seen some decrease in activity as a result of the increased drinking age, however.

"Overall, there are fewer parties, but this isn't so much a function of the 20 age as it was of 19. We had fewer this year than last year and fewer than that the year before," Proite said.

Old meets new in Big 8 play

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

This year in the Big Eight Conference, it will be a case of old meets new. With new coaches at four of the conference's schools, Big Eight basketball could be in for a shake-up.

A majority of the preseason polls are picking the four veteran coaches' teams to finish one through four in the Big Eight, with the rookies' squads filling the bottom four slots.

The newcomers — K-State's Lon Kruger, Oklahoma State's Leonard Hamilton, Colorado's Tom Miller and Nebraska's Danny Nee — recognize the fact the four senior teams will enter the conference season as favorites.

Nee finds himself in Lincoln after being an assistant at Notre Dame for three years and coaching six years at Ohio University, in the process leading that program to four 20-game seasons.

"I think all of the coaches coming in won't be able to play their games until they get their own players and it takes three years to get all of your own players," Nee said.

Kruger acquired his coaching lessons as a player and assistant for Jack Hartman at K-State. He took what he learned to raise a lowly program at Pan American to a new level of achievement and in the process developed his own coaching style.

"The four established coaches have an advantage because they have established programs and they know their players," Kruger said.

Naturally, the four Big Eight vets — Larry Brown at Kansas, Norm Stewart at Missouri, Billy Tubbs at Oklahoma and Johnny Orr at Iowa State — would like to try to deny the pressure is on them to finish in the upper division of the conference race, but that gets a little difficult.

"I think it's going to be a great race this year," said Tubbs, who is going into his seventh year as the Sooners' mentor. "I don't think there is a single team in the league that is head and shoulders above everybody else."

Orr has seen the level of Big Eight basketball rise in his six years at Iowa State and he knows the newcomers carry the credentials to raise the league to even loftier heights.

"Basketball in the Big Eight is really going and it will be that much better once they get their programs going," Orr said.

The influx of youthful enthusiasm in the conference has become a headache for Brown who is entering his fourth year at KU.

"I know one thing," Brown said, "when I go recruit, (young coaches) are everywhere."

The other newcomers, Miller and Hamilton, bring shining credentials to their jobs. Both men jumped at the chance to coach in the nation's fastest growing basketball conference.

Miller brings discipline to Boulder. Not only did he graduate from West Point, he names his idol as Bobby Knight, the explosive coach at Indiana. Miller served as an assistant to Knight and then took over at Cornell where he improved the Ivy League school's program. Now Miller's in a conference which takes athletics seriously.

"I knew it was a great basketball league. People have said it's a football conference and I think that's a misconception," Miller said.

Hamilton comes to OSU after spending 13 years under Joe B. Hall and Eddie Sutton at Kentucky. Hamilton said when he arrived in the Big Eight and saw his fellow newcomers, he knew his hands were full.

The league's elder statesman knows the new philosophies will cross up some of the older coaches who might have had the rookie's predecessor figured out.

"I think you will see some ball games that will be interpreted as an upset," said Stewart, who is entering his 20th year at Mizzou. "This will create some new basketaball in the conference."

University of Oklahoma basketball head coach Billy Tubbs is one in the old guard of the Big Eight mentors and will have to meet four new coaches in the conference ranks this season.

Red Raiders to test undefeated K-State in first road outing

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Don't expect the Wildcats to maintain their 43-point average scoring margin Thursday night when they play at Lubbock, Texas, against Texas Tech's Red Raiders.

K-State's men's basketball team, which has manhandled lesser opponents in its first two games, should receive a stern test from a squad that won the Southwest Conference postseason tournament last season.

Texas Tech, after a narrow 6-point loss to Kentucky Tuesday night in Lexington, is 1-1 this season. The Red Raiders opened the season with a victory over California State at Fullerton.

"Texas Tech has a good ball club," said K-State coach Lon Kruger. "It's one of those programs that is better than a lot of people really know."

As for his own squad, Kruger said he is uncertain how the 'Cats will react to their first road test of the year.

"Certainly, we'd rather be playing in Ahearn, but you have to go on the road. That's part of the challenge, and we're looking forward to it," he said.

"We hope to play with the recklessness and abandon we played with here the first two nights, but when you go on the road, you really don't know what to expect. I think we'll play hard and play with confidence, but it's the first time away from home and against better competition, so that remains to be seen."

Texas Tech returns three starters from last year's 17-14 squad, which finished in a tie for fifth place in the Southwest Conference race.

Sophomore guard Sean Gay, Tech's second-leading scorer last season, gives the Red Raiders an outside shooting threat while senior forward Dewayne Chism is a force to be dealt with inside.

"They've got good size inside, but I think more of a strength is their athletic ability on the perimeter. They've got very good quickness and good athletes at the guard spot," Kruger said.

Leading the way in scoring for the 'Cats in their first two outings have been junior-college transfers Mitch Richmond and William Scott, who average 20 and 16 points a game, respectively.

Ron Meyer's 10 rebounds a game tops the club in that area, while point guard Lynn Smith leads the defensive charge with 10 total steals.

'We hope to play with the recklessness and abandon we played with here the first two nights, but when you go on the road, you really don't know what to expect.'
— Lon Kruger

Kruger pinpointed two keys for the 'Cats if they are to net their third win of the young season Thursday.

"Defensively, we'll have to be more solid and sustain our defensive effort for a longer period of time, because Tech is a patient club and very selective in looking for their shots," Kruger said.

"Offensively, we'll have to be a little more patient because the shots aren't going to come quite so quickly because they're a good defensive club.

"I think it will be a good test," Kruger said of the game. "I think it will be a good indication of where we stand and what we need to work on."

NOTES: Game time is 7:30 p.m. from the 8,174-seat Lubbock Municipal Coliseum...broadcasts of the game can be heard on the 'Cats' radio network.

AP picks Gundy, Jones as two best newcomers

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Quarterback Mike Gundy of Oklahoma State and defensive back Adrian Jones of Missouri, who will meet on the playing field Thursday, were named Associated Press Big Eight newcomers of the year Wednesday.

The freshmen were picked by a panel of media observers and the choices were announced Wednesday.

Jones became the Big Eight's leader in picking passes off and Gundy set the record for consecutive attempts without throwing an interception.

Jones, who leads the Big Eight with five interceptions, will be trying to stop Gundy Thursday night when the Tigers and Cowboys officially close out the regular season against each other in Stillwater, Okla.

Gundy was inserted into the lineup in the third game of the season and responded by throwing 138 consecutive passes without an interception — a Big Eight record.

"I think he's just amazing," said Oklahoma State Coach Pat Jones. "To think that the kid's first 138 passes set the conference record. And that included stops in Lincoln, Neb., to play on national television and then the next week at Oklahoma."

Gundy goes into Thursday night's finale with 1,293 yards passing, just seven shy of the conference record for a freshman. In 196 attempts, he has been picked off only once. The conference record is four thefts in 239 attempts by Jerry Tagge of Nebraska in 1971.

"He's thrown a few that ought to be intercepted," Jones said. "But for some reason or another, they don't intercept it. I'm beginning to think the little rascal leads a charmed life."

Jones was a crowd favorite at Missouri this season, despite the Tigers' disappointing record. He was Missouri's leading tackler as well as the league's leading intercepter.

"He's got a lot of charisma," said Coach Woody Widenhofer. "He loves to practice and play football. He's one of those kids who gets up in the morning and looks forward to practice, and that's why he's had so much success as a freshman."

Jones' athletic ability in the open field reminds Widenhofer of his days as an assistant coach with the Super Bowl teams of the Pittsburgh Steelers.

"He makes very few mistakes," Widenhofer said. "And he's the best open-field tackler I've seen in a long, long time, going back to Mike Wagner of the Steelers."

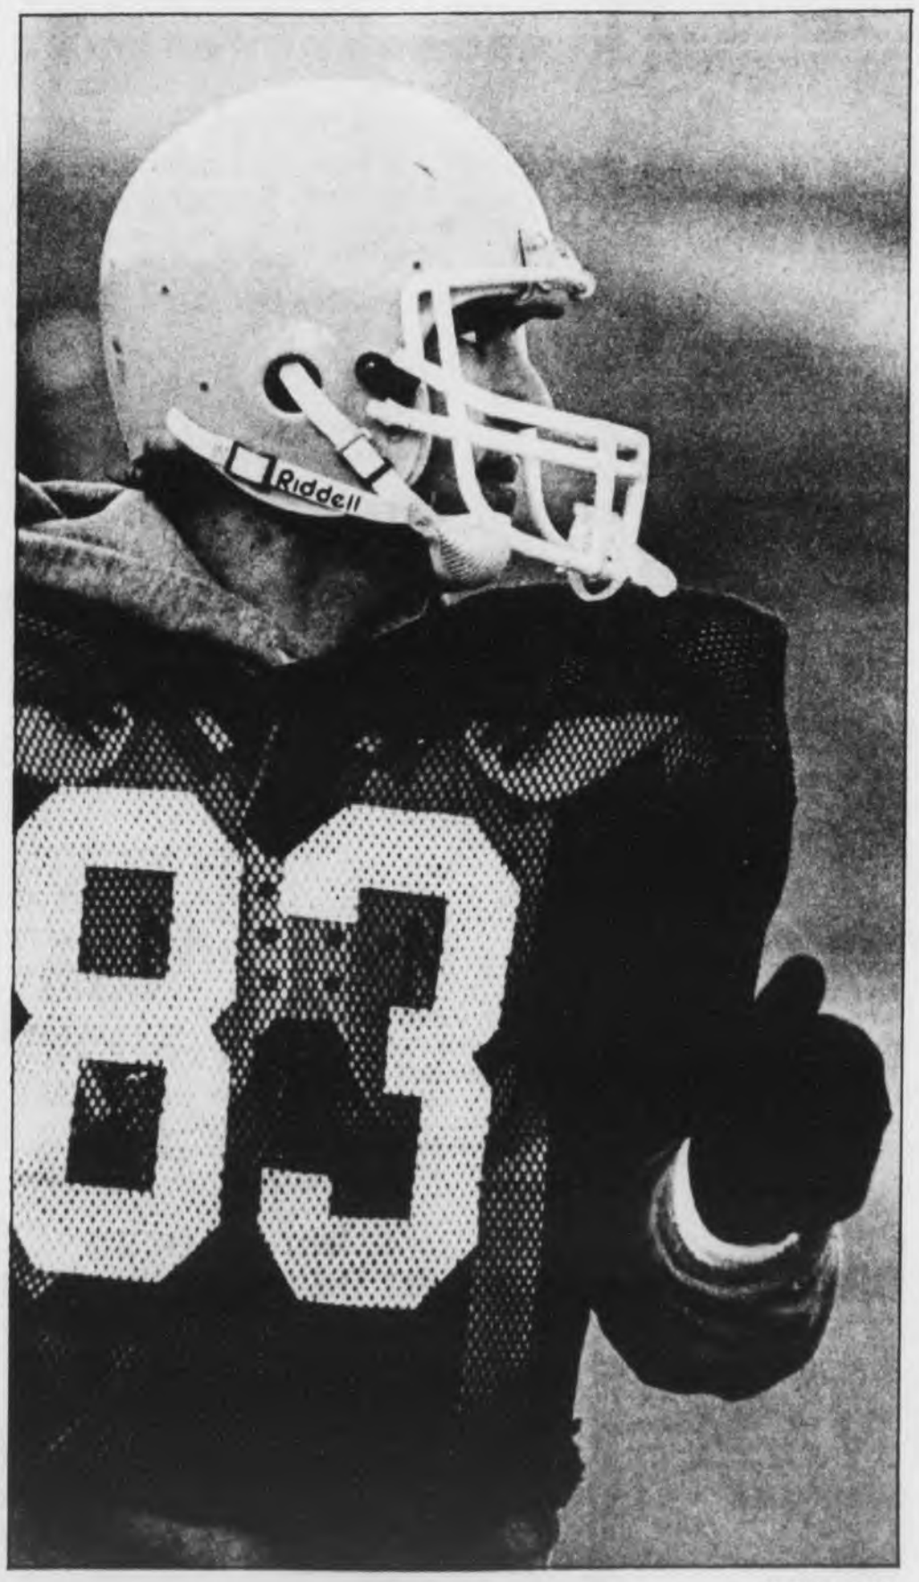
The AP media panel earlier selected Oklahoma linebacker Brian Bosworth and quarterback Jamelle Holieway as the Big Eight's defensive and offensive players of the year for the 1986 season.

Bosworth, Oklahoma's junior All-America linebacker, was a unanimous choice as defensive player of the year. The colorful and sometimes controversial Texas native is certain to draw support for virtually every post-season honor in college football.

Holieway, the Sooners' wishbone quarterback, finished second to Nebraska running back Keith Jones in the Big Eight rushing derby this year despite limited playing time in several blowouts. He was also named first-team all-Big Eight quarterback for the second straight year.

Bosworth became one of the most popular figures in the game during a brilliant sophomore season. But Coach Barry Switzer said he didn't realize how popular Bosworth had become until after Oklahoma's game this year at Iowa State.

"The problem was that Bosworth was trying to sign all these autographs and trying to give those kids the attention, trying to be a gracious player and responsible to those people." Switzer recalled.



"When I saw that group move with him toward the bus, it reminded me of how a beehive of people used to follow Muhammad Ali."

Walk-ons must try twice as hard

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

Willingness to work hard, self-confidence and determination are the qualities needed by a walk-on athlete, according to coaches and walk-on athletes.

Former K-State quarterback John Welch knows from first-hand experience the trials and tribulations experienced by a walk-on athlete. When he transferred to K-State in 1983, he went from standout to unknown.

Staff/Gary Lytle

Wildcat wide receiver Dan Hughes is one of about 20 walk-ons who tried out for football. He was a scholarship athlete in South Dakota before transferring to K-State.

Welch was a scholarship football player his freshman year for Southwestern College in Winfield. But the next fall, he gave up his scholarship to play in the Big Eight Conference. Welch chose K-State.

"Coming on as walk-on was hard," Welch said. "At Southwestern, I was No. 1, and I came up here and I was nobody. Walk-ons constantly have to prove themselves. You have to be prepared to do twice as much to be noticed."

Welch, senior in marketing and mechanical engineering technology, became a scholarship player the second year he played K-State football. He stayed at quarterback until he broke his wrist the third game of this season. Now, Welch is training for the decathlon on the Wildcats' track team as a walk-on.

"The track atmosphere is more open; they leave a lot more up to the athlete," he said. "The track staff is more easily accessible because there aren't as many people on the team and it doesn't take as much time to prepare.

"The track team is more of an incentive program that depends on an individual's drive; whereas in football it was 'do it' or 'don't do it,'" he added.

Dan Hughes, starting wide receiver for the 'Cats, also joined the team as a walk-on. Hughes was a scholarship player for two years at the University of South Dakota.

Hughes said it was a difficult adjustment when he became a walk-on from another collge. He knew he was taking a risk.

"I wanted to see what it was like to play Division I ball," he said. "The first four or five weeks I don't think I said a word. I worked my way in and people started showing interest."

According to Hughes, walk-ons are not awarded much attention because of a high turnover rate. College athletics is more difficult than the walk-ons anticipate, and that is why so many of them quit, Hughes said.

Each athletic team differs in its use and dependency of walk-ons. Coaches' attitudes also vary, although all of them encourage walk-ons and recognize them as a necessity to any team.

"They have to have the desire to be good," said women's tennis coach Steve Bietau.

The general consensus of the University coaches is that any walk-on who tries out, shows potential and can contribute to the team is the type of player they are seeking.

All walk-ons have an equal opportunity to receive a scholarship just like recruited players who receive either a partial or full scholarship.

"If you are contributing to the team, then the team should contribute to you," said Scott Nelson, women's volleyball coach.

At the start of the semester, the football

Television rights to tourney may sell for record amount

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Television rights to the NCAA Basketball Tournament may be sold for as much as $200 million for a four-year contract, sources said, as bidding headed into its final hours Wednesday.

With all three networks poised to make their final pitch, sources told the Associated Press that bidding could go as high as $200 million for a four-year pact to replace the current three-year, $96 million deal with CBS.

"There may be a decision by Saturday," a spokesman said. "All three networks are still in the running as far as we can tell. All three will meet with the sub-committee over the weekend."

Richard D. Shultz, chairman of the Division I Basketball Committee, heads a special negotiating committee which has been meeting with television executives since October. Other committee members include Notre Dame athletic director Gene Corrigan, NCAA secretary-treasurer Will Bailey and NCAA staff members Tom Jernstedt and Dave Cawood.

CBS, by contractual agreement, had a 30-day exclusive negotiating period. When that expired in late November without CBS striking a deal, speculation was fueled that the tournament would be split up among two networks. NBC in particular had urged a two-network arrangement.

Bullets snap Boston's home win streak

By The Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — The Celtics spared Boston by ending their 48-game home winning streak in Harrtford, their home away from home..

"It's too bad," the Celtics' Kevin McHale said Tuesday night after the team's 117-109 loss to the Washington Bullets before more than 15,000 stunned observers at the Hartford Civic Center. "But if it's going to end, it might as well be in Hartford."

The streak also began in the civic center, 110 miles from the Boston Garden, its old parquet floor and all of those championship banners. The Celtics play three regular-season games in Hartford each year.

Celtics lose at 'home away from home'

The Celtics had not lost a home game since Dec. 6, 1985, when they were beaten by the Portland Trail Blazers at the Boston Garden. The winning streak started four days later when they defeated the Atlanta Hawks in Hartford.

The Celtics last season broke the previous record for consecutive home victories, 36 games, set by the Philadelphia 76ers in 1966 and '67.

"This ended our streak even though we weren't at the Garden. We were the team in white, so it was a home game for us," Celtics Coach K.C. Jones said.

Jones had never lost a game in Hartford as head coach.

"I used to say that I didn't like streaks, but now I realize that I do like them," he said. "They don't start talking about them until they reach about 10 games and they're only broken by one loss."

Trailing 86-81 going into the fourth quarter, Washington brought Darwin Cook off the bench to ignite a 12-point run and help turn the game around. Jeff Malone scored 36 points, including 30 in the first three quarters, for the Bullets.

Boston's misfortune was Washington's salvation as the team recorded its first win after seven losses on the road this season.

"It feels great for us to win a ballgame on the road. We had to have an unreal fourth quarter to beat this team, and we got it," Bullets Coach Kevin Loughery said.

team had 20 to 25 walk-ons — a low turnout compared to other schools in the Big Eight Conference.

"Nebraska gets as many as 70 or more walk-ons each year," said football coach Stan Parrish. But Parrish's "12th Man" brainstorm drew more than 170 applicants before the Kansas game in October.

Coaches report an average of six to eight walk-ons each year for the men's basketball team and one or two for the women's squad. The women's volleyball team had five walk-ons try out this fall, women's tennis drew four interested athletes, and John Carpriotti — coach of the men's and women's track teams — said 12 people who tried out this year were walk-ons.

Last year, the men's baseball team attracted 31 walk-ons, but only seven were asked to continue practicing, Coach Mike Clark said. Rob Sedorcek, men's golf coach, reported 30 walk-on tryouts but he added only one to the team.

Overall, the coaches give walk-on athletes an equal chance to become part of a team, but they are often compared to and must compete with scholarship players.

Local Christian play tells tale of Scrooge

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

"The Gospel According to Scrooge," a Christian musical adaptation of Charles Dickens' "A Christmas Carol" will be performed at 8 tonight, Saturday and Sunday at Luckey High School.

The play will be performed by New Creation, a dramatic performing ensemble from Manhattan Christian College. RubyAnn Poulson, associate professor of music at MCC and director-producer of the play, said New Creation is working to enhance the effect of dramatic theater in the church, helping young people to develop their dramatic skills.

In the play, Scott Prouty portrays Ebeneezer Scrooge, a man who is faced with the problem of worshipping money instead of God. Unlike the original adaptation of "A Christmas Carol," "The Gospel According to Scrooge" shows that Ebeneezer's major problem was not primarily a result of excessive greed.

When the angels come to show Scrooge his past, present and future, he is able to realize that his life would have been better if he would have accepted Christ as his savior instead of worshipping money.

Scrooge has a change of heart after the gospel message.

"Ebeneezer had to realize that true change had to happen from within the heart," Poulson said.

"When Ebeneezer realizes that he has made money his God, he therefore becomes able to change inside, and is also able to accept God as his savior, then letting money to assume its proper place in life."

John Secrest, assistant professor of music at MCC and musical director of the play, said the chorus in the play will be performed by the 36-member "Celebration Singers" from MCC.

"The dancing in the play is also choreographed to the songs by the choir just like any major musical production," Secrest said.

Court considers commission's powers

Pipeline companies dispute KCC order

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Corporation Commission's chief attorney today told the Kansas Supreme Court pipeline companies seek to end state regulation of natural gas production by challenging a KCC order aimed at forcing production of allotted natural gas in the Hugoton field.

However, the lead lawyer for the pipeline companies denied the charge. He said the appeal of a nearly four-year-old change in the KCC regulation on so-called "underages" is designed solely to reverse something which is illegal under federal law and court rulings.

The court took the case under advisement. With normal handling, it should have a ruling Jan. 16.

It is the second time the state Supreme Court has had the case before it. In May 1985, the state court upheld the Corporation Commission's change in underage policy. But the pipeline companies appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which instructed the state court to reconsider its decision.

At issue is whether the Corporation Commission has power to force producers to take gas they are allotted from the Hugoton field in southwest Kansas within a certain time frame, or forever lose their right to it.

Previously, the KCC permitted the producers to accumulate underages — which are the amounts of gas they were allocated but didn't take — and produce the gas in later years.

In February 1983, the KCC changed that policy and ordered producers to take the gas in the year in which it was allocated or permanently surrender their right to produce it.

The goal was to encourage producers to produce more Kansas gas at a time when companies which had entered into contracts in other states, which forced them to pay for gas whether they took it or not, were not producing Kansas gas.

Mark Adams, chief attorney for North Central Pipeline Co. and lead lawyer arguing the appeal for the companies, said the new policy creates massive discrimination in the Hugoton field because some companies can sell all of their prorated gas so they take it, while others don't have the same market demand and can't take their gas.

He also argued the order has the indirect effect of influencing the interstate pipeline market, which federal regulations and court decisions prohibit.

However, Brian Moline, chief counsel of the KCC, told the Supreme Court that the federal courts have held that the mere existence of contracts involving the sale of gas in the interstate market does not pre-empt state regulation of natural gas production.

The real issue, Moline told the seven justices, is the pipeline companies' desire to escape entirely state regulation on gas production.

"If the court holds the commission can't prorate production, then the state regulation of oil and gas is ended," Moline said.

And that, the KCC attorney added, will ruin the state's ability to manage conservation of its oil and gas reserves and provide for orderly and efficient production.

Adams called the KCC order an illegal attempt to regulate interstate marketing of natural gas.

Moline said the KCC policy is aimed exclusively at producers, and the fact the pipeline companies — which distribute the gas to buyers — are adversely affected is not sufficient cause to overturn the policy.

nian arms sales to the Nicaraguan guerrillas went through a Swiss bank account controlled by the CIA and also used to handle covert assistance to Afghan rebels.

This conflicted with the account given by Attorney General Edwin Meese III, who said on Nov. 25 that the money skimmed from the arms sale proceeds to Iran was "deposited in bank accounts which were under the control of representatives of the forces in Central America."

In an interview with Time Magazine, conducted last Wednesday and published Sunday, Reagan said, "Another country was facilitating those sales of weapons systems. They then were overcharging and were apparently putting the money into back accounts of the leaders of the Contras. It wasn't us funneling money to them. This was another country."

In Tel Aviv, Israeli newspapers and radio reported that Foreign Minister Shimon Peres sharply disputed this account at a closed meeting of his Labor Party on Monday night.

Peres was quoted as saying, "Israel has no connection with the Contras in Nicaragua. That is a complete falsehood."

At his Nov. 19 news conference, Reagan said in his prepared opening statement, "Eighteen months ago ... this administration began a secret initiative to the Islamic Republic of Iran."

In an interview with Time magazine that was published Sunday, however, the president was quoted as saying, "The Iranians came to us at first. They wanted to talk about a better relationship."

In a statement on Nov. 20, Robrt McFarlane, who was the president's national security adviser until last December, appeared to support the president's first version: that the administration, not the Iranians, initiated the contacts.

Speaking of administration efforts to reach so-called moderates in Iran, McFarlane said, "When, in 1985, such elements were identified and validated, I believed it was worthwhile to make contact with them and seek a political dialogue."

Varying statements also have been made by Reagan and his aides about Marine Lt. Col. Oliver W. North, a deputy director on the National Security Council staff, who has been fired.

Meese said that North had "precise knowledge" of the funneling of funds to Nicaragua. Reagan, referring to a report he had received from the attorney general, said, "This report led me to conclude that I was not fully informed on the nature of one of the activities undertaken" in connection with the overtures to Iran.

"This action raises serious questions of propiety," the president said. The attorney general added, "We are presently looking into the legal aspects of it as to whether there's any criminality involved."

In his Time interview, however, Reagan said, "I do not feel betrayed. Lieutenant Colonel North was involved in all our operations. ... He has a fine record. He is a national hero. My only criticism is I wasn't told everything."

Other statements have sown confusion about the announced U.S. policy of not paying ransom or meeting demands to secure the return of hostages held by terrorists.

In the speech Nov. 13 in which he first acknowledged the Iranian arms deals, Reagan said, "We did not trade weapons or anything else for hostages — nor will we."

In a telephone interview from his Dallas office, however, Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot said he worked with North in an attempt earlier this year to ransom four Americans then held in Lebanon.

In his dealings with North, Perot said, "There was never any question in my mind he was operating under very tight discipline and control."

He said that at North's request he sent $2 million in private funds to Cyprus by a courier, who waited in Cyprus for five days with the money before the deal fell through.

Daniel Howard, a White House spokesman, said, "If it happened, according to the National Security Council, no one knew of it, and it certainly was not authorized."

Reagan

White House spokesman Larry Speakes said Regan has no intention of leaving and said the president "has not asked him to leave."

Reagan did not discuss possible staff changes when he spoke to businesswomen in the White House. Instead, he said he hoped the furor would not undercut support for the Contra forces fighting the Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

"We cannot let recent events distract us from the cause of those brave fighters for freedom around the world," he said. As his audience applauded, Reagan said, "Yes, you did just make my day."

Reagan could not have been as pleased with the word he received earlier in the day from key GOP congressional leaders. One participant, speaking on condition he not be identified by name, said Reagan was advised to seek changes in his administration.

Outside the White House, Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas said the message to Reagan was this: "There are going to be more and more stories, every day there will be something new. Some other player will be involved, somebody the president never even heard of."

Bush's comments came in a speech in which he said he fully supported Reagan's decision to make secret arms sales to Iran, but knew nothing of the diversion of profits to the Contra forces. Reagan also says he knew nothing of the diversion of funds until Attorney General Edwin Meese III told him a little more than a week ago.

In voicing strong words of support for Reagan, Bush added, "There is no denying that our credibility has been damaged by this entire episode and its aftermath."

Bush said the shaping of the Iranian policy involved difficult choices and was clouded by the way in which the president's goals were executed, "specifically allegations about certain activities of the National Security Council staff. Clearly, mistakes were made."

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, in France on an official trip, said Reagan received bad advice from aides advising him on a new policy toward Iran. "What he was trying to do was to open an agreement and an arrangement with people whom he had been advised were of a far different character than the people he was quite properly denouncing as being fanatical lunatics in Iran.

"I think unfortunately some of that advice has not turned out to have been accurate or correct," Weinberger said.

Meanwhile, Transportation Department documents show that a former CIA air transport company, said to have played key roles in both arms sales to Irans and shipments to the Nicaraguan rebels, flew more than 400 tons of cargo this year into an air base used by an American-manned Contra resupply operation.

Southern Air Transport of Miami reported it made 15 flights into a military airport in El Salvador. The flights coincide with creation of an air resupply wing to carry weapons to the Contra rebels — an effort that government sources said anonymously was managed by North.

While the administration awaited appointment of an independent counsel to investigate the once-secret arms sale to Iran and the funneling of profits through a Swiss bank account to Nicaraguan forces, Senate leaders appeared headed for creation of a single "supercommittee" to conduct its own probe.

Senate GOP Leader Bob Dole said he is looking for an informal way to begin the panel's work before January, and said Reagan is still considering calling a special session of Congress to accomplish that goal.

But both Sen. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, the incoming Democratic leader, and Rep. Jim Wright of Texas, expected to serve as speaker of the House in the new Congress, were reported cool to Reagan's call for a joint House-Senate committee. The last such panel was set up 45 years ago, in the wake of the Japanese surprise attack on Pearl Harbor.

Until the new Senate panel is established, the Senate Intelligence Committee is taking the lead in Congress in digging into the controversy. Poindexter became the second former administration official to cite his Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

North, the man identified by Meese as the administration official with precise knowlege of the operation, did so on Monday. There was no indication that the committee was preparing to confer immunity anytime soon, and Durenberger said any possible decision was a distant possibility.

"He serves the president and wishes to cooperate with every committee that wishes to investigate," Poindexter's attorney, Richard Beckler, said outside the guarded committee room.

But Beckler said that in view of the expected appointment of an independent counsel and requests for testimony at unspecified "other places...I would be doing a disservice unless I asked my client to invoke his rights."

In another development, CIA spokesman George Lauder denied a published report that the CIA comingled profits from the Iran sales in the same account with funds for covert support for rebels fighting the Soviet-backed government of Afghanistan.

"The only funds related to the Iran program that passed through agency hands were the $12 million owed to the Pentagon for the arms," Lauder said.

Lauder added that "CIA received no profits from any transaction with the Iranians, nor were any funds that passed through agency hands diverted to the Contras or any other covert action program."

Crack

drug usage can be attributed to several factors, including education and public awareness.

He said a study by the National Institute for Drug Abuse published this year revealed nearly one-third of the students surveyed at two- and four-year colleges have tried cocaine at least once by the time they graduate.

However, the majority of users are in their late 20s and early 30s.

"People who use the drug are not just college students," Arck said. "They come from all walks of life — business men and women, housewives, etc."

Arck said he believes crack has the potential to be highly attractive to both men and women.

"I think it will be a bigger problem because it doesn't have calories or an unpleasant taste," he said. "Crack is desirable because it is easy to use. It doesn't have the negative characteristics that some drugs have. It gives you more energy, more time in the day."

Current statistics indicate that cocaine is used regularly by nearly 5 million people in the United States, Arck said. At least 20 million have tried it.

Riley County Police Department Capt. Larry Woodyard said cocaine use in Manhattan is "fairly prevalent," but the department has no documented cases of crack use or possession.

Arck said he believes crack will be around for a few more years, until another, more attractive drug takes its place.

"I would predict that over the next few years crack and cocaine will have a significant effect on college campuses, including K-State," he said. "The drug is a sign of the times — it's fast, it's fashionable, and it's expensive."

Senate seeks papers, questions CIA official about Iran arms deal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate investigators quizzed the CIA's No. 2 man for four hours and subpoenaed documents around the country Thursday in an expanding probe into the secret sale of arms to Iran and transfer of profits to Nicaraguan rebels. President Reagan said Cabinet officers are free to decide whether to invoke the Fifth Amendment when their turn comes to testify.

A long-distance disagreement surfaced within the administration over the roots of the president's controversial Iranian arms policy. White House spokesman Larry Speakes said "we don't agree with" Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger's contention that Reagan acted on bad advice when he decided there were responsible officials to deal with in Iran other than the "lunatics" who run the country.

Reagan, embroiled in the most serious crisis of his presidency, has defended his decision to sell arms to Iran as part of a secret diplomatic initiative to re-establish ties with the strategically-placed Persian Gulf nation. But he says he was unaware that money in connection with the sales was being funneled through a Swiss bank account to Contra rebels battling the Nicaraguan government.

The money was made available at a time when direct and indirect government military assistance to the Contras was prohibited by law, and there was evidence that the Justice Department was looking into the operations of a privately financed support program for Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The president announced Tuesday that his administration would seek appointment of an independent counsel to probe the issue, although the White House disclosed that Attorney General Edwin Meese III is still at work on the formal application.

In Congress, House Democratic Leader Jim Wright of Texas and GOP Leader Bob Michel of Illinois announced they would oversee creation of a special, 15-member "blue ribbon panel" to coordinate the investigation. Wright said that would avoid a "circus-like" atmosphere that might arise from multiple probes.

Senate leaders agreed on a "supercommittee" of their own to include 13 members, although a spokesman for GOP Leader Bob Dole said his boss and Democratic Leader Robert Byrd of West Virginia had not yet concluded arrangements. Dole issued a statement saying the president will decide on Friday whether to call for a special session of Congress to expedite creation of the committee.

In the meantime, the Senate Intelligence Committee held the investigative spotlight.

With extraordinary security provisions in effect, the panel heard first from unnamed U.S. officials involved in covert operations, then questioned CIA Deputy Director Robert Gates for more than four hours.

Sen. David Durenberger, R-Minn., chairman of the committee, said the witnesses were providing a "very

Liquor industry deregulation concerns small-store owners

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reporter

If recommendations made by a Liquor Law Review Commission pass, the Kansas liquor industry would move into a new age. But for local liquor store owners, progress is a relative term.

According to a recent article in The Wichita Eagle-Beacon, a 13-member commission recommended the elimination of the minimum price mark up on retail liquor sales. The mark up is designed to deny the stimulation of the sale of alcohol, while still providing profits for the industry.

A study by the state Division of Alcohol Beverage Control concluded this deregulation would wipe out 800 of the estimated 1,000 liquor stores in Kansas.

Though the consumers would benefit, Manhattan area store owners are divided on the issue. Most feel that a store with a large volume could withstand the competition, whereas a smaller store would be ruined.

Mary Moyer, owner of Hayes Retail Liquor Store, 2706 Anderson Ave., described her store as "dinky," and she is not optimistic about the effects of the change.

"It will very possibly put me out of business," she said. "People with more hip-pocket money will be able to skate this thing out. If it does go through, there will be only two or three stores left in Manhattan."

But the situation gets more complex. The commission also recommended that grocery stores be allowed to sell beer stronger than 3.2 percent alcohol, called "strong beer." This, too, would increase competition.

Ben Behem, owner of Behem's Retail Liquor, 1503 Yuma St., said he favors the change more than he is against it.

"I have a big inventory, but this is a touchy situation," he said. "If they deregulate it (the liquor business), then a lot of stores will be driven out of business. But if grocery stores are allowed to sell strong beer, they will eventually be able to sell liquor and wine. We will have to be deregulated to compete," he said.

He also said liquor stores may cease to exist if the mark up is kept and grocery stores are allowed to sell liquor. Behem said his brother runs a small liquor store in New York, where this is the case.

He said his brother told him a liquor store can make it only if it has a good location or it specializes in something.

Allowing liquor stores to advertise brands is another recommendation.

Coliseum construction continues on schedule

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

Construction is well underway at the site of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

Vince Cool, associate director of facilities planning, said the majority of the construction so far has involved "moving a lot of dirt." He said it is necessary to do the earthwork for the seating in the coliseum first for steel construction to begin later.

Cool said 160,000 yards of dirt are being brought from west of Manhattan to the site directly south of the KSU stadium.

He also said contractors are beginning to drill pier foundations, of which there will be more than 1,000. These foundations will support the building structure.

"At this point," Cool said, "the contractors are well ahead of schedule. They have taken advantage of the exceptional weather. We'll work as long as it's not too far below freezing."

Cool said a "major milepost" would be reached in June or July if steel construction could be started.

"If we can do this," he said, "we'll be in great shape."

Charlie Hein, acting director of the coliseum, said work is also going on in relation to the operation and management of the coliseum.

Hein said he has developed an outline for two committees for the coliseum.

The Committee on Coliseum Use would review and give input on "some of the outward policies and procedures" for the operation of the coliseum.

Hein said he would like to have this committee in operation shortly after the start of the Spring 1987 semester. The committee would be composed of 14 members, half of whom would be students selected through the appointment process of the Student Government Association.

"It is important to set up the management of the coliseum so the multipurpose facility is carried out and the coliseum pays its own way," Hein said.

The Committee on Public Relations and Marketing will be a group designed to bring event ideas to coliseum management. Hein is planning to send letters to about 40 groups in Manhattan, surrounding areas and the University to invite them to be represented on this committee.

"The whole idea," Hein said, "is to make everybody a part of it."

Hein said he is revising plans for these committees on the advice of Tom Parkinson, University consultant for the coliseum.

Hein has also been working on event ideas for the opening of the col-

Student Senate vote fails to override veto

By DARLA RYAN
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate voted Thursday night not to override the student body president's veto of the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum bill.

The bill, which would allow students to vote on how they would like to be represented, was passed by Senate, but was vetoed last week by Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics.

Senate first voted on a motion to reconsider the entire bill.

Susan Baird, senior in journalism and mass communications, said if Senate votes to reconsider, and then approves the bill, the credibility of the governing body would suffer. She said Senate should make decisions, and stick to them.

The move to reconsider the bill failed, which led to debate concerning the motion to override the veto.

Some senators expressed concern that the bill was too complex to send to a referendum.

"This is a very complex issue and I think it would be very difficult to communicate all the information to the students," said Wally Brockoff, junior in agricultural economics.

The motion to override Johnson's veto failed by a close vote.

"If you think that by not overriding the veto, it will keep the representation bill off the ballot, you're sadly mistaken," said Lee White, co-sponsor of the bill and senior in journalism and mass communications.

White and several other people in favor of the referendum bill are currently conducting a petition drive that would place the issue on the February ballot. White said he needs about 2,000 signatures to do so.

To override the veto, Senate would have needed a two-thirds majority. The vote was 21 in the negative, and 18 in the affirmative. Two Senate members abstained, with five not present for the vote.

Doctors unsure medicare will pay bills

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Almost half the nation's doctors feel pressured to release Medicare patients from the hospital before they are ready to go home, according to a survey for the American Medical Association.

The nationwide survey of 1,000 physicians, released Friday, found that 48 perent of the doctors felt "unduly pressured" and only 28 percent felt no pressure because of concerns about reimbursement under the present Medicare system. The remaining 24 percent either were unsure or did not answer.

"It's becoming an invasion of quality of care," Dr. John J. Coury, president of the nation's largest physicians' organization, said in a telephone interview. "We don't feel the quality of care is negotiable, ... and we're going to resist it."

The question did not pinpoint blame for the pressure.

In another survey question, 56 percent of the doctors polled said they felt their control over patient treatment decisions in the hospital had decreased during the last several years.

Only 6 percent answered that it had increased. Thirty-eight percent said their control over decisions had remained the same, according to the survey, conducted by an independent research firm, Tarrance, Hill, Newport and Ryan of Houston.

The feeling of decreasing control was especially pronounced among physicians in obstetrics-gynecology — 66 percent — but the feeling was also common among surgeons, psychiatrists and general practitioners, the survey indicated. However, no reasons were given for the doctors' responses.

The AMA has strongly opposed rules put into effect by the Reagan administration to contain soaring medical costs. The rules limit in advance the amount of reimbursement the government will provide for

Israeli soldiers kill two students

RAMALLAH, Occupied West Bank — Israeli soldiers killed two Palestinian students Thursday when they opened fire on a crowd of demonstrators at a West Bank university. More than 20 protesters were wounded by Israeli gunfire in a day of violence that swept from the campus to a nearby hospital.

Outside the Ramallah Hospital, where dozens of Palestinians gathered to await word of injured relatives and to donate blood, Israeli troops fired rubber bullets and injured three people in an attempt to disperse the crowd.

Palestinian reports said three students were killed and more than 20 were wounded at Bir Zeit University, 15 miles north of Jerusalem. But the army denied a third person was killed.

Twenty-five students were admitted to Ramallah Hospital, five miles from the campus, said a doctor who spoke on condition he not be identified. The Israeli army reported eight wounded, two of them in serious condition.

Jury convicts 14 of assassination

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada — A jury on Thursday convicted 14 of 18 defendants of murdering Prime Minister Maurice Bishop, whose assassination during a military coup triggered the U.S. invasion of this Caribbean island in 1983.

Three defendants were found guilty of manslaughter and one was acquitted. A murder conviction is punishable by death by hanging.

All 18 defendants were accused of murdering Bishop, three Cabinet members and seven others at Fort Rupert, the stone garrison and parade ground at the edge of the harbor where Bishop had been carried after being freed from house arrest by several thousand supporters. All the defendants maintained they were innocent.

The defendants displayed no emotion when the verdicts were read. The jury of five men and four women deliberated for three hours before reaching their verdicts.

Those found guilty of murdering Bishop and another 10 people were Gen. Hudson Austin, the commander who overthrew Bishop's government; Bernard Coard, alleged mastermind of the coup, and his wife, Phyllis; and Callistus Bernard.

Counties run low on state funds

Four Kansas counties — Johnson, Wyandotte, Leavenworth and Butler — are using up state allotments to pay for lawyers who defend indigent defendants so fast that they'll run out of money before the end of the current fiscal year, a state official says.

"The attorneys in those counties will not be paid for the work they do," said Ron Miles, director of the state Board of Indigent Defense Services.

Miles said his agency's appropriation from the 1986 Legislature hasn't been adequate. Further, he said, the number of people eligible for court-appointed lawyers is expected to be up 12 percent from 1985 by the end of the year, in part because of increased arrests and rising unemployment.

He said his agency has requested a supplemental appropriation from the 1987 Legislature.

"But because of the state's fiscal situation, I'm not very optimistic," he said.

Now, with Gov.-elect Mike Hayden calling for a 3.8 percent cut in all state spending, Miles has recommended that the hourly fee for lawyers representing the indigent be cut from $30 to $20. The board will vote today on that proposal.

Speakes resigns White House post

WASHINGTON — Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes announced Thursday he is resigning his White House post after 5° years to join the giant Wall Street investment firm of Merrill Lynch &Co.

Speakes, who has been President Reagan's principal spokesman since press secretary James S. Brady was critically wounded in the assassination attempt against Reagan on March 30, 1981, said he would remain in his job until his successor is ready to take over. He was reported two weeks ago to be on the verge of resigning to take the Merrill Lynch job.

He joins Merrill Lynch in New York as a senior vice president Feb. 1, 1987. Sources close to the firm have said Speakes will earn about $250,000 a year in salary and benefits. Speakes himself refused to confirm that Thursday.

Administration sources, asking to remain anonymous, have said Interior Under Secretary Ann Dore McLaughlin is Speakes' most likely successor. If picked by Reagan, she would be the first woman to serve as the president's chief spokesperson.

Marlin Fitzwater, Vice President George Bush's press secretary, also has been mentioned as a likely candidate for Speakes' job.

Brady, who has never fully recovered from his injuries, continues to hold the title of press secretary to the president.

Progress made in AIDS research

WASHINGTON — Scientists have taken what they think is an important step toward producing a vaccine against AIDS, showing for the first time that only a fragment of protein from the responsible virus is necessary for developing antibodies against it.

A team of industry, government and university researchers says the segment of viral protein spurs high levels of antibodies that neutralize the virus in test animals such as goats.

In addition, the researchers say they showed this protein can be inexpensively mass-produced in large, pure quantities using genetically engineered bacteria.

However, they cautioned, it remains to be proven whether the protein segment can produce sufficient neutralizing antibodies in humans to protect them against acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Even if effective, a practical preventive vaccine still is years away because of the extensive safety and effectiveness tests that would be required before approval, experts say.

Farmers to confront tighter credit

WASHINGTON — Nationally, farmers are whittling away some of their huge debt but will find additional credit still tighter next year as bankers and other lenders continue to pull in their belts.

An Agriculture Department outlook conference, wrapping up three days of meetings, was told Thursday by an Oklahoma banker: "Risk management will surely be the name of the game in 1987."

And the Farmers Home Administration, burdened by thousands of overdue loans, will begin "significant write-offs" next year, the head of the agency told the conference.

Vance L. Clark said, "We'll begin in earnest in 1987" to write off loans that have been overdue for years. He said the losses could go as high as $2 billion.

An agency spokesman, Marlyn Aycock, said FmHA had about $29.5 billion in farm loans outstanding as of Sept. 30. Of the agency's 270,000 farm borrowers, about 79,000 were delinquent. They owed about $6.5 billion.

Of the delinquencies, nearly $4.8 billion owed by almost 50,000 borrowers has been overdue for three years or more, he said.

Tax-exempt employees need to file new forms by Dec. 12

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

The payroll section of K-State's Controller's Office is requesting campus employees who claim exempt status for federal withholding tax to file new W-4 forms for 1987 by Dec. 12.

The Internal Revenue Service regulations require that W-4 forms must be filed each calendar year by employees who qualify and want to continue their exempt status.

"Employees can pick up a W-4 form in the department where they work," said Warren Strauss, University controller.

The reason for the early deadline is that the pay cycle for the state of Kansas goes from the 18th day of one month to the 17th day of the next month, Strauss said.

Hourly students have a pay cycle that begins the 16th day of one month, continuing to the 15th day of the next month. The forms need to be turned in by Dec. 12 to allow adequate time for them to be recorded in payroll records and become effective the first day of the December payroll period, Strauss said.

To claim exemption from withholding tax, an employee must not have incurred any liability for federal income tax for calander year 1986, anticipate paying any federal income tax for calendar year 1987, and claim exemption from withholding on a W-4 form.

Hourly students need only file a W-4 form. Forms dated Nov. 18, 1986, or later, and received in the payroll office by Dec. 12 will be effective the first day of the December pay period, Strauss said. Any forms received after the deadline will become effective the first day of the January pay period.

Monthly graduate students also need to only file a W-4 form, and the graduate student transfer form is not needed. Students must note either "Renewal" or "Tax Change" at the top of the form.

All other employees who claim exemption must file a W-4 form with "Exempt Renewal" checked at the top.

All forms should be returned to Personnel Services, Room 228, Anderson Hall, Strauss said. If the forms are not available at their departments, employees can obtain one in Anderson 212.

Individuals with questions about the forms should contact the payroll section of the controller's office.

Orchestra to present final concert; feature diverse 'program of colors'

By The Collegian Staff

The Kansas State Orchestra will perform its final concert of the fall semester at 8 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

Conductor Adrian Bryttan describes the free concert as a "program of colors. We have something from every period and every style," he said.

Famous pieces rarely played in orchestra because of their difficulty will be performed, Bryttan said.

Music to be featured includes Mussorgsky's exerpt "Night on Bald Mountain" from Walt Disney's "Fantasia," which Bryttan describes as "very dramatic" and "frightening."

Another major piece to be performed is Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Fawn," which will include a flute solo.

Also to be played are Rossini's bright and bubbly "Semiramide Overture," and Dvorak's colorful and rhythmic "Slavonic Dance."

In addition, Tangents II, a contemporary piece for orchestra and prerecorded tape by Hanley Jackson, composer in residence at K-State, will be performed.

The concert will offer great variety from different combinations of instruments, Bryttan said. It will include a mixture of all the colors, styles and effects an orchestra can create, he said.

Future events include symphonic concerts April 14 and May 5, the opera "Merry Wives of Windsor" March 5-7 and a repeat performance of "Dance Gala" Jan. 23 in the K-State Union.

Soviet Union permits some private business

While the reputation of the United States falters, the Soviet Union is looking better all the time.

Last week the Supreme Soviet legalized moonlighting, called nalevo (working "to the left") for 29 types of private businesses. Moonlighters in services including carpentry and auto repair will now be able to supplement their incomes in the open. The practioners must register with their local governments and will be required to pay up to 13 percent income tax on their earnings.

Though one might argue the Soviet Union is merely legalizing a practice to gain revenue, the law will benefit workers as well.

The economy will be strengthened, incomes will improve and the diversified services will offer freedom of choice to the Soviets.

Currently, collective farmers are allowed to purchase a small portion of land on which they can grow products to sell privately. Prices charged for the crops are regulated by the government. The case may be the same for the 29 legalized businesses.

Whether the prices are limited or not, citizens are gaining greater control over their standard of living. The Supreme Soviet should be commended for this step toward improving their economy and helping relations between the government and the people.

Bus service cutbacks to hurt Kansas riders

Oh, the bliss of having a personal set of wheels in which to cruise around — a luxury many can afford. But there are many who cannot afford their own car.

In the past, bus service has provided transportation for people who can't or don't want to drive. Trailways Inc. recently proposed a plan to eliminate all service to 62 of the 75 Kansas communities it serves. With this proposal, 40 communities would be left without bus service and 22 would retain some service with other bus lines.

This drastic cut would severely hinder students who use the bus transportation to go home for breaks, not to mention the businesses in the communities who use the bus lines for a courier service.

Manhattan hospitals use the twice-a-day bus route from Wichita to ship blood tests to hospitals and receive fresh blood from the center there. Without the bus lines, this service would be done by a courier service which only runs once a day, or by the Kansas Highway Patrol.

Other companies use the buses on one-way trips for jobs such as reclaiming vehicles or picking-up rented vehicles. Trailways is conducting public hearings in 18 communities to allow citizens to voice their opinions about the proposed cutbacks. Although the company is being fair by holding the hearings, the cutbacks are a bit harsh.

The routes run every day, and the company says it is losing money on them. Instead of cutting the routes altogether, another possibility would be running the routes every other day or three times a week. This solution might slightly hinder those who use the bus lines often, but at least they would have a chance to get where they need to go.

Personal confusing

Editor,

An anonymous advertisement in Thursday's classified personals column has created confusion regarding the ad's sponsorship.

Some people apparently believe either Students for Educational Awareness or sponsors of the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum bill sponsored this personal. Nobody from either group was connected in any way with this advertisement.

The ad stated: "Question: Why did S.J. learn to divide? Answer: The Greek System knows how to multiply too well. SRJ."

Students for Educational Awareness and this bill's sponsors denounce any attempt to make the legislation or the petition drive a means by which greeks and non-greeks can be divided.

In the future, I hope all political advertising in the newspaper will include the person's or organization's full name to prevent further confusion of this sort.

In support of SDI

Editor,

During the past several months there has been quite a bit of talk concerning the Strategic Defense Initiative (Star Wars). The question that comes to mind when discussing this issue is, "Do we really need this system and if we do, then why?" To put this question into better perspective, let's look at all sides of the issue.

In theory, SDI started as a defense system that both the United States and the Soviet Union would do research, and that both countries would share their information. We hoped that by sharing the information, SDI would become a reality and deployment could begin. By both countries deploying this system we would have a defense that would make ballistic missiles obsolete. Once there is no need for missiles, we could disarm and destroy them. This plan went awry because each country involved decided they wanted to be the first to deploy the system, thus having the advantage.

Even though there seems to be many bugs in SDI, there has been a lot of good come out of the research. There have been many technological breakthroughs as a result of SDI. One example is the development of ultrafast computers built for picking out incoming dummy warheads. An adaptation of this computer can be used for solving more complex scientific and mathematical problems. These computers can solve more problems than ever because they operate so much faster than existing computers.

Another aspect of SDI is the economic ramifications. SDI can be thought of as an economic engine that will drive us into the next century. There are 15 defense contractors in the country now and they employ millions of people. With unemployment the way it is currently we can't afford a flood of these proportions on the job market.

I don't want to see a third world war in which everything known to mankind is blown to bits. I am in support of anything that will prevent this terrible atrocity from happening. I think if we get back to the original plan of sharing information we can pull this off. Suffice it to say I am in support of this program.

Industrial accidents hurt countries

RATTAN NATH
Guest Columnist

Wednesday was the second anniversary of the worst industrial chemical accident in the history at Bhopal, India. More than 200,000 people were injured and several thousands lost their lives as a consequence of a poisonous gas leak from a storage tank belonging to the Union Carbide Corp.

Since then, as far as relief for the victims is concerned, very little has happened due to the politicization of the event.

The picture is complicated by the fact that Union Carbide is a U.S.-based multinational corporation. It is not clear whether decisions of the Indian courts are enforceable in this country, or what is the proper mechanism to handle such a situation. The amount of damages involved is $3.12 billion and the Indian subsidiary does not have enough assets to cover the claims.

Furthermore, civil rights groups and the Indian government claim the parent corporation itself is liable because it had a policy of monitoring the safety systems and had controlling interest in the subsidiary. The fact that all the major safety systems were inoperative on the fateful morning added to the severity of the catastrophe, which was enhanced further by the management's decision not to raise an alarm.

Since that incident in 1984, we have witnessed two more major accidents. First were the "brave new world" experiments by the operators at the Chernobyl nuclear plant and then more recently the operation in Basel, Switzerland, that put out half a million fish, the local industries depending on the Rhine River and a couple of chemical fires. In both, the cases the affected populations are in different countries.

The above incidents are inevitable consequences of the way the modern world is structured, both economically and politically. Economically, the chemical and allied industries are an unavoidable part of life due to the need for their products and the jobs created. While the Western and Eastern worlds are already heavily industrialized, the Third World is being sucked in rapidly due to the obvious benefits and the market forces.

What is alarming though, is the lessons that should have been learned from the experience of the industrialized nations, seem to be totally lost on the Third World and to some extent the wealthier nations as well.

At Bhopal, despite zoning laws that prohibited residential areas near the Union Carbide plant, the local and state governments looked the other way as shanty towns sprang up all around. The company and the city had no real policy for coping with a disaster. A foolhardy faith in technology characterized the attitude of the leadership. When the fatal error did occur, the severity caught the victims napping.

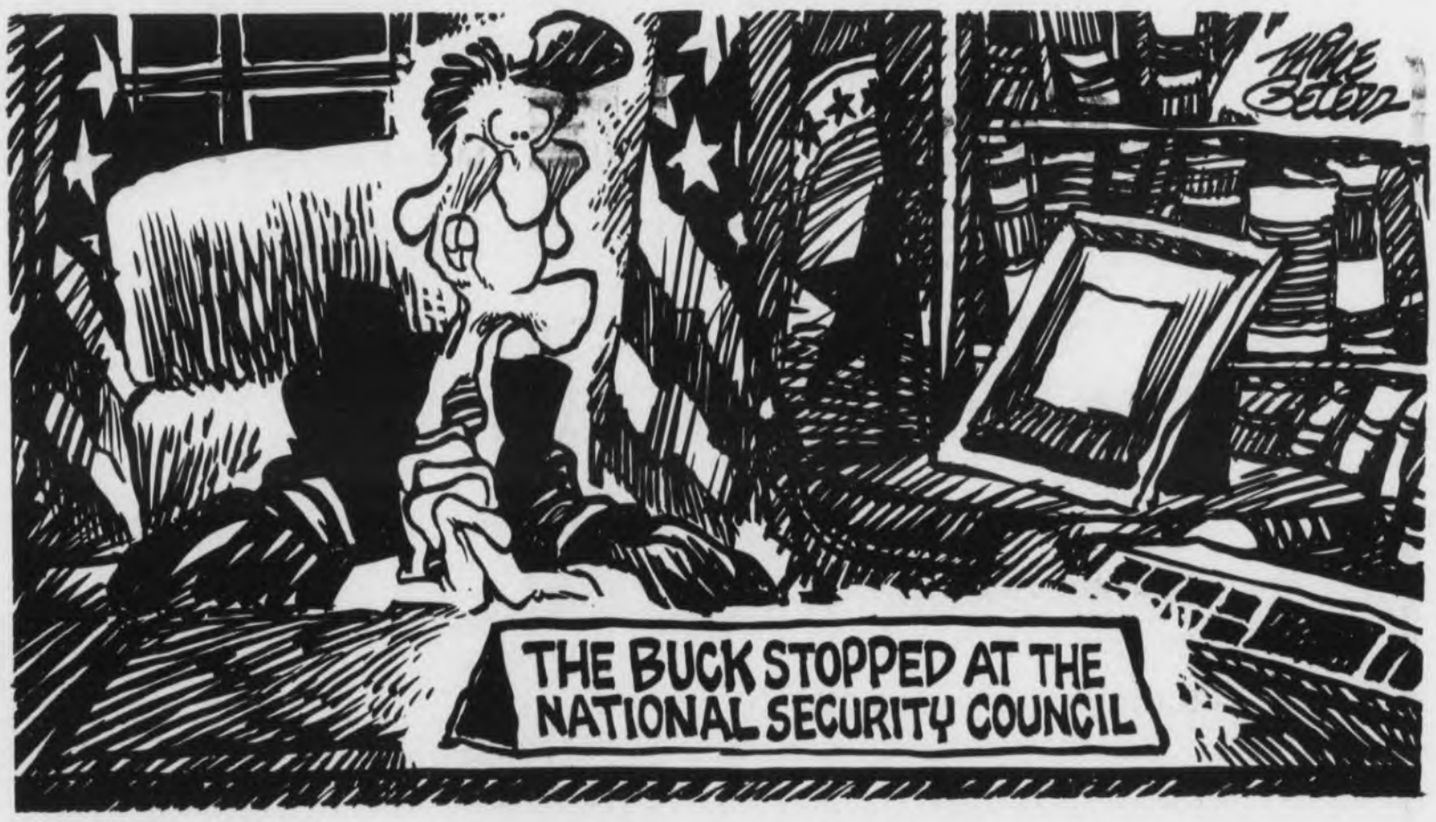
The political structure of the world is potentially a retarding influence on progress. The international order has been organized as a brotherhood of unequal nations intentionally. Though we do have some agreements on human rights (the Geneva and the Helsinki accords), they have no mechanism for enforcement.

The unit in any equation is the nation, which is an abstract concept, but is the only one that has its sovereignty and rights guaranteed, and its internal affairs are sacrosanct from outside interference. The result in limits the scope of internationally uniform standards for industrial safety. We have to depend on bilateral treaties that are hard to come by. The limitation on the jurisdiction of the courts in different countries makes any case involving international boundaries a legal mess.

In the history of the United States, an important success story has been of the judicial system that has taken the initiative in changing the society into a fairer system more often than the presidents, who as a rule for all their charisma, have been inconsistent and mostly talk. The Bhopal case for damages is an excellent example.

As is typical of any tragedy, this one had its quota of ambulance chasers and company spokespersons lying in face of a disaster and human misery to minimize the perceptions of the true scale of the accident. Union Carbide held that though the parent company did have a controlling interest in the subsidiary, the liability rested solely with the subsidiary.

It further tried to corner sympathy by suggesting sabotage while ignoring smaller accidents at the same plant that claimed a few workers' lives. The safety systems were all out of order but no extra precautions were taken or warnings issued despite a policy of inspecting and issuing safety directives from the parent company. The plant was not making a profit, so cost cutting took its toll in the form of untrained, low-paid workers and reduced vigilance.



The Indian government hardly fared better since it failed to live up to its duty of regulating the industry, in this case despite warnings of an imminent disaster in state legislative proceedings. The plant had been a target of social workers due to its location in a residential area and a shoddy safety record.

After the accident, the question of compensation arose and the difficulty lay in implementing any decision by the Indian courts on the parent company in the United States. Because the accident took place in India, the proper venue for litigation was India, but there was no way to implement an adverse decision except the seizure of the assets in India. Because there was no real precedent either way or treaty between the United States and India, the lawyers decided to appeal the case in the United States due to the greater power enjoyed by the judiciary and in the interest of speed and effectiveness.

The ruling handed down by U.S. District Court Judge Keenan set down the conditions for Union Carbide and the Indian government to allow the case to be tried in the Indian courts while defining the role for the U.S. courts to implement the decisions in conformity with the law in the two countries. As the litigation proceeds, the details shall be worked out for an interface between the two judicial systems.

Tuesday, Daya Verma, of McGill University in Canada, will make a presentation on this subject. The talk and the discussion session shall be supplemented by a film by a leading Indian director on the accident to give an idea of the magnitude of the tragedy as well as a sense of reality. The presentation is at 7 p.m. in the Union Little Theatre.

Democrats vie for 1988 candidacy

DAVID BRODER
Syndicated Columnist

WASHINGTON — Overshadowed by the headlines coming out of Ronald Reagan's White House, the Democrats have begun the long courtship dance that will lead to the choice of their 1988 presidential nominee. The process commands attention because it is no longer safe to assume the Democratic candidate will automatically be a loser.

True, the Democrats have elected only two non-incumbents to the White House since Franklin Roosevelt in 1932. But consider the circumstances: Jimmy Carter won in 1976, two years after Watergate forced Richard Nixon to step down. John F. Kennedy won in 1960, two years after charges of wrongdoing led to the resignation of Dwight Eisenhower's chief of staff, Sherman Adams.

The lesson is that the country turns to the Democrats when gross misbehavior in the White House tarnishes the GOP. We can no longer be sure that won't be the case in 1988.

The pre-Thanksgiving meeting of the Democratic National Committee gave state chairmen and DNC members a first opportunity to review the field. Most of them are still uncommitted, but they talked a lot about what is missing from the race — what is present.

One big missing element is a white Southern candidate. Jesse L. Jackson, a likely contender, was doing some warm-up agitating and headline grabbing on the sidelines of the party meeting. But at a time when almost every Democrat wants a white Southerner on the ticket, and when the Southern states have put together an early regional primary on March 8, 1988, there is no assurance that any Southerner but Jackson will run for the presidential nomination.

Sen. Sam Nunn of Georgia might, despite saying he wants to spend all his time being chairman of the Armed Services Committee. He's gained so much respect and visibility by his comments on the current White House fiasco he may have to run. If he doesn't, former Virginia Gov. Charles S. Robb might, and he is marketable, too, despite his protestations that he'd rather support Nunn or someone else. Sen. Dale Bumpers of Arkansas is thinking about it also and has promised his ardent would-be supporter, Sen. Paul Simon of Illinois, an early answer.

But the fact remains that 14 months before the first test — the Iowa caucuses, which are likely to move up to Feb. 8, 1988 — no Southerner but Jackson has a campaign structure in place.

The second thing the party leaders found conspicuously missing was any demonstration of strength by the presumed front-runners, retiring Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado and re-elected Gov. Mario M. Cuomo of New York.

Cuomo was, as usual, absent, leaving it to such agents as New York Democratic chairman Larry Kirwan to drop hints that Cuomo's private ruminations on the risks and rewards of a presidential candidacy just might bring him to a positive conclusion long about April. By happy coincidence, that's when Nathan Landow, the pro-Cuomo leader of a group of fat cats calling themselves Impact '88, would like to convene his bank-account caucus and seek consensus on a candidate.

Landow estimates the group could raise a tidy $7 million or $8 million for its choice. With Cuomo's carryover $4 million from his New York campaign, that would make him the instant leader in dollars, but leave untested whether his message will sell or his political machine function west of the Hudson or south of Staten Island.

As for Hart, he stopped by the meeting just long enough to tell everyone he and his staff are moving to Denver and will be in touch. This has not been a banner year for him. The Gallup poll reports that of every three Democrats who listed Hart as their first or second choice for the nomination last January, only two were of the same view in October. His lead over Cuomo shrank from 23 points to five, even though Cuomo stayed essentially flat.

That is not an auspicious trend. Hart goes off into the sunset lugging an unpaid debt of $2.3 million from his 1984 campaign. Aide Billy Shore says, "It has not kept him from doing anything he's wanted to do in the last two years and it won't in the next two years." But one able campaign consultant who has been wooed by Hart was telling the Democrats he is making no commitments until he satisfies himself that Hart will be able to pay his bills.

Given the vacuum in the South and the uncertainty about the "front-runners," it is not surprising that the Democratic leaders see a real chance for a dark horse to win their nomination. They don't know his name, but the initials are BB&G, standing for those three young lawyers — Bruce Babbit, the retiring governor of Arizona; Joe Biden, the senator from Delaware about to become Judiciary Committee chairman; and Dick Gephardt, the representative from St. Louis and chairman of the House Democratic caucus.

Scholarship semifinalists to receive aid

By The Collegian Staff

Forty-three of Kansas' 161 National Merit semifinalists have accepted KSU Presidential Scholarships from University President Jon Wefald for the 1987-88 school year.

According to Larry Viterna, director of financial aid, the scholarships were funded through the KSU Foundation. The foundation, which is supported by K-State alumni, is sponsoring the scholarships in the amount of $2,000 a year. This is the first year K-State has offered the scholarships to high school seniors who are National Merit semifinalists, he said.

University offers $2,000 per year

"This is K-State's attempt to do something about keeping outstanding Kansas scholars in Kansas for their post-secondary education," Viterna said.

He said these individuals represent the top two-tenths of 1 percent of college-bound students in the state and have been receiving offers from institutions all across the country.

To be eligible to participate in the Merit Program, a student must: take the PSAT/NMSQT at the proper time in high school, be enrolled full time in a secondary school and progressing normally toward graduation, be a citizen of the United States or taking steps to become one as soon as qualified and plan to attend a regionally accredited college or university.

"About one-half of 1 percent of the high school seniors in each state are selected as semifinalists," Viterna said.

He said if students go on to become finalists, which will be announced in February, K-State plans to offer a $5,500 KSU Presidential Scholarship. It will cover the student's full cost of tuition, books and fees for the year.

The scholarship will be renewable for the student's sophomore, junior and senior years and K-State officials hope funds will be available to offer similar scholarships next year.

Viterna said the Putnam Foundation and University continue to award scholarships for students with outstanding academic records.

K-State awards more than $1.6 million through its colleges and general scholarship funds.

University appoints new controller to position

By The Collegian Staff

Warren Strauss, former assistant controller for the University, was appointed controller effective Nov. 18.

Strauss replaced John Moore, who was appointed last spring as assistant vice president for administrations and finance.

Strauss came to the University in 1965 and worked as an inventory accountant in the accounting office. After holding that position for one year, he was promoted to head of cashiers, loans and inventory services.

"I worked in that position for about 10 years," Strauss said.

In 1976, Strauss was promoted to the position of assistant controller, which he held until his promotion.

As the K-State controller, Strauss's new responsibilities include directing and managing the operations of the University's central controller's offices. This involves the activities of accounting, cashiers and loans, grants and contracts, payroll, purchasing and reports statistics.

Another responsibility is to provide collection, custody, investment, disbursement and accounting of all monies of the University.

In addition to his daily responsibilities, Strauss is currently involved with the adoption of a new financial record system, which began July 1, 1986.

Implementation of the new financial record system has been difficult, Strauss said, because of the lack of additional help needed to complete the program, a result of University budget cuts.

"It will take a year to 18 months to fully implement it," Strauss said.

After receiving the opportunity to come to K-State in 1965, Strauss began taking classes part time, averaging six hours a semester before receiving his degree in accounting in 1979.

Hair salon gives beer to legal age patrons

By The Collegian Staff

Bars aren't the only establishments serving beer in Aggieville these days. In fact, one Aggieville hair salon is giving it away with the purchase of a haircut.

"A lot of people's reactions are disbelief," said Steve Ruffin, manager of Crimpers, 613 N. Manhattan Ave.

"They've never heard of it," he said. "It's never even hit their mind that anyone would have beer at a salon.

"But most people like it. I haven't heard of anyone who didn't like it," Ruffin said.

Ruffin said he got the idea from previous salon experience in Austin, Texas.

"I got the idea because when I worked in Austin we always served beer and wine," he said.

The salon in Aggieville, however, doesn't serve wine. Due to state law, the salon is allowed to serve only 3.2 percent beer.

Richard Hodson, assistant attorney general assigned to the Bureau of Alcoholic Beverage Control, said there was no legal problem with the serving of beer at the salon.

"If it's 3.2 beer, and if they're not charging for it, they don't even need a license," Hodson said.

Hodson said the salon could serve beer to anyone who is of age, but if it serves beer to any underage client, it would be liable.

"Everybody that comes in fills out a client card that has their birthdate, and if we're not sure, we always find out," Ruffin said.

"They have to be of age," he said.

Ruffin said there is a limit of two beers per customer to avoid a possible lawsuit that might arise from a client becoming intoxicated.

"For six-point beer, you'd have to have a license; plus 3.2 beer has less alcohol, so it's less likely to make anyone tipsy," Ruffin said.

Hays State Bank closes, sets post-depression failure record

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State banking officials declared the Hays State Bank and Trust Co. insolvent and ordered it closed Thursday, setting a post-depression record of 14 bank failures across the state this year.

Bill Olcheski, spokesman for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. in Washington, said deposits and liabilities of the failed bank would be assumed by the Farmers State Bank and Trust Co., of Hays., subject to court approval.

The two offices of Hays State Bank would be closed but its customers could conduct business at the assuming bank's two locations today, Olcheski said.

State Banking Commissioner Eugene T. Barrett Jr. took charge of the Hays State Bank Sept. 18, acting on a concern that customers might make a run on deposits.

At that time, Barrett said a run on the bank's deposits would jeopardize a proposed FDIC-assisted merger with Kansas State Bank and Trust Co. of Wichita.

However, Assistant State Banking Commissioner Mike Heitman said shortly before the bank was closed at noon Thursday that FDIC officials had denied the Kansas State Bank proposal.

Heitman said members of the insurance corporation's Washington staff had found the KSB&T proposal "not to be in the interest of the FDIC." The FDIC was named receiver of the failed bank after Barrett ordered it closed.

A law the Kansas Legislature passed this year to allow limited branch banking did not come into play during the acquisition of Hays State Bank Thursday, Heitman said. Banks previously have been allowed to purchase assets and deposits of a failed bank within the same city, he said.

The 14 bank failures in 1986 eclipses a record of 13 such closings the state set in 1985. The last year in which there was more than 14 bank failures in Kansas was 1933, when 43 banks closed.

Olcheski said Farmers State Bank would assume $31.2 million in deposits of the failed bank and had agreed to pay the FDIC a purchase premium of $51,000. He said Farmers State Bank also would purchase certain of the failed bank's loans and other assets for $15.0 million.

To facilitate the transaction, the FDIC would advance $18.4 million to the assuming bank and would retain assets of Hays State Bank with a book value of $19.8 million, Olcheski said.

Gregory Coyle, an FDIC closing manager at the bank, said that on Nov. 19, Hays State Bank had $34.6 million in assets and had 5,567 deposit accounts, all of which were below the $100,000 federal deposit insurance limit.

Of the bank's $22.5 million in loans, almost $18 million were classified as substandard, Coyle said. Since 1984, the bank had written off loans valued at about $2.7 million, he said.

About $8 million of the $18 million in substandard loans had been classified by the state as a loss, according to Coyle, who said that means the FDIC probably would lose the money.

Coyle added that 13 percent of the bank's loans were in agriculture, 17 in oil and energy and the remainder in commercial loans and mortgages. Olcheski said the bank was not classified as an agricultural lending institution.

Hays State Bank became the nation's 129th bank to fail this year, Olcheski said. In addition, five banks across the country that might have failed remained open with the help of FDIC assistance transactions.

Kansas' last bank failure occurred Nov. 13, when Barrett closed the State Bank of Hoxie. That bank reopened the next day as the Prairie State Bank of Hoxie.

TV special to communicate economy's effect on children

By JOHN THELANDER
Collegian Reporter

"Heartache in the Heartland," a K-State Video Conference viewed Thursday night in Durland Hall, focused attention on effects of the farm crisis on rural children.

Much of the stress children feel comes from parents, said Ralph Titus, professor of Extension Information, who served as host for the program. He also said farmers feel guilty if they lose the farm because they are not able to keep it within the family for the next generation.

The farmer feels destroyed and loses self-value after losing the farm, said Dick Currie, one of several family farm representatives interviewed for the television special aired throughout the Midwest.

During discussion of the topic "Why is Farm Loss Painful?" one reason stated was generational investment, the working relationship between generations on a farm.

Also cited as causes for pain in the loss of the family farm were the individual's feeling of personal loss, lowering of personal pride and the ending of generations of care and stewardship of the land.

Ways rural children react to the economic stress of the farm crisis were also stated, allowing viewers to recognize reactions in their children.

These reactions include sadness, anger and fear, a feeling of isolation and problems in school.

In a recent survey of rural school teachers, 92 percent indicated they believe the farm crisis had some kind of impact on their students. Reasons cited by the teachers for their responses included increases in physical ailments, drug and alcohol abuse and anti-social behavior.

Another speaker said a number of children concerned with the financial crisis of their family's farm give up academically, try to escape into fantasies, lose personal esteem and become frustrated.

Characteristics of resilient children include contact with a caring adult, a problem solving approach to life, parental training that children should care for others, and having a sense of hope.

Speakers also noted children's resiliency can be enhanced to help them handle the situation.

Several ways cited in which parents could help strengthen the resiliency in children included approaching the problem as a family, reaching out to children in the community, explaining the problem to the children to help them understand the challenge, teaching the children to look to the future with hope and self-confidence, and listening to children's ideas and feeling.

The main approach toward alleviating the children's fears and sadness, cited throughout the program, was talking and listening.

Carlin requests study of mine sites

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin has asked the Kansas City regional office of the federal Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a comprehensive study of the environmental impact if abandoned mine shafts in the Galena area of southeast Kansas are filled in.

In a letter to EPA Regional Administrator Morris Kay, which was dated Monday but which Carlin's office didn't make public until Thursday, the governor said the study should examine stability of the land around the mines and recommend the best way to fill up the old mines.

Carlin said he had asked state Adjutant General Ralph Tice to consider using members of the Kansas National Guard to fill the shafts with piles of crushed rock in the area.

"Before any approval could be obtained, the general had to establish that the procedure was both environmentally sound and did not put the health of the area residents or the guardsmen at risk, Carlin wrote Kay.

He said Tice's staff conducted an impact study and consulted with Kay's staff. That led to the conclusion the Guard should not proceed until there was additional study by EPA, Carlin said.

"Because there is a real need to obtain definitive information about this existing problem, I am today requesting that your agency commence the necessary testing and examinations to determine the environmental impact of filling these shafts, the stability of the land in question and the best remedial procedures to follow, Carlin wrote.

"This type of information is imperative if the state or federal government is to proceed with any action to assist the Galena area.

Carlin said the state stands ready to help in any way it can with the task of filling in the mine shafts.

Students talk about University concerns

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

Public Speaking II students voiced their concerns on campus issues during a public forum Thursday in Nichols Hall Theater.

Seven students took part in the forum presented each semester by the Department of Speech.

Dwayne Smith, senior in radio and television, gave his speech on "Living Life Through Yourself."

He said people need to overcome the negatives they hear in everyday life and have confidence in themselves.

"Only by changing my attitude was I able to live life for myself," he said.

Nancy Stone, junior in accounting, and Mel Ptacek, junior in business, gave a dual speech titled "A Case of Identity," in which they addressed the issue of academic dishonesty at K-State.

Stone and Ptacek conducted an informal survey of 105 K-State students and found that 85 percent of them knew of or witnessed some form of cheating during their college careers. Of the students surveyed, 37 percent felt they should play a larger role in helping stop academic dishonesty.

Solutions offered by Stone and Ptacek included placing a detailed guideline on academic policy in the K-State bulletin, faculty and administrative support of academic standards and requiring the use of student identification on all class examinations.

Frank Vovk, sophomore in business, spoke of his experiences during his speech, "Business College Needs to Change Its Drop-Add Policy."

Vovk suggested that the college should only switch classes and a great deal of the confusion associated with drop-add would be eliminated.

Andy Bulloch, senior in accounting and finance, gave a speech titled "Union Cafeteria Smoking Policy...A Continuing Nuisance."

Bulloch said the current smoking policy at the Union cafeteria was poorly planned by the governing board because non-smokers are forced to come in contact with second-hand smoke.

"Non-smokers are put at a risk of lung disease by smokers," he said.

He suggested limiting the smoking area of the cafeteria and improving the ventilation system as solutions to the problem.

Marlene Jimenez, senior in speech pathology, spoke of her personal experience in her speech, "Residence Halls Need a Clear Medical Policy."

Jimenez suffers from grand mal epileptic seizures and is transported to Lafene Student Health Center by ambulance each time she suffers an attack, even though there is no written policy stating that seizure victims be treated in this manner.

Jimenez said the trips have been costly to her family and have caused her psychological trauma. She suggested educating staff and setting up a network system of five or six people to each seizure victim to evaluate the seizure and decide if an ambulance needs to be called.

Bill Graff, junior in agricultural economics, addressed the issue of emergency lighting in his speech, "Some Residence Halls are Still Unsafe."

Graff said the lack of emergency lighting in Ford, West, Moore and Haymaker halls may lead

Plan aims for financial stability

KG&E requests delay in rate increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. Thursday laid before the Corporation Commission a rate restructuring plan which would delay two approved rate increases to help pay for the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The Wichita-based utility said the proposal, which it wants considered and ruled upon by the commission in less than six weeks, would stabilize the firm's financial condition into the 21st Century.

The company said delaying two $15 million increases scheduled to take effect over the next 21 months would save customers $80 million during the next five years.

The company also said if the entire proposal is approved, it will mean KG&E will not have to seek any more rate increases in the foreseeable future to pay for Wolf Creek as well as put it on more solid financial footing.

The plan involves changes in the company's accounting procedures to increase tax benefits; embarking on a massive program of insuring 82 of its executives and members of its board of directors to generate a better cash flow, and changing from a 30-year to a 40-year depreciation schedule on the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington.

Key benefit to KG&E's 240,000 customers is to delay from September 1987 to January 1989 one $15 million rate increase and to delay another $15 million rate increase from September 1988 until January 1992.

In addition, the company is asking the KCC to permit it to lower the rate it charges about 31,000 residential and farm customers with space heating during the nine colder months of the year from 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 5 cents. That saves customers another $20 million over the next five years.

The combination of the proposals saves consumers about $100 million during the next five years, and improves the company's cash flow so it shouldn't need any more rate increases, said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney who outlined the plan to the commission.

KG&E also held a news conference in Wichita to explain the plan.

"We are committed to holding electric rates down and to reducing customer bills where we can," KG&E President Wilson Cadman said. "The plan we are preparing has risks, but the odds are very good that it will succeed."

Initial reaction from the commission was positive, although its three members said they want to study it carefully before ratifying it.

"It looks very good, but we need to have the accountants look at it very carefully," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen. "It appears to have potential benefits both for the ratepayers and the company. It appears to have enough merit that we should very carefully look at it."

Lennen said members of the KCC staff and officials of KG&E would begin immediately going over details of the proposal and making the needed accounting studies. "Are you prepared to have your accounts camped out here for the next month?" Lennen asked Haines.

Haines said KG&E would make formal application Tuesday for approval of the plan, and would need an answer from the commission by Jan. 15 because of the need to issue the insurance policies on its executives and board members.

Haines said the proposal has no effect on KG&E's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court last month of the Kansas Supreme Court's decision upholding the KCC's ruling in its Wolf Creek rate case. The federal appeal addresses issues which the state Supreme Court did not consider, and KG&E considers them vital in how future rate cases are handled in Kansas, he said. So it will be pursued.

Haines also said the KG&E proposal does not involve its two partners in the Wolf Creek project — Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc.

He said KG&E didn't even consult KCPL and KEPCo, because its plan involves only its own financing and in no way impacts on them.

KG&E and KCPL each owns 47 percent of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek plant, which began generating electricity in mid-1985. KEPCo owns the other 6 percent.

KG&E was permitted to raise its rates $106.6 million in late 1985, a 28.3 percent increase for customers. That was less than half what the company sought, but still brought cries of protest from customers.

Key elements of the KG&E plan are:

— Delay implementation of the two additional $15 million rate increases to 1989 and 1992, and make the total three-phased increase of $136.6 million permanent.

Students talk about University concerns

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

Public Speaking II students voiced their concerns on campus issues during a public forum Thursday in Nichols Hall Theater.

Seven students took part in the forum presented each semester by the Department of Speech.

Dwayne Smith, senior in radio and television, gave his speech on "Living Life Through Yourself."

He said people need to overcome the negatives they hear in everyday life and have confidence in themselves.

"Only by changing my attitude was I able to live life for myself," he said.

Nancy Stone, junior in accounting, and Mel Ptacek, junior in business, gave a dual speech titled "A Case of Identity," in which they addressed the issue of academic dishonesty at K-State.

Stone and Ptacek conducted an informal survey of 105 K-State students and found that 85 percent of them knew of or witnessed some form of cheating during their college careers. Of the students surveyed, 37 percent felt they should play a larger role in helping stop academic dishonesty.

Solutions offered by Stone and Ptacek included placing a detailed guideline on academic policy in the K-State bulletin, faculty and administrative support of academic standards and requiring the use of student identification on all class examinations.

Frank Vovk, sophomore in business, spoke of his experiences during his speech, "Business College Needs to Change Its Drop-Add Policy."

Andy Bulloch, senior in accounting and finance, gave a speech titled "Union Cafeteria Smoking Policy...A Continuing Nuisance."

Bulloch said the current smoking policy at the Union cafeteria was poorly planned by the governing board because non-smokers are forced to come in contact with second-hand smoke.

"Non-smokers are put at a risk of lung disease by smokers," he said.

He suggested limiting the smoking area of the cafeteria and improving the ventilation system as solutions to the problem.

Marlene Jimenez, senior in speech pathology, spoke of her personal experience in her speech, "Residence Halls Need a Clear Medical Policy."

Jimenez suffers from grand mal epileptic seizures and is transported to Lafene Student Health Center by ambulance each time she suffers an attack, even though there is no written policy stating that seizure victims be treated in this manner.

Jimenez said the trips have been costly to her family and have caused her psychological trauma. She suggested educating staff and setting up a network system of five or six people to each seizure victim to evaluate the seizure and decide if an ambulance needs to be called.

Bill Graff, junior in agricultural economics, addressed the issue of emergency lighting in his speech, "Some Residence Halls are Still Unsafe."

Plan aims for financial stability

KG&E requests delay in rate increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. Thursday laid before the Corporation Commission a rate restructuring plan which would delay two approved rate increases to help pay for the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The Wichita-based utility said the proposal, which it wants considered and ruled upon by the commission in less than six weeks, would stabilize the firm's financial condition into the 21st Century.

The company said delaying two $15 million increases scheduled to take effect over the next 21 months would save customers $80 million during the next five years.

The company also said if the entire proposal is approved, it will mean KG&E will not have to seek any more rate increases in the foreseeable future to pay for Wolf Creek as well as put it on more solid financial footing.

The plan involves changes in the company's accounting procedures to increase tax benefits; embarking on a massive program of insuring 82 of its executives and members of its board of directors to generate a better cash flow, and changing from a 30-year to a 40-year depreciation schedule on the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington.

Key benefit to KG&E's 240,000 customers is to delay from September 1987 to January 1989 one $15 million rate increase and to delay another $15 million rate increase from September 1988 until January 1992.

In addition, the company is asking the KCC to permit it to lower the rate it charges about 31,000 residential and farm customers with space heating during the nine colder months of the year from 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 5 cents. That saves customers another $20 million over the next five years.

The combination of the proposals saves consumers about $100 million during the next five years, and improves the company's cash flow so it shouldn't need any more rate increases, said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney who outlined the plan to the commission.

KG&E also held a news conference in Wichita to explain the plan.

"We are committed to holding electric rates down and to reducing customer bills where we can," KG&E President Wilson Cadman said. "The plan we are preparing has risks, but the odds are very good that it will succeed."

Initial reaction from the commission was positive, although its three members said they want to study it carefully before ratifying it.

"It looks very good, but we need to have the accountants look at it very carefully," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen. "It appears to have potential benefits both for the ratepayers and the company. It appears to have enough merit that we should very carefully look at it."

Lennen said members of the KCC staff and officials of KG&E would begin immediately going over details of the proposal and making the needed accounting studies. "Are you prepared to have your accounts camped out here for the next month?" Lennen asked Haines.

Haines said KG&E would make formal application Tuesday for approval of the plan, and would need an answer from the commission by Jan. 15 because of the need to issue the insurance policies on its executives and board members.

Haines said the proposal has no effect on KG&E's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court last month of the Kansas Supreme Court's decision upholding the KCC's ruling in its Wolf Creek rate case. The federal appeal addresses issues which the state Supreme Court did not consider, and KG&E considers them vital in how future rate cases are handled in Kansas, he said. So it will be pursued.

Haines also said the KG&E proposal does not involve its two partners in the Wolf Creek project — Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc.

He said KG&E didn't even consult KCPL and KEPCo, because its plan involves only its own financing and in no way impacts on them.

KG&E and KCPL each owns 47 percent of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek plant, which began generating electricity in mid-1985. KEPCo owns the other 6 percent.

KG&E was permitted to raise its rates $106.6 million in late 1985, a 28.3 percent increase for customers. That was less than half what the company sought, but still brought cries of protest from customers.

Key elements of the KG&E plan are:

— Delay implementation of the two additional $15 million rate increases to 1989 and 1992, and make the total three-phased increase of $136.6 million permanent.

Choirs to fill McCain with holiday song

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

The sounds of holiday cheer will fill McCain Auditorium as University music ensembles take the stage Sunday for "A K-State Christmas."

The fifth-annual musical event, sponsored by the Department of Music and the senior honorary Mortar Board, will feature the K-State Choir, KSU Brass Choir, K-State Chorale, Men's Glee Club, Women's Glee Club and the Rhapsody Ringers bell choir.

"It's really a family-type event. It's all light carols, something I think everybody would enjoy," said Rod Walker, professor of music and the director of the K-State Choir.

Each ensemble will perform four or five pieces. Each of the group "takes their shot" at trying to outdo the others in friendly competition, Walker said.

The idea for the Christmas concert was initiated by former Univerity President Duane Acker, in an effort to unify the campus toward the holiday season, Walker said. However, the time of year makes it difficult to get the campus together.

"It's really hard to have Christmas festivities on campus because everybody is going on finals and trying to get their semester wrapped up," Walker said.

Highlighting the K-State Choir's performance will be a medley titled "Fantasia on Christmas Carols" by the British composer Ralph Vaughan Williams. "Fantasia on Christmas Carol" will feature soloist Chris Thompson, senior in music education.

The performances will culminate about six to eight weeks of "off and on" preparation, said Gerald Polich, associate professor of music and director of the K-State Men's and Women's Glee Clubs.

The well-known Christmas favorite "Carol of the Bells" will be featured by the Men's Glee Club. The Women's Glee Club will perform "Ding-Dong Merrily We Sing" as its primary piece.

Tickets for the performance are $1.50 for students and children under high school age and $3 for adults.

Students talk about University concerns

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

Public Speaking II students voiced their concerns on campus issues during a public forum Thursday in Nichols Hall Theater.

Seven students took part in the forum presented each semester by the Department of Speech.

Dwayne Smith, senior in radio and television, gave his speech on "Living Life Through Yourself."

He said people need to overcome the negatives they hear in everyday life and have confidence in themselves.

"Only by changing my attitude was I able to live life for myself," he said.

Nancy Stone, junior in accounting, and Mel Ptacek, junior in business, gave a dual speech titled "A Case of Identity," in which they addressed the issue of academic dishonesty at K-State.

Stone and Ptacek conducted an informal survey of 105 K-State students and found that 85 percent of them knew of or witnessed some form of cheating during their college careers. Of the students surveyed, 37 percent felt they should play a larger role in helping stop academic dishonesty.

Solutions offered by Stone and Ptacek included placing a detailed guideline on academic policy in the K-State bulletin, faculty and administrative support of academic standards and requiring the use of student identification on all class examinations.

Frank Vovk, sophomore in business, spoke of his switch classes and a great deal of the confusion associated with drop-add would be eliminated.

Andy Bulloch, senior in accounting and finance, gave a speech titled "Union Cafeteria Smoking Policy...A Continuing Nuisance."

Bulloch said the current smoking policy at the Union cafeteria was poorly planned by the governing board because non-smokers are forced to come in contact with second-hand smoke.

"Non-smokers are put at a risk of lung disease by smokers," he said.

He suggested limiting the smoking area of the cafeteria and improving the ventilation system as solutions to the problem.

Marlene Jimenez, senior in speech pathology, spoke of her personal experience in her speech, "Residence Halls Need a Clear Medical Policy."

Jimenez suffers from grand mal epileptic seizures and is transported to Lafene Student Health Center by ambulance each time she suffers an attack, even though there is no written policy stating that seizure victims be treated in this manner.

Jimenez said the trips have been costly to her family and have caused her psychological trauma. She suggested educating staff and setting up a network system of five or six people to each seizure victim to evaluate the seizure and decide if an ambulance needs to be called.

Bill Graff, junior in agricultural economics, addressed the issue of emergency lighting in his speech,

Plan aims for financial stability

KG&E requests delay in rate increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. Thursday laid before the Corporation Commission a rate restructuring plan which would delay two approved rate increases to help pay for the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The Wichita-based utility said the proposal, which it wants considered and ruled upon by the commission in less than six weeks, would stabilize the firm's financial condition into the 21st Century.

The company said delaying two $15 million increases scheduled to take effect over the next 21 months would save customers $80 million during the next five years.

The company also said if the entire proposal is approved, it will mean KG&E will not have to seek any more rate increases in the foreseeable future to pay for Wolf Creek as well as put it on more solid financial footing.

The plan involves changes in the company's accounting procedures to increase tax benefits; embarking on a massive program of insuring 82 of its executives and members of its board of directors to generate a better cash flow, and changing from a 30-year to a 40-year depreciation schedule on the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington.

Key benefit to KG&E's 240,000 customers is to delay from September 1987 to January 1989 one $15 million rate increase and to delay another $15 million rate increase from September 1988 until January 1992.

In addition, the company is asking the KCC to permit it to lower the rate it charges about 31,000 residential and farm customers with space heating during the nine colder months of the year from 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 5 cents. That saves customers another $20 million over the next five years.

The combination of the proposals saves consumers about $100 million during the next five years, and improves the company's cash flow so it shouldn't need any more rate increases, said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney who outlined the plan to the commission.

KG&E also held a news conference in Wichita to explain the plan.

"We are committed to holding electric rates down and to reducing customer bills where we can," KG&E President Wilson Cadman said. "The plan we are preparing has risks, but the odds are very good that it will succeed."

Initial reaction from the commission was positive, although its three members said they want to study it carefully before ratifying it.

"It looks very good, but we need to have the accountants look at it very carefully," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen. "It appears to have potential benefits both for the ratepayers and the company. It appears to have enough merit that we should very carefully look at it."

Lennen said members of the KCC staff and officials of KG&E would begin immediately going over details of the proposal and making the needed accounting studies. "Are you prepared to have your accounts camped out here for the next month?" Lennen asked Haines.

Haines said KG&E would make formal application Tuesday for approval of the plan, and would need an answer from the commission by Jan. 15 because of the need to issue the insurance policies on its executives and board members.

Haines said the proposal has no effect on KG&E's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court last month of the Kansas Supreme Court's decision upholding the KCC's ruling in its Wolf Creek rate case. The federal appeal addresses issues which the state Supreme Court did not consider, and KG&E considers them vital in how future rate cases are handled in Kansas, he said. So it will be pursued.

Haines also said the KG&E proposal does not involve its two partners in the Wolf Creek project — Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc.

He said KG&E didn't even consult KCPL and KEPCo, because its plan involves only its own financing and in no way impacts on them.

KG&E and KCPL each owns 47 percent of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek plant, which began generating electricity in mid-1985. KEPCo owns the other 6 percent.

KG&E was permitted to raise its rates $106.6 million in late 1985, a 28.3 percent increase for customers. That was less than half what the company sought, but still brought cries of protest from customers.

Key elements of the KG&E plan are:

— Delay implementation of the two additional $15 million rate increases to 1989 and 1992, and make the total three-phased increase of $136.6 million permanent.

WinterDance '86

During "Flight of the Zealots," a Mary Martin choreographed piece, the dance group huddles the front of the stage.

Spotlights will shine on a full spectrum of students and faculty as they dance a variety of ballet, jazz and modern dance pieces in WinterDance '86 tonight and Saturday on the McCain Auditorium stage.

This student and faculty production features dancers from various majors, dance faculty and a student technical team who work together to produce the highlight of the fall semester for the dance department.

The concert is a massive team effort of idea exchange and hard work, which begins with a simple thought from a choreographer. Tammy Francka, sophomore in dance, choreographed her routine "Questionable" from music she heard while at a friend's house. Traditionally, all pieces are choreographed by the dance faculty. However, Francka's piece has been such a success in other performances that she will dance it in this concert as well.

The other routines are choreographed by dance instructors Judy Quirk and Roxanne Bartush and visiting professional Mary Martin.

Another piece, titled "Millertime," is a ballet routine set to Glenn Miller tunes and choreographed by Quirk, who described "Millertime" as a "very light '40s piece (which) gives the students a chance to use some of their (partnering) training."

Quirk is enthusiastic about this year's concert, giving much credit to the dancers and technical crew.

"Jeff Childs is our technical person and has been very enthusiastic," Quirk said. "He's a very artistic person and is always keeping us in mind."

Childs, graduate student in theater, first comes to rehearsals to watch and confer with dancers about new ideas or technical opinions.

"What I like to do is watch the piece initially, get a first impression of it; then I talk to the choreographer to see if what I've seen is what she intended," Childs said.

Next comes the task of creating a set with the lights and little background, without losing the choreographer's desired effect.

"In most dance you don't have scenery. The lighting has to become that scenery," Childs said. "It's all time/space. In dance, it's all very fluid."

Childs maintains that the choreographer retains complete artistic control over the piece.

In "Millertime," Quirk wanted to create a ballr feel to coincide with the Big Band sound. After r ting the idea of lowering columns and pillars ont stage, Quirk and Childs decided to create the spa effect with "columns" of purple taffeta, using lig "maintain the mood, a warm feeling of the ballr while keeping it very elegant looking," Childs sai

Childs said he prefers dance lighting over other t of theater lighting.

"It's like moving sculpture," Childs said. "Lig has to be able to move with the dancing and still within the realm of the piece."

The concert program consists of 10 pieces. A fa duet called "Water Garden," featuring Quirk and tush and choreographed by Martin, is set to an ac by Antonio Vivaldi. The background incl reproductions of waterlily paintings by Claude M Martin describes it as being "full of color and cir energy."

The concert will start at 8 p.m both nights. Ac sion is $4 for students and senior citizens and $5 fo general public.

Gregory Alan holds Lisa Sanford Duncan after letting go of a stick representing weights, as Kirsten Johnson carries Desiree Henderson in "Child's Play."

Dancers fly in rhythm during the Judith Quirk choreographed "Ethereal Moods." WinterDance '86 featu pieces performed by students and faculty members.

He suggested limiting the smoking area of the cafeteria and improving the ventilation system as solutions to the problem.

Jimenez suffers from grand mal epileptic seizures and is transported to Lafene Student Health Center by ambulance each time she suffers an attack, even though there is no written policy stating that seizure victims be treated in this manner.

Jimenez said the trips have been costly to her family and have caused her psychological trauma. She suggested educating staff and setting up a network system of five or six people to each seizure victim to evaluate the seizure and decide if an ambulance needs to be called.

Plan aims for financial stability

KG&E requests delay in rate increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. Thursday laid before the Corporation Commission a rate restructuring plan which would delay two approved rate increases to help pay for the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The Wichita-based utility said the proposal, which it wants considered and ruled upon by the commission in less than six weeks, would stabilize the firm's financial condition into the 21st Century.

The company said delaying two $15 million increases scheduled to take effect over the next 21 months would save customers $80 million during the next five years.

The company also said if the entire proposal is approved, it will mean KG&E will not have to seek any more rate increases in the foreseeable future to pay for Wolf Creek as well as put it on more solid financial footing.

The plan involves changes in the company's accounting procedures to increase tax benefits; embarking on a massive program of insuring 82 of its executives and members of its board of directors to generate a better cash flow, and changing from a 30-year to a 40-year depreciation schedule on the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington.

Key benefit to KG&E's 240,000 customers is to delay from September 1987 to January 1989 one $15 million rate increase and to delay another $15 million rate increase from September 1988 until January 1992.

In addition, the company is asking the KCC to permit it to lower the rate it charges about 31,000 residential and farm customers with space heating during the nine colder months of the year from 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 5 cents. That saves customers another $20 million over the next five years.

The combination of the proposals saves consumers about $100 million during the next five years, and improves the company's cash flow so it shouldn't need any more rate increases, said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney who outlined the plan to the commission.

KG&E also held a news conference in Wichita to explain the plan.

"We are committed to holding electric rates down and to reducing customer bills where we can," KG&E President Wilson Cadman said. "The plan we are preparing has risks, but the odds are very good that it will succeed."

Initial reaction from the commission was positive, although its three members said they want to study it carefully before ratifying it.

"It looks very good, but we need to have the accountants look at it very carefully," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen. "It appears to have potential benefits both for the ratepayers and the company. It appears to have enough merit that we should very carefully look at it."

Lennen said members of the KCC staff and officials of KG&E would begin immediately going over details of the proposal and making the needed accounting studies. "Are you prepared to have your accounts camped out here for the next month?" Lennen asked Haines.

Haines said KG&E would make formal application Tuesday for approval of the plan, and would need an answer from the commission by Jan. 15 because of the need to issue the insurance policies on its executives and board members.

Haines said the proposal has no effect on KG&E's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court last month of the Kansas Supreme Court's decision upholding the KCC's ruling in its Wolf Creek rate case. The federal appeal addresses issues which the state Supreme Court did not consider, and KG&E considers them vital in how future rate cases are handled in Kansas, he said. So it will be pursued.

Haines also said the KG&E proposal does not involve its two partners in the Wolf Creek project — Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc.

He said KG&E didn't even consult KCPL and KEPCo, because its plan involves only its own financing and in no way impacts on them.

KG&E and KCPL each owns 47 percent of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek plant, which began generating electricity in mid-1985. KEPCo owns the other 6 percent.

KG&E was permitted to raise its rates $106.6 million in late 1985, a 28.3 percent increase for customers. That was less than half what the company sought, but still brought cries of protest from customers.

Key elements of the KG&E plan are:

— Delay implementation of the two additional $15 million rate increases to 1989 and 1992, and make the total three-phased increase of $136.6 million permanent.

Trekkies will find new film full of humor

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

For millions of trekkies across America, the long wait is over. "Star Trek IV: The Voyage Home" has arrived. Admiral Kirk (remember his promotion?), Spock, and the rest of the crew are back in fine form in this newest episode of the "Star Trek" saga. They're without the starship Enterprise, which was destroyed in "Star Trek III," but they get by nonetheless.

Unlike the previous "Star Trek" movies, "Star Trek IV" is largely played for laughs. This comes as a relief after the deadly serious goings-on of "Star Trek III." That movie seriously risked becoming self-parody. In "Star Trek IV," however, the mood is much lighter.

Surprisingly enough, director Leonard Nimoy shows he has a fine touch for comedy. Who would have guessed that after all those years as the straight-faced Vulcan?

Most of the comedy results after the crew of the Enterprise, now at the helm of a captured Klingon warship, must travel back in time to modern day San Francisco. It seems the Earth of the 23rd century is perilously close to being annihilated by a space probe of unknown origin. And the only way to save Earth is for Kirk and company to return to the past.

Once in San Francisco, our heroes are a bit confused. What does "correct change" on city buses mean? And why do people curse all the time? Kirk doesn't have much trouble adopting 20th century slang, but Spock is hopeless.

The plot for "Star Trek IV" is possibly the silliest of all the "Star Trek" movies, but the movie is so enjoyable the holes in the plot aren't important. The comedy itself sustains the film.

By placing the story in San Francisco, the film could have been full of gay jokes. (Just imagine Spock walking around in a long white robe.) But the filmmakers avoid these cheap shots entirely. The

Students talk about University concerns

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

Public Speaking II students voiced their concerns on campus issues during a public forum Thursday in Nichols Hall Theater.

Seven students took part in the forum presented each semester by the Department of Speech.

Dwayne Smith, senior in radio and television, gave his speech on "Living Life Through Yourself."

He said people need to overcome the negatives they hear in everyday life and have confidence in themselves.

"Only by changing my attitude was I able to live life for myself," he said.

Nancy Stone, junior in accounting, and Mel Ptacek, junior in business, gave a dual speech titled "A Case of Identity," in which they addressed the issue of academic dishonesty at K-State.

Stone and Ptacek conducted an informal survey of 105 K-State students and found that 85 percent of them knew of or witnessed some form of cheating during their college careers. Of the students surveyed, 37 percent felt they should play a larger role in helping stop academic dishonesty.

Solutions offered by Stone and Ptacek included placing a detailed guideline on academic policy in the K-State bulletin, faculty and administrative support of academic standards and requiring the use of student identification on all class examinations.

Frank Vovk, sophomore in business, spoke of his experiences during his speech, "Business College Needs to Change Its Drop-Add Policy."

Plan aims for financial stability

KG&E requests delay in rate increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. Thursday laid before the Corporation Commission a rate restructuring plan which would delay two approved rate increases to help pay for the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The Wichita-based utility said the proposal, which it wants considered and ruled upon by the commission in less than six weeks, would stabilize the firm's financial condition into the 21st Century.

The company said delaying two $15 million increases scheduled to take effect over the next 21 months would save customers $80 million during the next five years.

The company also said if the entire proposal is approved, it will mean KG&E will not have to seek any more rate increases in the foreseeable future to pay for Wolf Creek as well as put it on more solid financial footing.

The plan involves changes in the company's accounting procedures to increase tax benefits; embarking on a massive program of insuring 82 of its executives and members of its board of directors to generate a better cash flow, and changing from a 30-year to a 40-year depreciation schedule on the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington.

Key benefit to KG&E's 240,000 customers is to delay from September 1987 to January 1989 one $15 million rate increase and to delay another $15 million rate increase from September 1988 until January 1992.

In addition, the company is asking the KCC to permit it to lower the rate it charges about 31,000 residential and farm customers with space heating during the nine colder months of the year from 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 5 cents. That saves customers another $20 million over the next five years.

The combination of the proposals saves consumers about $100 million during the next five years, and improves the company's cash flow so it shouldn't need any more rate increases, said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney who outlined the plan to the commission.

KG&E also held a news conference in Wichita to explain the plan.

"We are committed to holding electric rates down and to reducing customer bills where we can," KG&E President Wilson Cadman said. "The plan we are preparing has risks, but the odds are very good that it will succeed."

Initial reaction from the commission was positive, although its three members said they want to study it carefully before ratifying it.

"It looks very good, but we need to have the accountants look at it very carefully," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen. "It appears to have potential benefits both for the ratepayers and the company. It appears to have enough merit that we should very carefully look at it."

Lennen said members of the KCC staff and officials of KG&E would begin immediately going over details of the proposal and making the needed accounting studies. "Are you prepared to have your accounts camped out here for the next month?" Lennen asked Haines.

Haines said KG&E would make formal application Tuesday for approval of the plan, and would need an answer from the commission by Jan. 15 because of the need to issue the insurance policies on its executives and board members.

Haines said the proposal has no effect on KG&E's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court last month of the Kansas Supreme Court's decision upholding the KCC's ruling in its Wolf Creek rate case. The federal appeal addresses issues which the state Supreme Court did not consider, and KG&E considers them vital in how future rate cases are handled in Kansas, he said. So it will be pursued.

Haines also said the KG&E proposal does not involve its two partners in the Wolf Creek project — Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc.

He said KG&E didn't even consult KCPL and KEPCo, because its plan involves only its own financing and in no way impacts on them.

KG&E and KCPL each owns 47 percent of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek plant, which began generating electricity in mid-1985. KEPCo owns the other 6 percent.

KG&E was permitted to raise its rates $106.6 million in late 1985, a 28.3 percent increase for customers. That was less than half what the company sought, but still brought cries of protest from customers.

Key elements of the KG&E plan are:

— Delay implementation of the two additional $15 million rate increases to 1989 and 1992, and make the total three-phased increase of $136.6 million permanent.

Trek

humor is always restrained, never becoming too absurd.

Some critics are calling this the best of the "Star Trek" movies. I prefer "Star Trek II: The Wrath of Khan," but "Star Trek IV" is loads of fun. It's the kind of movie that could win the "Star Trek" movies an even wider audience (as if they really need more fans).

William Shatner and Leonard Nimoy, as usual, get most of the best lines in the movie. But the supporting characters have some good moments as well, particularly Chekov. Imagine him, with his thick Russian accent, asking passers-by where he might find nuclear vessels ("wessels" he calls them). Catherine Hicks, the only real newcomer this time around, has a rather bland role as a marine biologist. She's in charge of two humpback whales that play an important role in the movie.

After "Back to the Future" and "Peggy Sue Got Married" it might seem like the last thing we need is another time-travel movie, but "Star Trek IV" uses the time-travel gimmick effectively, making wry comments on the 1980s.

Students talk about University concerns

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

Public Speaking II students voiced their concerns on campus issues during a public forum Thursday in Nichols Hall Theater.

Seven students took part in the forum presented each semester by the Department of Speech.

Dwayne Smith, senior in radio and television, gave his speech on "Living Life Through Yourself."

He said people need to overcome the negatives they hear in everyday life and have confidence in themselves.

"Only by changing my attitude was I able to live life for myself," he said.

Nancy Stone, junior in accounting, and Mel Ptacek, junior in business, gave a dual speech titled "A Case of Identity," in which they addressed the issue of academic dishonesty at K-State.

Stone and Ptacek conducted an informal survey of 105 K-State students and found that 85 percent of them knew of or witnessed some form of cheating during their college careers. Of the students surveyed, 37 percent felt they should play a larger role in helping stop academic dishonesty.

Solutions offered by Stone and Ptacek included placing a detailed guideline on academic policy in the K-State bulletin, faculty and administrative support of academic standards and requiring the use of student identification on all class examinations.

Frank Vovk, sophomore in business, spoke o[f] his experiences during his speec[h] lege Needs to [C] Add Policy."

Vovk suggeste[d] should only re[quire] signature on dr[op] drop-add forms drop-add center ing changes sh[ould] ween instructor

Vovk said [t]he drop-add proc[ess] and faculty wo[uld]

switch classes and a great deal of the confusion associated with drop-add would be eliminated.

Andy Bulloch, senior in accounting and finance, gave a speech titled "Union Cafeteria Smoking Policy...A Continuing Nuisance."

Bulloch said the current smoking policy at the Union cafeteria was poorly planned by the governing board because non-smokers are forced to come in contact with second-hand smoke.

"Non-smokers are put at a risk of lung disease by smokers," he said.

He suggested limiting the smoking area of the cafeteria and improving the ventilation system as solutions to the problem.

Marlene Jimenez, senior in speech pathology, spoke of her personal experience in her speech, "Residence Halls Need a Clear Medical Policy."

Jimenez suffers from grand mal epileptic seizures and is transported to Lafene Student Health Center by ambulance each time she suffers an attack, even though there is no written policy stating that seizure victims be treated in this manner.

Jimenez said the trips have been costly to her family and have caused her psychological trauma. She suggested educating staff and setting up a network system of five or six people to each seizure victim to evaluate the seizure and decide if an ambulance needs to be called.

Bill Graff, junior in agricultural economics, addressed the issue of emergency lighting in his speech, "Some Residence Halls are Still

Plan aims for financial stability

KG&E requests delay in rate increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Gas and Electric Co. Thursday laid before the Corporation Commission a rate restructuring plan which would delay two approved rate increases to help pay for the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The Wichita-based utility said the proposal, which it wants considered and ruled upon by the commission in less than six weeks, would stabilize the firm's financial condition into the 21st Century.

The company said delaying two $15 million increases scheduled to take effect over the next 21 months would save customers $80 million during the next five years.

The company also said if the entire proposal is approved, it will mean KG&E will not have to seek any more rate increases in the foreseeable future to pay for Wolf Creek as well as put it on more solid financial footing.

The plan involves changes in the company's accounting procedures to increase tax benefits; embarking on a massive program of insuring 82 of its executives and members of its board of directors to generate a better cash flow, and changing from a 30-year to a 40-year depreciation schedule on the Wolf Creek plant near Burlington.

Key benefit to KG&E's 240,000 customers is to delay from September 1987 to January 1989 one $15 million rate increase and to delay another $15 million rate increase from September 1988 until January 1992.

In addition, the company is asking the KCC to permit it to lower the rate it charges about 31,000 residential and farm customers with space heating during the nine colder months of the year from 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour to 5 cents. That saves customers another $20 million over the next five years.

The combination of the proposals saves consumers about $100 million during the next five years, and improves the company's cash flow so it shouldn't need any more rate increases, said James Haines, KG&E's chief attorney who outlined the plan to the commission.

KG&E also held a news conference in Wichita to explain the plan.

"We are committed to holding electric rates down and to reducing customer bills where we can," KG&E President Wilson Cadman said. "The plan we are preparing has risks, but the odds are very good that it will succeed."

Initial reaction from the commission was positive, although its three members said they want to study it carefully before ratifying it.

"It looks very good, but we need to have the accountants look at it very carefully," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen. "It appears to have potential benefits both for the ratepayers and the company. It appears to have enough merit that we should very carefully look at it."

Lennen said members of the KCC staff and officials of KG&E would begin immediately going over details of the proposal and making the needed accounting studies. "Are you prepared to have your accounts camped out here for the next month?" Lennen asked Haines.

Haines said KG&E would make formal application Tuesday for approval of the plan, and would need an answer from the commission by Jan. 15 because of the need to issue the insurance policies on its executives and board members.

Haines said the proposal has no effect on KG&E's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court last month of the Kansas Supreme Court's decision upholding the KCC's ruling in its Wolf Creek rate case. The federal appeal addresses issues which the state Supreme Court did not consider, and KG&E considers them vital in how future rate cases are handled in Kansas, he said. So it will be pursued.

Haines also said the KG&E proposal does not involve its two partners in the Wolf Creek project — Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Electric Power Cooperatives Inc.

He said KG&E didn't even consult KCPL and KEPCo, because its plan involves only its own financing and in no way impacts on them.

KG&E and KCPL each owns 47 percent of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek plant, which began generating electricity in mid-1985. KEPCo owns the other 6 percent.

KG&E was permitted to raise its rates $106.6 million in late 1985, a 28.3 percent increase for customers. That was less than half what the company sought, but still brought cries of protest from customers.

Key elements of the KG&E plan are:

— Delay implementation of the two additional $15 million rate increases to 1989 and 1992, and make the total three-phased increase of $136.6 million permanent.

Frank Vovk, sophomore in business, spoke of his experiences during his speech, "Business College Needs to Change Its Drop-Add Policy."

Vovk suggested that the college should only require a student signature on drop-add forms, that drop-add forms be present at the drop-add center and that scheduling changes should be kept between instructors and students.

Vovk said by trimming the drop-add process both students and faculty would find it easier to switch classes and a great deal of the confusion associated with drop-add would be eliminated.

Andy Bulloch, senior in accounting and finance, gave a speech titled "Union Cafeteria Smoking Policy...A Continuing Nuisance."

Bulloch said the current smoking policy at the Union cafeteria was poorly planned by the governing board because non-smokers are forced to come in contact with second-hand smoke.

Bill Graff, junior in agricultural economics, addressed the issue of emergency lighting in his speech, "Some Residence Halls are Still Unsafe."

Graff said the lack of emergency lighting in Ford, West, Moore and Haymaker halls may lead to serious personal injury and show negligence on the part of the University.

He said students need to be warned of the danger and emergency lights need to be installed. The process is underway and should be completed in about five months.

New Christmas program provides needy families with food, clothing

By MARY LYNN GATSCHET
Collegian Reporter

The lighting of Manhattan's first Mayor's Christmas Tree on Nov. 28 did more than officially commence the shopping season. The Christmas tree symbolizes Manhattan's first organized efforts to amass food, toys, clothing and money for utilities for the needy within Riley County.

Previously, people who wanted to donate to those less fortunate had to find a church or social service organization which was sponsoring a holiday drive. Atina Hanna, director of the Flint Hills Bread Basket, 901 Yuma St., said this began to cause problems concerning proper distribution. Often during the holidays, people would bring clothing and toys to the Bread Basket.

However, by legal definition, the Bread Basket was not authorized to determine who could receive these extra amenities. Hanna would then go to the Social Rehabilitation Services office and ask for names of families who were in need of such items.

Under the new community Christmas program, several social services have been coordinated by the Aggieville Merchants Association to undertake specified tasks. The Bread Basket plays a fundamental role in this new organized effort.

In past years, the Bread Basket has sponsored a Community Thanksgiving and Holiday Program in which food and money donations were collected and baskets containing a turkey, fresh fruit and canned goods were distributed to qualified applicants. The Bread Basket receives the list of the applicants from the SRS office.

This year, baskets were distributed Nov. 25 and 26 for Thanksgiving and will be distributed Dec. 22 and 23 for Christmas. Last year, the Bread Basket sent out around 250 baskets at Thanksgiving alone. Hanna estimates the number to be close to 400 this year.

Hanna attributes the increase to two main factors: community awareness from the new Christmas tree program and government cutbacks in other federal social aid. She views the results of the cuts with irony.

"Reaganomics has done a nice thing by waking up the community," she said. "The dry-up from Reaganomics says 'let's make each community take care of its poor.'"

Altrusa, a local women's service group, has been designated to collect and distribute toys. The distribution center will be adjacent to the Flint Hills Bread Basket building in order to facilitate distribution. Hanna hopes that next year a group will take care of the clothing gifts as well.

Cash donations can be addressed to the Mayor's Christmas Tree and sent to Kansas State Bank, 1010 Westloop Place. Some of the money will be used to cover food costs not met by donations. Most of the money will be sent to the Emergency Assistance Committee, which is monitoring funding.

Malpractice victims say law sets apart 'privileged groups'

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorneys for medical malpractice victims told the Kansas Supreme Court Thursday a law the Legislature passed in 1985 is unconstitutional because it grants "special privileges" only to doctors and other health care providers.

"I think that the court, the state and the society we live in must recognize that we must not set up privileged groups that are set apart and put on pedestals," attorney Fred Rice of Topeka told the state's highest court.

Rice and two other lawyers for plaintiffs in medical malpractice lawsuits urged the seven-member court to strike down a law that eliminated the so-called "collateral source" rule in lawsuits against health care providers.

The effect of the law is to allow juries to deduct the amount of damages covered by insurance and other compensation from judgments only in medical malpractice cases.

"It is not right to allow the defendant to benefit from the money and the work that the plaintiff has put into an insurance policy," Rice said as he argued an appeal of Pottawatomie County district judge's ruling to uphold the constitutionality of the law.

The case was a combined appeal of lower court rulings in three separate medical malpractice lawsuits. In two of the cases, from Johnson and Barber counties, the lower court judges ruled the 1985 law to be unconstitutional while the Pottawatomie County judge upheld the statute.

Attorneys for health care providers in the case argued the law provides juries a true set of facts on which to render verdicts rather than an artificial set in which jurors are not told of other sources of compensation for a victim.

Wayne Stratton, a Topeka attorney representing the health care providers, said the rule to disallow testimony about insurance payments was developed long ago, when only a few people could afford insurance or other health coverage.

"We would submit that the original purpose of the collateral source rule has been totally altered by the passage of time," Stratton said. "Instead of a shield, it is now a sword in the hand of the plaintiff's (attorney)."

Mike Oliver, an attorney for Shawnee Mission Medical Center, repeated the oath witnesses take when they are sworn in for testimony in the lower courts and he stressed the portion that calls for a witness "to tell the whole truth."

Oliver contended the 1985 law ensures that plaintiffs tell juries the whole truth about how badly they have been damaged. If a victim already has received insurance compensation for medical expenses, he said the jury has a right to know about it before deciding a judgement for those expenses.

"The jury is entitled to hear the truth and the Legislature has determined this is a truth the jury should hear," Oliver said.

Donald W. Vasos, a Kansas City, Kan. lawyer, urged the court to uphold a Johnson County judge's ruling that the collateral source law was unconstitutional.

Vasos said the Legislature passed the law as a way to hold down the cost of health care in Kansas and to ease a statewide doctor shortage.

However, he said medical groups instead report there may be a surplus of doctors in the state. Vasos added that a legislative study committees have found that medical malpractice judgements account for only .5 percent of statewide medical costs.

"It is clear that the elimination of the collateral source rule in medical malpractice cases will have only a negligible effect on health care costs," Vasos said.

In addition, Vasos said the law in effect substitutes doctors as the beneficiaries of victims' insurance.

START YOUR NUCLEAR CAREER IN A HIGH POWER POSITION.

It's a simple fact. The Navy Nuclear Propulsion Officer Candidate Program is one of the most prestigious ways to enter the nuclear field. With over half of America's nuclear reactors in the Navy, it's also one of the most practical ways to get experience.

It can also be rewarding. If you're a math, engineering or physical sciences major, you could be earning $1,000 a month right now during your junior and senior years. And get a $1,000 bonus upon entrance into the program, plus $2,000 more when you complete your Navy studies.

You'll receive a year of paid graduate level training that's among the most comprehensive in the world. And you'll acquire expertise with state of the art nuclear reactor and propulsion plant technology.

As a Navy officer, you'll lead the adventure while gaining high-level experience that will help make you a leader in an elite career field.

In addition to the professional advantages, nuclear-trained officers get an excellent benefits package, travel opportunities, planned promotions, and regular salary increases.

Find out more about the Navy Nuclear Propulsion Officer Candidate Program. Call Navy Management Programs: 1-800-821-5110 or send transcripts/resume to:

Smith nails free throws leading 'Cats to win

By The Collegian Staff

Lynn Smith, a 45-percent free throw shooter last season, nailed two shots from the charity stripe with 17 seconds left to give K-State a 73-72 win over Texas Tech Wednesday night in Lubbock.

Smith, one-of-five from the line this season, hit the two clutch free throws for his only points of the game and helped the 'Cats defeat the defending Southwest Conference Tournament champions.

"I was thinking — make them. I had missed two free throws earlier. I didn't want to let my teammates down," Smith said. "It felt great (to make them), but I knew we then had to play aggressive defense at the other end of the court."

"I never had any doubt; he nailed them both," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "The kids have so much respect for Lynn Smith. To step up there late in the game and hit two free throws — there is nothing like that for your confidence."

Kruger had said earlier he expected a good test for his Wildcats Thursday night against the Red Raiders; Tech, 1-2, lost by only six points to Kentucky in Rupp Arena on Tuesday night. Needless to say, K-State passed its first road "examination" with flying colors.

"I'm pleased with our intensity and effort...The thing kind of turned in the second half and the players stepped up and did things when they had to," Kruger said.

The game was close throughout the contest, including 13 lead changes, 12 ties and with neither team leading by more than seven points.

K-State, 3-0, was paced by its three junior college transfers, including Charles Bledsoe's 18-point, nine-rebound performance. Mitch Richmond also chipped in 17 points, and William Scott added 12 to the 'Cats' effort. Also in double figures for the Wildcats was Lance Simmons with 10.

Bledsoe's preformance came as a welcomed sign to Kruger who had witnessed his Moberly (Mo.) Junior College transfer struggle during his first two games in a K-State uniform.

"He's got to come and play with that kind of excitement and enthusiasm he played with tonight for us to be as good as we can be," Kruger said.

Richmond came out of the game at one point after being hit with a knee in his back. Richmond, though, battled the pain and came back into game in the final minutes to aid the K-State cause.

Tech was led by a career-high performance from Wendell Owens who had 24 points. Kent Wojoiechoski threw in 12 points, Dewayne Chism added 12 and Greg Crowe was credited with 11.

The first half of the contest was a track meet, during which K-State built its biggest lead of the game, 36-29, thanks in part to four consecutive baskets from Bledsoe.

But the Red Raiders battled back to trail by only a half-dozen at the intermission after scoring six unanswered points late in the period.

K-State and Texas Tech exchanged leads seven times early in the second half before the Raiders built their biggest lead of the contest, 67-61, with a little more than nine minutes remaining.

Kruger then ordered a defensive switch to a zone which his predecessor made famous at K-State. Using a Jack Hartman-style 3-2 zone defense, the 'Cats managed to shut down the red-hot Owens and retake a three-point lead after scoring nine unanswered points.

Tech tied the game with 47 seconds left in the match when an official accidentally kept

Lady Cats face tests at Dial Tournament

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER
Sports Writer

So far this season, everything has gone a little better than coach Matilda Mossman had planned for her team.

Not only has K-State won its first three games of the season — its best start since 1983 when it jumped out to a 7-0 start — but the Lady Cats are playing and winning in a fashion that has their coach a "little surprised."

"We're where we want to be at this point in the season," Mossman said.

"Our play on offense has surprised me more than anything, and we are rebounding better than anticipated. It will be interesting to see how we combat the distraction of playing our first road game."

Mossman will get that look tonight, when her Lady Cats play at Ruston, La., in the Louisiana Tech Dial Classic, a tough, early season test for all four teams involved. Every squad in the two-day tournament sports an undefeated record.

K-State kicks off the tournament at 6 p.m. against American University, Washington D.C.

The winner of the K-State-American matchup will meet the winner of the second game in the finals Saturday. Tonight's second game pits host Louisiana Tech against Central Michigan.

K-State is led in scoring by center Sue Leiding with a 14.3 points per game clip. Forward Carlisa Thomas leads the squad with 9.7 rebounds per game.

As a team, the Lady Cats average 78.7 points per game and only surrender 54.3 points per contest to their opponents.

American University, 2-0, is coming off its best campaign in the school's history with a 20-7 mark last season. Coach Linda Ziemke is in her ninth season at American where she returns all five starters from last year's team. She has also added some highly touted recruits, including high school All-American Doreen Benes.

Sophomore forward Kelly Lane leads the Eagles in both scoring and rebounding with 20 points and 8.5 rebounds per game. Forward Beth Shearer and center Kia Cooper average 15 and 12.5 points per game, respectively.

Mossman said tonight's game with American could be the Lady Cats' best test of the young season.

"American will offer us our biggest challenge yet because they have excellent athletes and balanced scoring," Mossman said.

Host Louisiana Tech's Lady Techsters finished 27-5 last season and have a 2-0 mark this season. They only lost one player from last year's squad and were ranked No. 2 in Sports Illustrated's preseason poll.

Louisiana Tech is led by Nora Lewis, a 6-foot-0 sophomore forward, who averages 15 points and 12 rebounds per game.

Seniors Toni Harrison and Stacey Davis both help out considerably. Harrison averages 12.5 points a game, and Davis pulls down an average of 14 rebounds per contest.

Cental Michigan also boasts a spotless 2-0 record. The Chippewas have all five of their starters with scoring averages in double figures. Point guard Jody Beerman leads the scoring attack with a 22.5 point average and is also the nation's second-best free throw shooter with a .905 percentage.

Tomorrow night's consolation final is scheduled for 6 p.m., with the championship game to follow.

Inside play comes first to Thomas

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

Whether it is against a group of guys in a park at Jacksonville, Fla., or against a Big Eight Conference center, Carlisa Thomas likes to scrap for rebounds underneath the basket.

Thomas, a 5-foot-9 senior forward, said she wants to make her last Lady Cats' season her best. She averaged more than 11 points, eight rebounds and three assists per game last year, and she is K-State's top returner in each of these categories.

"This season is real special and I want to do well because it is my last. It depresses me because I have been playing basketball since the fifth grade," Thomas said.

Thomas began the season on a good note when she was named the Most Valuable Player in the McCall's Pattern Classic played in Manhattan Nov. 28-29.

Thomas, last season's second-team, All-Big Eight selection is fourth on K-State's career rebounding list with 602 boards. Not surprisingly, Thomas said she likes rebounding more than scoring.

"I like to be in there battling for rebounds and scrapping. I got this from playing in the parks in Jacksonville when I was growing up," Thomas said.

Thomas said she believes that she and the other senior returning starters, Sue Leiding and Susan Green, will have to provide key leadership this season if the team is to be successful.

Thomas said she was really anxious for the season to begin.

"I just want to get out there and have fun. I think we have a lot of new people and the freshman will have to come through. I think we will get the job done, though," Thomas said.

According to Thomas, the attitudes of team members are somewhat different than in the past because the Lady Cats this season have a positive attitude.

"This makes the seniors feel good to hear this kind of attitude," she said.

Thomas may scrap for every extra inch on the court, but away from the arena, Thomas refers to herself as low-key and almost shy.

She said people who do not know her may think she is a big "bully," but people who get to know her usually think quite the opposite. Thomas spends much of her spare time listening to music and thinking.

Thomas was an All-American at Jean Ribault High School in Jacksonville and was recruited heavily by some of the nation's top women's basketball programs. She decided her senior year to move away from home to become more independent and she wanted to go to a school where she could play early in her career.

However, the swaying factor that led Thomas to K-State had nothing to do with basketball.

"K-State stressed academics as the most important thing and basketball as second. Some of the other schools stress what basketball could do for me at that school," Thomas said.

She is a social sciences major and plans to graduate in December 1987.

On the basketball court, Coach Matilda Mossman often gets upset when Thomas does not take an open shot, and this may be an indication of her modesty and unselfishness.

"(Carlisa) is one of the most unselfish players I have ever been around," Mossman said.

"She is one of the most phenomenal female athletes I have been associated with," Mossman added. "She is quick, strong and fast. She sets the tempo in everything we do and the other players rally around her."

This season Thomas is expected to score more points if the Lady Cats are to improve from last season's 16-13 record and sixth-place Big Eight finish.

Thomas humbly admitted to one goal she set as a freshman that she would still like to achieve.

"When I first came here, I told myself I wanted to be an All-American before I left," Thomas said. "It would put something behind my name that would mean something."

Thomas will get a stern test this weekend when she faces some of the nation's top talent as the Lady Cats play in the Louisiana Tech Dial Classic.

OU's Switzer wins award for coaching team to title

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Barry Switzer of Oklahoma, architect of one of the most successful programs in sports, was a near-unanimous choice as 1986 Associated Press Big Eight coach of the year.

Switzer was selected on all but two ballots by a panel of media observers who regularly cover Big Eight football.

The 49-year-old native of Crossett, Ark., entered the 1986 season with three national championships and a 13-year record of 126-24-4 for a winning percentage of .831 that was best in the nation.

After zipping 10-1 through this season and capturing a second straight Big Eight title, Switzer's standing was enhanced even further. Since taking over for Chuck Fairbanks in 1973, Switzer has won or shared 11 Big Eight titles and maintained a level of excellence that is unmatched by any other college coach during the period.

"Barry is an excellent choice as Big Eight coach of the year," said Pat Jones, Oklahoma State head coach. "He's the one I would vote for."

One secret to Switzer's unbroken chain of success may lie in the undiminished enthusiasm he brings to his work.

"I still enjoy my job as much as I ever did," he said three days after mounting a come-from-behind 20-17 victory over Nebraska. "I still look forward to going to practice. I look forward to getting out there and recruiting more great players to come to Oklahoma."

Pictures of the great players Switzer has brought into the Sooner camp adorn almost one entire wall of the football offices on the Norman, Okla., campus. A parade of Switzer-coached all-Americans include Leroy Selmon, Tony Casillas, Rod Shoate, Joe Washington and Billy Sims.

"Success breeds success," is one of the Oklahoma coach's favorite expressions. This year's team included the Big Eight offensive and defensive players of the year — quarterback Jamelle Holieway and linebacker Brian Bosworth.

Bosworth, described by Switzer as his all-time greatest linebacker, was named a first-team All-America for the second consecutive year.

'Cats play Saturday, return this morning

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State basketball team will be returning to Manhattan when their plane lands at the Manhattan Municipal Airport at 11:30 this morning.

Thursday night's victory over the Red Raiders of Texas Tech came as a bright sign for first-year coach Lon Kruger and his youthful Wildcats.

K-State's record after defeating the defending Southwest Conference Tournament champs moved to 3-0 going into Saturday night's game with Southwest Texas State.

The Bobcats went 6-22 last season and are under the direction of first-year coach Harry Larrabee. Larrabee walked into a rebuilding job in San Marco, Texas, as the Bobcats graduated four key players from last year's team.

The Bobcats will be led by 6-foot-8 senior forward Ray Danielak who averaged 8.9 points a game last year.

The Bobcats will have their hands full — K-State beat their first two home foes by an average of 43 points.

O-State closes season with victory over MU

By The Associated Press

STILLWATER, Okla. — Tailback Barry Sanders rushed for 86 yards and a touchdown Thursday night as Oklahoma State defeated Missouri, 10-6, in the college football finale for both Big Eight Conference teams.

Sanders, a freshman, carried 22 times as he shared time with sophomore Mitch Nash. Thurman Thomas, the Cowboys' banged-up All-Big Eight tailback, carried only one time and fumbled after a 15-yard gain.

Oklahoma State overcame five turnovers — including four intercepted passes thrown by Mike Gundy — and three missed field goals by Joey O'Donnell to win their third straight and finish at 6-5 overall, 4-3 in the Big Eight. Missouri wound up 3-8 and 2-5.

The Cowboys, heavy favorites coming in, scored on the final play of the first half when Sanders went in on a pitch play from 1 yard out. The touchdown was set up by a 46-yard pass from Gundy to split end Hart Lee Dykes and a 20-yard completion to tight end J.R. Dillard, both in the final 20 seconds.

Oklahoma State's other score came on a 22-yard field goal by O'Donnell in the third quarter.

Gundy, the Big Eight Conference offensive newcomer of the year, had entered the game with just one interception in 196 attempts.

Testaverde tops best on All-American poll

By The Associated Press

The nation's top runner and No. 1 passer — Temple tailback Paul Palmer and Miami of Florida quarterback Vinny Testaverde — were named Thursday to the Associated Press All-American football team for 1986.

Miami and Oklahoma each put three players on the elite squad while Auburn and Ohio State had two each.

Testaverde was joined by teammates Jerome Brown, a defensive tackle, and free safety Bennie Blades, who led the nation with 10 interceptions.

Testaverde, who is expected to win the Heisman Trophy on Saturday, led Miami to a No. 1 ranking in the AP poll for the last 10 weeks by completing 175 of 276 passes for 2,557 yards and a nation-leading 26 touchdowns in 10 games.

Oklahoma, the team Miami displaced as No. 1 after beating the Sooners 28-16 on Sept. 27, is represented by inside linebacker Brian Bosworth, tight end Keith Jackson and offensive guard Mark Hutson, all juniors.

Consumers choose old-fashioned method

Basic wood stoves decrease heat bills

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Due to the rising cost of electricity and gas, many consumers are shunning high-tech developments and turning toward an old-fashioned method of heating their homes — wood burning stoves.

The simple concept of the wood stove has been around for centuries. The basic wood stove has a combustion chamber where the wood is loaded and an air inlet that provides the primary air for the combustion.

Doug Walter, Extension specialist of residential energy, said the system is simply a matter of igniting the wood with sufficient heat. As the wood burns, the heat is absorbed by the metal or cast iron walls of the stove which radiates to objects in the room as well as heating the air.

The more sophisticated models available today have secondary combustion. This allows the intake of additional air, necessary for combustion at a second chamber. In turn, the combustible material is reignited in the flue ashes or the smoke given off by the fire, providing a more complete burning and higher efficiency, he said.

The interest in wood stoves has probably subsided some, but the numbers are still strong because it is a popular and efficient method of heating, Walter said.

"We get a number of requests for information about wood burning because it is a subject that people have an interest," he said.

"In this area, wood burning stoves are becoming more popular because frankly, it is cheaper to burn wood or coal than it is to pay for electricity," said Bruce Ewing, owner of Manhattan Solar Systems Inc., Rural Route 3 Manhattan.

Two topics concerning consumers most are the potential fire hazards and air pollution caused by wood burning stoves.

"It is always dangerous when consumers have a solid-fuel combustion applicances in their homes," Walter said. "But most dangers result either from improper installation or operation."

The chimney design, material and structure are important aspects when concerning fire hazards. The wrong combustion can result in the heating up of framing members or construction units to the point of ignition.

Wood that does not burn completely gives off a mixture of tarry, flammable, toxic substances. The portion that condenses in flues, or the shaft for the passage of smoke, and chimney is called creosote; the prime cause of chimney fires.

"If the wrong type of material is used and the chimney is too cool, creosote accumulation will occur," he said. "This can eventually result in a chimney fire if it is not corrected."

Creosote accumulation is the result of improper operation. In airtight stoves, a slow, smoldering fire can cause the wood to burn inefficiently which causes a high level of creosote build up.

"A very hot fire after this accumulation will cause a chimney fire, so it is better to maintain, at least periodically, to burn a good hot fire to minimize this build up," Walter said.

The amount of unburned material in wood stove can be quite large, especially for older stoves.

"In some parts of the country, there is a high concentration of wood stoves," he said. "This combined with the local climatic conditions are producing pollution from the stoves."

The pollution from the stoves has prompted legislative response at a variety of levels. Oregon and Colorado, as well as several municipalities, rushed to set emission standards for the new stoves.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has also announced plans to regulate wood stove emissions under the provisions of the Clean Air Act.

The stove manufacturers will have to comply with these standards in order to sell the stoves, but this will only apply to new stoves that are being sold, Walter said.

Stove designers and engineers have come up with a number of new solutions to this problem. One of these features on the market is the catalytic combuster or converter.

"This simply reduces the temperature of the secondary combustion and more complete burning to 550 degrees Fahrenheit, instead of 1000, which is the normal flue or smoke temperature," Walter said.

"This makes it easier to achieve the second combustion."

Size of wood stove difficult buying decision

By The Collegian Staff

Once the potential wood stove buyer decides to make the move, one of the largest problems is in determining what size unit is required.

Deciding on the correct size of stove for a home is a difficult procedure because there is seldom a universal method used to rate the output of a stove.

The output methods are often not given in meaningful terms for the consumer. The manufacturer may tell a consumer that a stove will produce so many British thermal units per hour or it will heat so many square feet of floor space or so much volume of the house.

"The most meaningful one would be the btu per hour because you can apply this figure to your homes particular heating load," said Doug Walter, Extension specialist of residential energy.

Walter said Extension advises buyers to slightly undersize the stove, but avoid purchasing too large of stove. This means the stove will run at less than full output in addition to being a less efficient use of the stove, he said.

"You really want to have as hot of fire as possible for the most complete combustion and highest efficiency," Walter said. "If you oversize a stove, you are more likely to have a slow, smoldering combustion which will lead to creosote build up."

Stove prices have a wide range, depending on the type of metal, thickness, size and extra features. A typical, quality stove would have a price range of $400 to $800.

"But when you get into the European designs and stoves with more features, it is not uncommon to spend over $1,000," Walter said.

A relatively recent innovation catching consumer's attention is the insert, or airtight stove, which is placed inside a fireplace.

"This started when they realized that fireplaces sucked more heat than it heated," said Bruce Ewing, owner of Manhattan Solar Systems Inc., Rural Route 3, Manhattan. "Another popular item that consumers want is the glass door so they can see the fire."

Consumers usually buy wood burning stoves from mid-October until the end of January. After that, Ewing said, people still considering purchasing a stove will generally wait until the next year.

Union to host annual holiday smorgasbord

By AMY GREENE
Collegian Reporter

Once each year, the K-State Union hosts a veritable feast that has become a University tradition. The Union will present its Christmas Smorgasbord from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m. Dec. 11, 12 and 13 in the Union Ballroom.

"The smorgasbord is the K-State Union's treat to the University and the community," said Malley Sisson, Union Food Service director.

Sisson said the smorgasbord is a gift, and the purpose for the dinner is not for profit.

"Smorgasbord started back in the 1930s as a project the Tea Room Management class did," Sisson said.

The smorgasbord is divided into four courses: appetizers and hot wassail, cold food buffet, hot entrees and 13 different desserts. The buffet provides 65 different foods from which to choose, including Scandinavian and American food.

The Union Ballroom will be decorated in a Christmas motif. Student employees and more than 40 volunteers will greet the people, take them to their tables and take tickets.

The volunteers will also entertain guests, and Santa Claus and bell ringers will be in attendance. Student employees for the Union Food Service will prepare the meals and stock the buffet tables.

Planning for the smorgasbord starts in October. Barb Depew, production dietician, purchases ingredients for the meal and makes sure it arrives on time. Sisson said it takes a long time to prepare for the dinner because some ingredients are Scandinavian and take longer to locate.

Food preparation begins as early as Thanksgiving. The bakers begin making desserts and the food is prepared a little at a time.

After the dinner, there will be a bread sale from 5 to 9:30 p.m. on the second floor of the Union. About 950 people have already bought tickets, Sisson said.

"We expect about 1,300 to 1,400 people," Sisson said. "Success of the smorgasbord will be measured by participation in ticket sales and customer satisfaction."

Sisson said the dinner has been successful in the past. Tickets are priced at $12 for adults and $6 for children aged 12 and under.

Tickets will be on sale until Dec. 9 or until sold out. They may be purchased in the director's office in the Union from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

"If persons wish, they may send in mail orders and their tickets will be mailed to them if they enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope," Sisson said.

No telephone reservations will be accepted.

PERSONAL 16

THETA ACTIVES: Moonlight and Mistletoe is here at last! The date announced—time and place revealed, we've found our dates and invitations are sealed. A special night's planned, we'll always remember, so get ready and excited for the 6th of December! Love, the Pledges. (70)

TKE—"SCREECH that stole Christmas dates": We'll sneak to Topeka and privately party, drink, be merry and eat pretty hearty. The town will never be the same, but will it be TKEs and Chi-Os to blame? Get excited. Love, Chi-O Dates. (70)

CHI-O Jen A.—How could a guy expect anything less than a "night to remember" with a swell date like you? —J.L. (70)

MARK, ANOTHER big game is near, all of the fans will scream and cheer; so dribble and shoot and do your best, you'll put the others to the test. Good luck, Saturday! Love ya, V. P.S. One jumper for me! (70)

FOUR WILD women of apartment 13—What an unlucky apartment number, but not unlucky for you crazy girls. Remember singing to Meatloaf, Marnie's flashing fits in Aggie, scammin', six people in my vette, orange boxers, and our friend Jeff. Did he ever find his watch? Who won the scammin' contest? Mamie, how about those long lost earrings? I hope Mom and Pop P. learned the difference between scamming and sex. You guys are too crazy for me, but I love it. Merry Christmas. Keep in touch. Aruba bound in 1988. Love, Paula. (70)

STRESS—A week of stress is only normal, but will be forgotten at the Lambda Chi Formal. The Plaza Lights will shine so bright, as we lose ourselves in the K.C. night. Love, Tiger. (70)

KD's—HALF commemorate Pearl Harbor with the Kappa Sigs and we will have another day that will go down in infamy. (70)

AMY: RUMOR has it that Wink had a great time Saturday. The Super Twins. (70)

MIKE-A-NOLL—LOOKING forward to taking you to Moonlight and Mistletoe . . . again. Are we having fun yet? Happy Anniversary. Brittany. (70)

HAPPY B-DAY Gin-Rummy! I'm getting a feeling of romance—so be ready for the unordinary. Love, Mike. (70)

HUTCH TRASH—Tomorrow's the Theta party. Let's drink til we drown. Then meet me under the mistletoe—I wanna play doctor with you, Clown! Love, Steg. (70)

G PHIs—Tinsel is silver, snow is white, let's make up and end this fight. P.S. No bologna! (70) candid response to the questions and a lot of helpful information."

The information, he said, is "opening more doors that we have to send a subpoena through in order to (compile) accurate information."

"We have people flying around the country this morning serving subpeonas for documents. So the document search has become also a very, very important part of this," he said.

The Minnesota Republican did not say what documents the committee was seeking. But in Moultrie, Ga., Maule Aircraft Corp. said it had received subpeonas for records on four aircraft from the U.S. attorney's office in Macon as well from the Senate committee. The four airplanes include one reportedly sold to rebels in Nicaragua by a firm headed by retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard V. Secord.

Secord has been identified by administration officials as an assistant to fired National Security Council aide Oliver North in arranging the Iranian arms sales and creation of a privately funded air force to deliver weapons to the Contra forces.

Billy Fallin, an attorney for the firm, said the subpoenaed payment instructions and records of telephone calls between Maule and the buyers have been turned over to authorities as requested. "I'm not concerned about any wrongdoing on our part," he added.

Durenberger said the committee will extend its hearing schedule beyond next week, and will soon decide which Cabinet officials to call to testify. He said those under consideration include the members of the National Security Council — CIA Director William Casey, Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Weinberger — but not the president or Vice President George Bush.

A single television camera shared by all networks was permitted outside the committee's room, and by agreement with Senate officials, it was turned off when the unidentified officials involved in clandestine operations entered the room. Photographers similarly agreed not to take pictures.

A television recording and photographs were permitted when Gates arrived to meet the panel.

At the White House, Frank Carlucci, the president's newly appointed national security adviser, said he will have direct access to the Oval Office and has free rein to shake up the staff and operation of the White House National Security Council.

He said he has put a 10-member team to work sizing up the NSC to determine "what kind of changes may be appropriate" in the wake of the Iranian-Contra operation that was coordinated by an NSC aide.

Meanwhile, Democratic presidential aspirant Gary Hart cautioned fellow party members against seeking partisan gain. "If people in my party attack the president for partisan advantage I say shame on us," Hart said in Des Moines, Iowa. "It's bad politics and it's bad policy. I think we ought to play it straight down the middle."

Retiring House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., predicted that "everybody will be smoked out" in the investigations that will come, even if they use the Fifth Amendment to avoid answering questions. But O'Neill, who has been a point-man for Democratic opposition to Reagan for the past six years, added that the issue does not appear to be a Watergate-type scandal that will force the president to resign.

Reagan himself was not asked about Weinberger's comments, but chief administration spokesman Larry Speakes took issue with the defense secretary.

"Obviously the president is on the record and so are the rest of us that there were moderate factions in Iran that we were dealing with," Speakes told reporters who questioned him. "So we are a little bit at odds with the secretary on that one.

"The secretary said the president got bad advice," the spokesman added. "Well, the president made the decision, the president has taken responsibility for the decision he made, and it's his, advice or no advice, good advice, bad advice or mediocre advice."

Earlier, Speakes said he had not read Weinberger's remarks, and added, "I'd like to see his full text before I cut him off at the knees."

treatment of Medicare patients.

The system established a list of 467 treatment types, called diagnostic related groups, and fixed a fee for each group to give hospitals an incentive to be more efficient and frugal.

"This plan generally provides a particular level of payment for all patients within one DRG, regardless of differences in length of hospital stay," said AMA Executive Vice President James H. Sammons.

"Thus, there may be an economic incentive for the hospital to limit the length of stay of any Medicare patient, and physicians may feel some pressure to discharge Medicare patients as soon as possible," Sammons said in Friday's issue of the AMA's weekly American Medical News.

Dr. Pedro A. Palma, an obstetrician-gynecologist and president of the Chicago Medical Society, said in a telephone interview Thursday that the pressure is not limited to Medicare cases but occurs in all cases with third-party payers, such as insurance companies.

"If a patient has pneumonia, they assign you five days in the hospital. All hospitals have decision review committees. When the third or fourth day comes about, they are calling for a decision on whether the patient goes home tomorrow.

"Then they give you an extra day and they give you another call. You have to start looking for justification," he said. "Often, you have to get a second opinion before admitting a patient. You may have to check with the insurance company on whether to proceed at all.

"If the physician has this situation more than once a day, I'm afraid some decisions would be made for opting to release patient early, just to avoid the aggravation," he said.

The doctors surveyed were selected randomly from the AMA's master file of all active U.S. physicians, the AMA said.

a ball in play that was heading out-of-bounds. Owens picked up the loose ball, drove the lane and was fouled during the process for a three-point play.

Following a Crowe tip-in the next trip down the floor, the Raiders owned a 72-70 lead. But Owens' luck was not to hold true all night. With Tech leading by one with control of the ball, Owens was called for traveling and K-State took control with 21 seconds left and set up Smith's heroics.

Texas Tech coach Gerald Meyers had high praise for the Wildcats and first-year coach Lon Kruger following his team's defeat.

"K-State is a fine team. Richmond is really tough, I can see why he was a first-team junior college All-American. They won a tough game on the road," Meyers said. "I think that Lon Kruger has done a good job and they are a good team."

Senate

In relation to the vetoed referendum bill, Johnson proposed a bill during first readings that would form an ad hoc committee to study the representation issue.

A motion was then made to postpone the bill indefinitely.

"I think we should wait until we know for certain the petition drive is going to succeed," said Eirene Tathum, junior in construction science.

"Then only if the students vote 'no' on the referendum bill, do we need an ad hoc committee," she said.

The proposed ad hoc committee bill will be up for second reading at Senate's first meeting next semester.

Also approved Thursday night was a bill proposing Student Governing Association elections be held two weeks before Thanksgiving break instead of the present system of February.

Sponsors of the bill said they believe newly elected officers need the extra time to familiarize themselves with their offices before the allocation process begins in the spring.

Senate also voted on a bill proposing that current limits on SGA campaign expenditures be dropped.

Although the bill was first dropped from consideration, it was brought back to the floor for discussion following a speech by its sponsor, Mike Riley, senior in political science.

The bill was defeated after discussion.

Liquor

Currently, it is illegal for liquor stores to advertise specific brands. Most of the owners believe this is unfair.

"I can see the point in not wanting to entice people into buying and consuming more alcohol than they normally would," Behem said. "But from a business standpoint, this is very unfair. Every other business uses promotion to market its product."

Bill Schroeder, owner of Schroeder's Liquor Store, 3043 Anderson Ave., said changes need to be made in this area.

"As it is, you can't have a display any closer than three feet from your window. This is so the ABC can watch the activity in the store. But any kind of advertising changes would help my business quite a bit," he said.

The recommendations, if passed, would lead to deregulation and competition.

Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel's Retail Liquor, 1129 Bluemont Ave., said almost everybody would benefit from the changes.

"Everybody comes out ahead," he said. "The consumers get a cheaper price, and everybody is happy.

"Except, of course, the smaller stores — because they would be out of business," Rickel said.

iseum, set for mid-October 1988.

One of these ideas is to have a birthday party for K-State as 1988 marks the 125th anniversary of the University.

Hein said a $100-per-plate dinner would be held to bring in supporters from around the state. This would be followed by a show featuring K-State alumni prominent in theater, television and the arts. Admission to the show would be about $2.

Hein said another idea is to have a student appreciation night, with a free concert sponsored by businesses and organizations in the area.

"By doing this," Hein said, "this trade area can express its appreciation to students who moved ahead and enabled the coliseum to be built."

Another suggestion would be to have a Kansas Farm Forum, bringing in 3,000 to 5,000 people in agriculture. Hein said this would be sometime in the spring of 1989, following the national elections in 1988.

It is hoped the new secretary of agriculture would attend and hold a forum on the new administration's approach to farm policy. Hein would like to see this become an annual event.

Hein stressed the fact that all of these ideas are strictly in the discussion phase, and no action has been taken on any of them.

Wefald submits alternative to proposed cuts

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

University President Jon Wefald has recommended a five-point budget reform to the state that would significantly reduce the $3.06 million in University cuts proposed by Governor-elect Mike Hayden.

In a letter to acting state director Gary Stotts, Wefald said the 3.8 percent cuts as proposed would be "nothing short of devastating."

The mandated cuts also would mean a decrease in the availability of some classes next semester, and other classes would be consolidated, Wefald wrote in the impact statement.

Wefald said, however, if some funds are reinstated to the University, it would make a difference in the spring semester schedule.

"Right now, it's hard to predict," he said.

Wefald proposed five points that would reduce the amount of money the University stands to lose. These points, which follow, are pending approval by the state.

— The release of $124,199 in tuition fees by the state treasury that were collected by the University during the 1986 fall semester.

"The state always holds a certain amount of the students' tuition fees every semester," he said.

— A 3 percent increase in spring semester tuition that would require the approval of the Kansas Board of Regents.

Wefald said the state has already slated a 3 percent tuition increase for the next fiscal year beginning July 1, 1987. That increase would instead be initiated retroactive to January 1, 1987, he said.

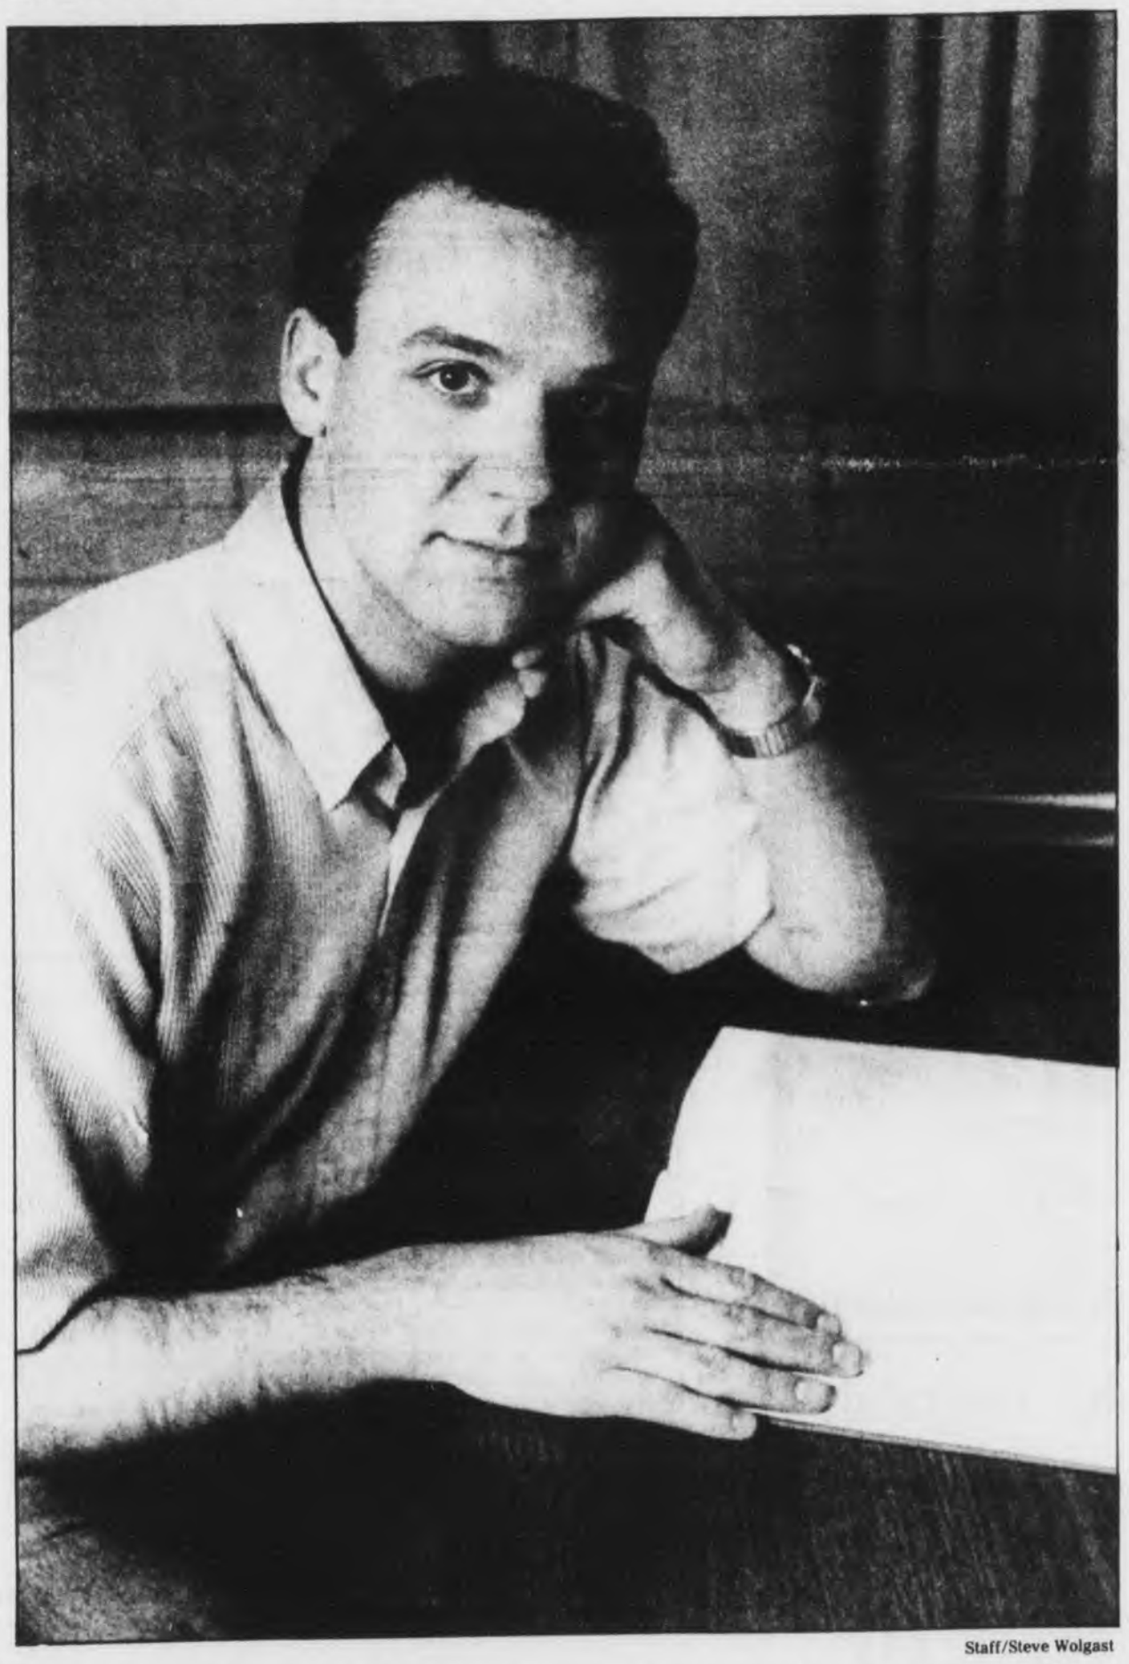
The 3 percent increase would represent a $23 or $24 increase for each student for the upcoming semester, said George Miller, vice president of administration and finance.

— Review and reconsideration of state guidelines which currently do not allow capital improvements to be cut.

Cuts in capital improvement would free up funds that would off-set the proposed cuts.

"We are basically asking for more flexibility here because the cuts are so severe," Wefald said.

Miller said it would be extremely difficult to gauge how much money could be generated from capital improvements because "we would have to review all the different accounts and contractual obligations."



— Reconsideration of energy management procedures that do not provide incentives to the University.

Last week, Wefald ordered campuswide energy saving measures that would save the University $167,000 in the next six months.

However, Wefald said any energy funds appropriated by the state that are not used by the University must be returned to the state. He said he would like to see that the money the University saves is implemented to

Senior receives Rhodes Scholar prize

Kelly Welch, senior in economics and agricultural economics, was named one of 11 Rhodes Scholars Saturday at the University of Minnesota Law School. Welch is the fifth Rhodes Scholar from K-State in 13 years.

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

For Rhodes Scholar finalist Kelly Welch, countless hours of preparation came down to 5 hours and 45 minutes of waiting.

Welch, senior in economics and agricultural economics, was waiting and thinking about the possibility of being named, or not being named, one of 32 Rhodes Scholars in the United States.

Then, at 6:15 p.m. Saturday night, the waiting for Welch and 11 other finalists assembled at the University of Minnesota Law School, ended. Welch listened to the announcement and his dreams came true — he was a Rhodes Scholar.

"I don't know how to feel. I haven't come down from Cloud Nine yet," he said Sunday.

The $32,000 Rhodes Scholarship will enable Welch to attend Oxford University in Oxford, England, for two to three years. He plans to study philosophy, politics and economics. He also plans to travel in England but emphasized the opportunity to study at Oxford is most important.

Welch said the help he received in the past months is the key to his achievement.

"A lot of people put so much effort into this. The support I received from faculty, friends and family was great," he said.

Welch credited much of his success to the preparatory help given him by Nancy Twiss, pre-law adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences and coordinator for the Rhodes and Marshall Scholars committees.

"Nancy Twiss's ability to prepare people for these competition-type situations is absolutely phenomenal," he said. "She is by far the main instrument in K-State receiving the Rhodes Scholarships."

K-State has had five Rhodes Scholars in the past 13 years, Twiss said. Virgil Wiebe, who was a Rhodes Scholar in 1985, is currently studying at Oxford.

"K-State's record is excellent to have so many winners in so few years," Twiss said about K-State's success with the Rhodes Scholarships. "I don't think there is a university in a multistate region that can match the number of

U.S. airlift moves Honduran military

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — U.S. helicopters, with President Reagan's approval, on Sunday began airlifting Honduran troops to within 25 miles of a battle with about 1,000 Nicraguan troops that have crossed into Honduras, a State Department spokesman said.

No Americans were involved in the fighting, and they were under orders to remain at least 25 miles away, in keeping with congressional restrictions on the use of U.S. forces along the border dividing Honduras, a U.S. ally, from Nicaragua, governed by the leftist Sandinistas, said the spokesman, Gregory Lagana.

A statement released late Sunday by the State Department said on Saturday night Reagan, "after consulting with his senior advisers, agreed to provide the requested airlift support using U.S. military helicopters currently located at Honduras' Palmerola air base, near Comayagua."

The airlift began Sunday afternoon and is expected to conclude sometime Monday, the statement said. "U.S. helicopters will not be armed and will not approach areas of hostile action," the statement said.

Lagana said "there had been a series of harassing actions last week, patrols moving across the border. Then on Thursday, 200 Sandinista troops overran a Honduran position manned by 16 to 20 Honduran soldiers."

The attack came in an area not far from positions occupied by U.S.-backed Contra rebels, Lagana said, "but we have no doubt that the Sandinistas knew they were attacking Honduran positions."

The statement said the Honduran government formally protested the Nicaraguan attack Friday, but "the protest was rejected by the Sandinistas."

The following day, the Honduran armed forces "verified the presence in Honduras of a Sandinista force estimated to number over 1,000 troops and confirmed continuing Sandinista attacks against Honduran military outposts well within Honduras," the statement said.

Late Saturday afternoon, "the Honduran armed forces launched air strikes against Sandinista targets within Honduras, the statement said, and the government of Honduras requested U.S. airlift assistance.

U.S. UH-1H Huey and CH-47 Chinook helicopters based at the Palmerola air base in Honduras were being used to ferry Honduran forces toward the battle, with the Hueys handling the troops and the Chinooks artillery and other equipment, he said.

"No fixed winged aircraft are taking part," Lagana said.

Expert says debt crisis impacts smaller banks

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

The impact of the foreign debt crisis has reached not only the large multi-national banking institutions but the smaller regional and local institutions in the United States as well.

"There is no such thing as domestic banking anymore," said Sarkis Khoury, professor of finance at the University of California-Riverside and leader of an economics seminar titled "The Foreign Debt Crisis: Implication for the Domestic Economy and Ways to Deal With it."

The seminar, conducted in the Union Big Eight Room, was sponsored by the International Trade Institute, K-State and the International Trade Council of Mid-America, Inc.

Khoury said the syndication of bank loans to debtor nations during the 1960s and 1970s helped banks spread the risk of loaning money to developing countries among more banks, but now foreign debt difficulties have "uncovered the weaknesses of syndication."

"The reliance of smaller banks on the 'wisdom' of larger banks in assessing risk in loans to sovereign countries was severely tested in the early 1980s when several countries were near default on their loans," he said.

Khoury cited the 1985 rescheduling of Mexico's $48 billion debt, and the subsequent impact on 1,200 different banks, as an example of the number

Speaker says Reagan should re-establish bonds with Iran

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

The crisis affecting the Reagan administration stems from the need to re-establish links to the geopolitically important nation of Iran, a free-lance journalist from Pakistan said Friday.

Agha Khalid Saeed, a free-lance journalist and doctorate of philosophy candidate at the University of California-Berkley, spoke to about 40 people at the speech sponsored by the Iranian Student Association and the International Coordinating Council.

Saeed, quoting extensively from former Carter administration National Security Council Chief Zbignew Bryzinski's book "Game Plan 1986," said it is important to understand the underlying policy considerations used in re-establishing contact in with Iran.

"The net gain for the U.S. in this whole thing has been that they have been able to get back into the Indian Ocean region." he said.

The United States has been out of the region since the Iranian revolution in 1979. In that year, the Shah of Iran was deposed by the Ayatollah Khomeni and American hostages were taken at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

But despite being a nation which many Americans believe the government should have no dealings, the geopolitical importance of the region makes Iran a nation in which the United States has an interest, he said.

Saeed said the administration's strategy is two-fold: one, control Soviet aggression in South Asia; and two, create a pool of resources, both human and natural, in the region into which the United States can tap.

Parties want arms sales specifics

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers from both parties Sunday welcomed President Reagan's concession that mistakes were made in carrying out his policy of arms sales to Iran, but they urged him to move further and faster in disclosing details of the transactions.

"The right strategy is, No. 1, to come up front," said Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C. "The president is moving in that direction. He said yesterday that he thought some mistakes had been made. That's quite a concession."

Other prominent Democratic lawmakers, as well as members of the president's own party, echoed the sentiments voiced by Hollings, who has been one of Reagan's harshest critics in the weeks since the series of transactions, including up to $30 million in clandestine payments to Nicaraguan rebels, began to come to light.

Reagan, in his weekly radio address Saturday, said that "while we're still seeking all the facts, it is obvious that the execution of these policies was flawed and mistakes were made."

However, he did not specify who made the mistakes, what they were, or when they were made. Other questions are when Reagan approved the shipment of arms to Iran, what weapons were sent and what his intentions were.

Hollings, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, which is investigating the matter, said on ABC's "This Week with David Brinkley," that 12 arms shipments were made to Iran, totaling 5,000 tons.

That would be higher than administration estimates. Reagan said last month that the contents of the shipments could have fit into one cargo plane.

More information may come to light this week as the Senate com-

Fewer offices give holiday bonuses

BOSTON — The tradition of a cash holiday bonus for employees is disappearing or being replaced by the giving of turkeys, office parties and performance awards, according to a survey.

"Interestingly enough, most companies do not give out Christmas bonuses and have not had a recent Christmas bonus plan," said Claire Connolly of TeleSearch, an executive search firm that conducted the survey last month.

"Our company has had a Christmas bonus program and we just assumed that that was the norm," said Connolly, a senior vice president of the Natick-based company.

TeleSearch said it surveyed 80 major companies, primarily in the Northeast, representing high technology, manufacturing, financial services, insurance, publishing and other fields.

Of those polled, 78 percent said they will give no holiday bonus of any kind this year.

Black bear kills 11-year-old boy

SAND SPRINGS, Okla. — A 300-pound black bear being kept as a pet killed an 11-year-old boy as he attempted to feed it an ear of corn, authorities said.

Samuel Nipps, 11, was pronounced dead Saturday at the home of Danny Boatman, who was keeping the bear chained in his front yard as a favor for a friend, said Bill Williams, spokesman for the Osage County Sheriff's Department.

When the bear attacked Samuel, Boatman's son, who was also feeding the bear, ran inside and called a next-door neighbor. The neighbor shot and killed the bear, authorities said.

Tubas give old carols new sound

BOSTON — They groaned through "We Wish You a Merry Christmas." They bellowed "We Three Kings of Orient Are." But the sound of 65 tubas working their way through yuletide carols was music to Margie Flinchbaugh's ears.

"It's deep," said a smiling Flinchbaugh, 38, of Centerville on Cape Cod as she stood in the Faneuil Hall marketplace plaza Saturday enjoying the concert. "It sounds like an elephant going to his grave."

Sponsored by the Boston University School for the Arts, the tuba concert known as TubaChristmas was the first for Boston, according to university spokesman Norman Allen.

Human may receive chimp's heart

NEW YORK — Surgeons at a New York City hospital want to use a chimpanzee heart to keep a dying patient alive until a human heart is available, a newspaper reported Sunday.

Doctors have submitted a proposal to perform the animal-to-human heart transplant to Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center's institutional review board, which must approve any research involving patients, the Daily News said.

The last animal-to-human heart transplant was the 1984 "Baby Fae" case, which sparked controversy over the ethics of using animal hearts in transplants.

In that case, Dr. Leonard Bailey, a surgeon at Loma Linda Medical Center in California, transplanted a baboon heart into an infant.

Indian police detain protestors

NEW DELHI, India — An estimated 10,000 people were detained by police in the western Indian state of Maharashtra during protests over cotton prices Sunday, the United News of India reported.

The demonstrators attempted to block roads and railways to protest the federal government's textile policy, the news agency said. Cotton growers in the state contend the policy favors synthetic materials.

Iran owns expensive plot in Israel

TEL AVIV, Israel — The Iranian government, an outspoken enemy of Israel, owns one of the most expensive plots of land in Tel Aviv, a city spokesman said Sunday.

The 55-square-yard lot was bought by Iran for the construction of its mission before the Shah was replaced by an Islamic fundamentalist government in 1979. Benny Cohen, the city spokesman, said the land is in one of Tel Aviv's most expensive residential areas.

Mayor Shlomo Lahat has proposed that the land, used as a parking lot and dump, be turned into a park, Cohen said.

Lahat has promised to return the land to Iran when diplomatic relations are established, Cohen said.

Zimbabwean officials fire teachers

HARARE, Zimbabwe — The government fired 173 teachers from state schools last year, most of them for having affairs with pupils, according to an official report published Sunday.

The secretary for education's annual report said investigations by disciplinary committees into cases of alleged misconduct resulted in 111 teachers being dismissed for having sexual relationships with pupils, 30 for stealing school funds and 32 for other reasons.

Zimbabwe's 11,700 teachers were warned by Education Minister Dzingai Mutumbuka they face instant dismissal if they have affairs with pupils.

Chest pains put mayor in hospital

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Mayor Jack Reardon of Kansas City, Kan., was hospitalized in fair condition Sunday at the University of Kansas Medical Center after complaining of chest pains.

Reardon, 43, who suffers from a degenerative heart condition and is a candidate for a heart transplant, was admitted to the hospital about 1 p.m. Sunday, according to Mary Harrison, director of university relations.

There was no evidence of a heart attack, but doctors decided to keep Reardon hospitalized overnight for observation, Harrison said.

Reardon's condition has not altered his status as a candidate for a heart transplant, she said. Last month the mayor was determined to be eligible for a transplant and his name was placed on a nationwide computer network for potential organ recipients.

The mayor has been designated as a status three transplant candidate, the least critical of four categories for potential heart recipients.

Aggie merchants think closing will not work

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

Although K-State's Student Senate has recommended Aggieville should be closed down at some point during the day of the K-State-University of Kansas football game next fall, at least a few merchants in the district don't think that will solve the destruction problem.

Sonny Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, 1218 Moro St., said closing down Aggieville at some point during game day would not be a viable solution.

"I think it would take quite a bit of police enforcement to enforce that," Ballard said.

He said he believes the rowdiness would become widespread if there was not a place to gather.

"I do feel pretty strongly that it's going to create problems in other areas of town. It's probably just going to shift the people around.

"Students are going to party someplace that night," Ballard said.

"I think one thing people tend to forget is that we're proud of the attraction we've got here," he said. "Aggieville is an attractive place for the students, and is a good place to come have fun. Hopefully, it doesn't mean closing down something we think is a good deal."

Tami Rogers, owner of Aggie Ski and Sport, 1212 Moro St., said police should monitor entrances to Aggieville on the night of the game, much like any concert or similar event that would occur in an outdoor or indoor facility.

"Are they going to close down Aggieville every time we play KU?" Rogers said. "I think they ought to treat it like an event."

Steve Ruffin, manager of Crimper's beauty salon, 613 N. Manhattan Ave., said the celebration should still take place, but at an alternative site.

"Well, considering I'm someone whose still waiting on his regular piece of (storefront) glass, I think every bar that's here should set up a little booth in the park," Ruffin said. "What can they rip up in the park?

"They're not going to tear down trees; it's not even fun. They don't smash," he said.

Terry Ray, a member of the Aggieville Merchants Association and owner of several businesses in the shopping district, said the organization would deliver a statement of position on how to handle the KU weekend situation, and refused comment until that official stance was taken.

Bill Jacoby, executive director of the association, has said a formal proposal statement will probably be presented to the city this week.

Israeli soldiers, protesters clash again

By The Associated Press

BETHLEHEM, Occupied West Bank — Israeli troops shot and wounded a Palestinian youth Sunday as protesters pelted soldiers with rocks in a dozen towns and refugee camps, military and Palestinian sources said.

The clashes, the fourth day in a row of violent unrest, marred Christmas preparations at Manger Square in Bethlehem, where soldiers fired into the air to disperse a handful of Palestinian protesters.

Israeli soldiers have killed three Palestinian youths since Thursday.

Violence spread Sunday to four Israeli university campuses, where hundreds of Jewish and Arab students protested in solidarity with Palestinians of the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip. The largest protest was at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, where soldiers used tear gas to quell the demonstration.

Five Israeli buses were stoned in Jerusalem and the West Bank, with four Israeli passengers injured, the army said.

Palestinian teen-agers blocked main roads with burning tires, threw stones and waved PLO flags in demonstrations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, home for 1.4 million Palestinians and more than 50,000 Jewish settlers.

In the Gaza town of Khan Yunis, soldiers wounded a 19-year-old in the knee when they fired on dozens of Palestinian demonstrators, Palestinian news reports said. The army said it could not confirm the reports.

Palestinian journalists say the protests were triggered by fighting between Shiite Moslem and Palestinian guerrillas in Lebanon. Palestinians have blamed Israel for aiding the Shiites in south Lebanon.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's government faced a growing outcry from opposition legislators about the army's handling of the protests. The Cabinet on Sunday endorsed the soldiers' actions and vowed that the troops would keep using force to maintain order in the territories captured by Israel in 1967.

The violence began Thursday with a protest at Bir Zeit University against army roadblocks on the access road to the campus. Two students were killed and more than 20 were wounded.

Improvements made to Wefald's home

By The Collegian Staff

Contrary to popular rumor, University President Jon Wefald is not installing a sauna in the president's house.

Renovations on the house have stimulated gossip of installation of a sauna and other luxuries, but only necessary improvements were implemented, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

Restoration amounting to $91,407 was needed to improve a house that was left virtually untouched in the 11 years former President Duane Acker and his family lived there, Miller said.

"There was very little done in the form of maintenance in the past 11 years," he said.

The improvements are scheduled to be completed soon and include the addition of new storm screens on windows not already screened, carpet, wallpaper, and drapes; a bathroom renovation; exterior concrete repair; and interior and exterior painting.

Fred Ferguson, director of physical facilites, said the carpet was in bad condition and the "drapes were hanging in shreds."

Facilities Planning Director Willian Garvin said the children's bathroom was remodeled because it had a bathtub that could not be fitted with a shower.

Bedrooms on the third floor were also renovated to accomodate official guests of the University, Miller said. The Acker's visitors did not use the third floor but stayed in second floor rooms which are now occupied by Wefald's children.

State energy conservation project funds paid for the storm windows, which amounted to $7,100, and $22,000 for painting and outdoor work was taken from standard University maintenance reserves, Miller said.

University funds solely allocated for the house total $62,307, he said.

Explosion frightens guests, wrecks Fort Worth shops

By The Associated Press

FORT WORTH — An explosion in the heart of the downtown area early Sunday destroyed a row of specialty shops, blew out scores of windows in a four-block area and frightened guests at a hotel, authorities said.

A guest at the 509-room Worthington Hotel was cut by glass, but no serious injuries were reported in the blast, which occurred about 3 a.m. and caused an estimated $2 million damage, said Fire Department spokesman Butch Hall.

A natural gas leak inside a cafe probably caused the explosion, Hall said.

Two cafes, a print shop, an optometrist's office and a bookstore were destroyed, and at least 20 other businesses were damaged in the blast across the street from the Tandy Center shopping mall, the spokesman said.

"Had it happened three hours earlier, I'd hate to think about it," Hall said. "This is a heavily traveled area."

The blast blew out windows in 162 rooms in the Worthington Hotel and shattered a 30-foot glass wall in a ballroom lobby but caused no structural damage, said hotel marketing director Tom Weiskopf.

Thanksgiving provides professor with turkeys

By The Collegian Staff

The Thanksgiving holiday provided one professor with a good opportunity to collect his research material — turkey carcasses.

Mike Finnegan, professor of anthropology, collected 18 carcasses after Thanksgiving which he will use in developing a technique to distinguish between the bones of wild and domestic turkeys.

Finnegan began the study when a representative of the Kansas Fish and Game Commission asked him to act as a witness in court cases involving the shooting of turkeys out of season.

"That's when I decided I needed to know more about turkeys," he said.

"It's one thing to be able to tell the difference between the carcass of a wild turkey and a domestic turkey, but it's another to be able to show a jury the difference between the two."

Finnegan receives many of his wild turkeys for the sample from the fish and game commissions in Kansas and surrounding states.

He said he believes the study will also be worthwhile in showing the effects of domestication on the turkey.

"I think it would be a side benefit if people were to be digging somewhere and come upon some 100-year-old turkey bones, if they could tell whether the turkeys were being raised or if they were wild," Finnegan said.

The results of the study will be presented at the American Academy of Forensic Sciences sometime next year, he said.

Sorority gives scholarships to K-State women

By JADA ALLERHEILIGEN
Collegian Reporter

As funds have depleted throughout the semester, the sound of a scholarship rings in the ears.

The Delta Delta Delta sorority at K-State awards scholarships each year to full-time undergraduate women as part of the house's national philanthropy.

"We look for the well-rounded individual that has excelled in both activities and academics," said Susan Sommers, junior in apparel design and Tri-Delt philanthropy chairman.

The basic requirements for the scholarship are academic record, extracurricular activities, community service, promise of service to their chosen field and financial need.

"The applicant must be a female, an undergraduate and a full-time student, but she does not have to be greek," Sommers said.

The number and amount of the scholarships vary each year depending on the amount of money the Tri-Delts raise from their fund-raisers.

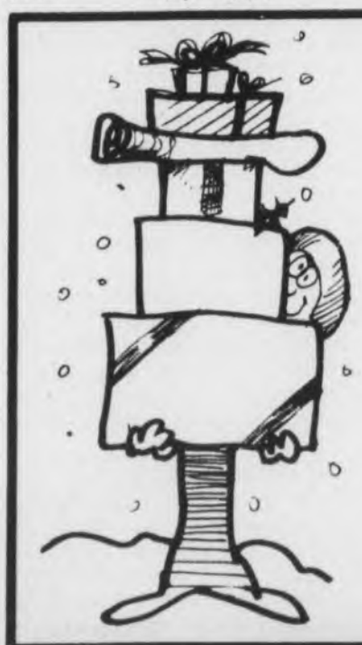
"This year we hope to award four scholarships of around $500 a piece," she said.

The Men of K-State calendar and a basketball tournament planned for the spring will be the main money-raisers for the scholarship.

After all the applications are received, the Tri-Delts have an 11-member committee, comprised of both women in the house and alumnae advisers, who will review the applications and select the winners.

Once the local chapter has made its decision on the winners, the applications are sent to the Tri-Delt nationals for approval. The approved winners are announced sometime in mid-March and are awarded the scholarships in the fall.

The local scholarship recipients automatically qualify for a $1000 Zoe Gore Perrin National Scholarship Award, which awards six national scholarships each year.



"The national scholarship is based on the same requirements and qualifications," Sommers said. "They just take the best six from around the United States."

Last year, 112 Tri-Delt scholarships were awarded across the United States totalling $56,043, and in its 43 years the philanthropy has presented the prizes, it has awarded more than $1.4 million.

"This is an excellent opportunity to receive some extra money, and I really encourage all qualified individuals to apply," Sommers said.

Applications are available in the financial aid office in Fairchild Hall or at the Tri-Delt house.

Officials responsible for truth in Iran case

Two recently departed White House aides have cited Constitutional protection, refusing to respond to any questions during a closed Senate Intelligence Committee hearing on the Iranian arms deal.

Both former National Security Adviser John Poindexter and Lt. Col. Oliver North, Poindexter's former deputy, used the Fifth Amendment to avoid answering the committee's questions on the basis that their answers may incriminate them.

The committee indicated that it will piece together the answers with or without Poindexter or North. Committee Chairman Dave Durenberger, R-Minn., said the committee will go higher in the administration to find the answers.

The arms deal involved the shipment of $50 million to $100 million worth of weapons to Iran. Reagan's ad hoc intelligence operation was apparently designed to circumvent both congressional scrutiny and the objections of top administration officials.

It has also been discovered that North allegedly used profits from Iranian arms sales to build a small, American-manned air force that delivered weapons to Nicaraguan Contra rebels this year.

North, who may have diverted as much as $30 million through Swiss bank accounts, had managed a broader Contra aid network for two years with President Reagan's approval despite a congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the rebels.

With the atmosphere in Washington being compared with the one surrounding the Watergate fiasco, some honest answers should be given to clear the air.

Poindexter and North's Constitutional Fifth Amendment right cannot be taken away. However, because of the magnitude of this issue, they should feel it their duty to give all details involved in the arms deal.

Many experts on Watergate have said the best thing for the Reagan administration to do is be totally honest with the public. After all, they are representing the people and are answerable to them.

Whether Poindexter and North are citing the Fifth Amendment to protect themselves or their boss, Reagan, their actions are unethical. As previous officials of the U.S. government, their utmost loyalty should be to the American people.

Private citizen grants ransom for hostages

As one of many revelations concerning the U.S. arms shipments to Iranian "moderates" and the subsequent secret attempt to illegally funnel profits to the Contras, Lt. Col. Oliver North, the man whom President Reagan called a "national hero," tried to convince Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot to put up millions of dollars in ransom to free American hostages in Lebanon.

These attempts came as Reagan was telling the world, "America will never make concessions to terrorists — to do so would only invite more terrorism. Once we head down that path there would be no end to it, no end to the bloody ransom all civilized nations must pay."

Such claims continued to spew out of the White House, even as North and former National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane were making their now celebrated trip to Iran armed with Irish passports, a cake and a Ronald Reagan autographed Bible.

In effect, Reagan was telling the truth; the United States did not pay ransom to terrorists, but only because North's attempts to do so failed. If the United States did not send ransom to terrorists, it certainly wasn't because it did not try.

North's former coherts at the National Security Council have insisted that these attempts were unauthorized, that the U.S. government knew nothing of North's dealings with Perot. White House spokesman Dan Howard added, "If it happened, according to the National Security Council, no one knew of it, and it certainly was not authorized."

Yet Perot, who has given large sums of money to the U.S. government for undisclosed purposes on other occasions, said, "I wouldn't have done it unless it was the request of the United States government."

Perot, from dealings with General Motors and on other occasions, has been noted for his candor. North and the Reagan administration have not.

Anonymous White House sources have tried to justify the ransom by claiming it came from a private citizen and not the U.S. government. The point is not that Perot was willing to send money to Iran, but that government officials were willing to collaborate with someone else to pay ransom while publicly claiming otherwise.

Refendum best answer for students

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

Much debate has surfaced concerning the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum that would change the way Student Senators are elected. Student Senate voted to allow the students to approve or disapprove the proposal by popular referendum. Student Body President Steve Johnson vetoed the referendum and (perhaps this was Johnson's intent) his veto has brought needed publicity and debate to this issue.

Those who support the referendum seem to be on pretty solid ground: grant the students their democratic right to determine if they want this proposal passed. Against this lofty argument, Johnson argues that the proposal was rushed through Senate, that the debate centered on bringing the proposal to referendum and not on the proposal itself.

Johnson said he is afraid the proposal might be weak and if defeated, would not have a chance to be reconsidered. In his words, "I decided not to pass it on to the referendum because I was afraid that if it would be voted down there, then we would just forget the whole thing." He wants to establish a task force to produce — in the words of him and his cabinet — "the best proposal."

Unfortunately, while Johnson's concerns sound reasonable, he has not provided the students with substantial arguments to back them up. Because he views the proposal to have been rushed through Senate, he fears it could be flawed, yet he has offered no arguments as to how it is flawed.

Taking away the student's right to vote is a serious decision and I'm sure one to which Steve Johnson gave considerable thought. He owes the students a better explanation than he has given, one which tells us why he thinks it isn't the best proposal. What problems does the proposal contain? Write us a guest column Steve; I can assure you it will be printed.

Arguing against the referendum soley on the grounds it might not be "the best proposal" doesn't seem very smart to me. No task force is going to be able to say, "This is the best proposal." If the U.S. Congress had waited on the "best proposal" to pass the recent tax reform law, we'd still be waiting.

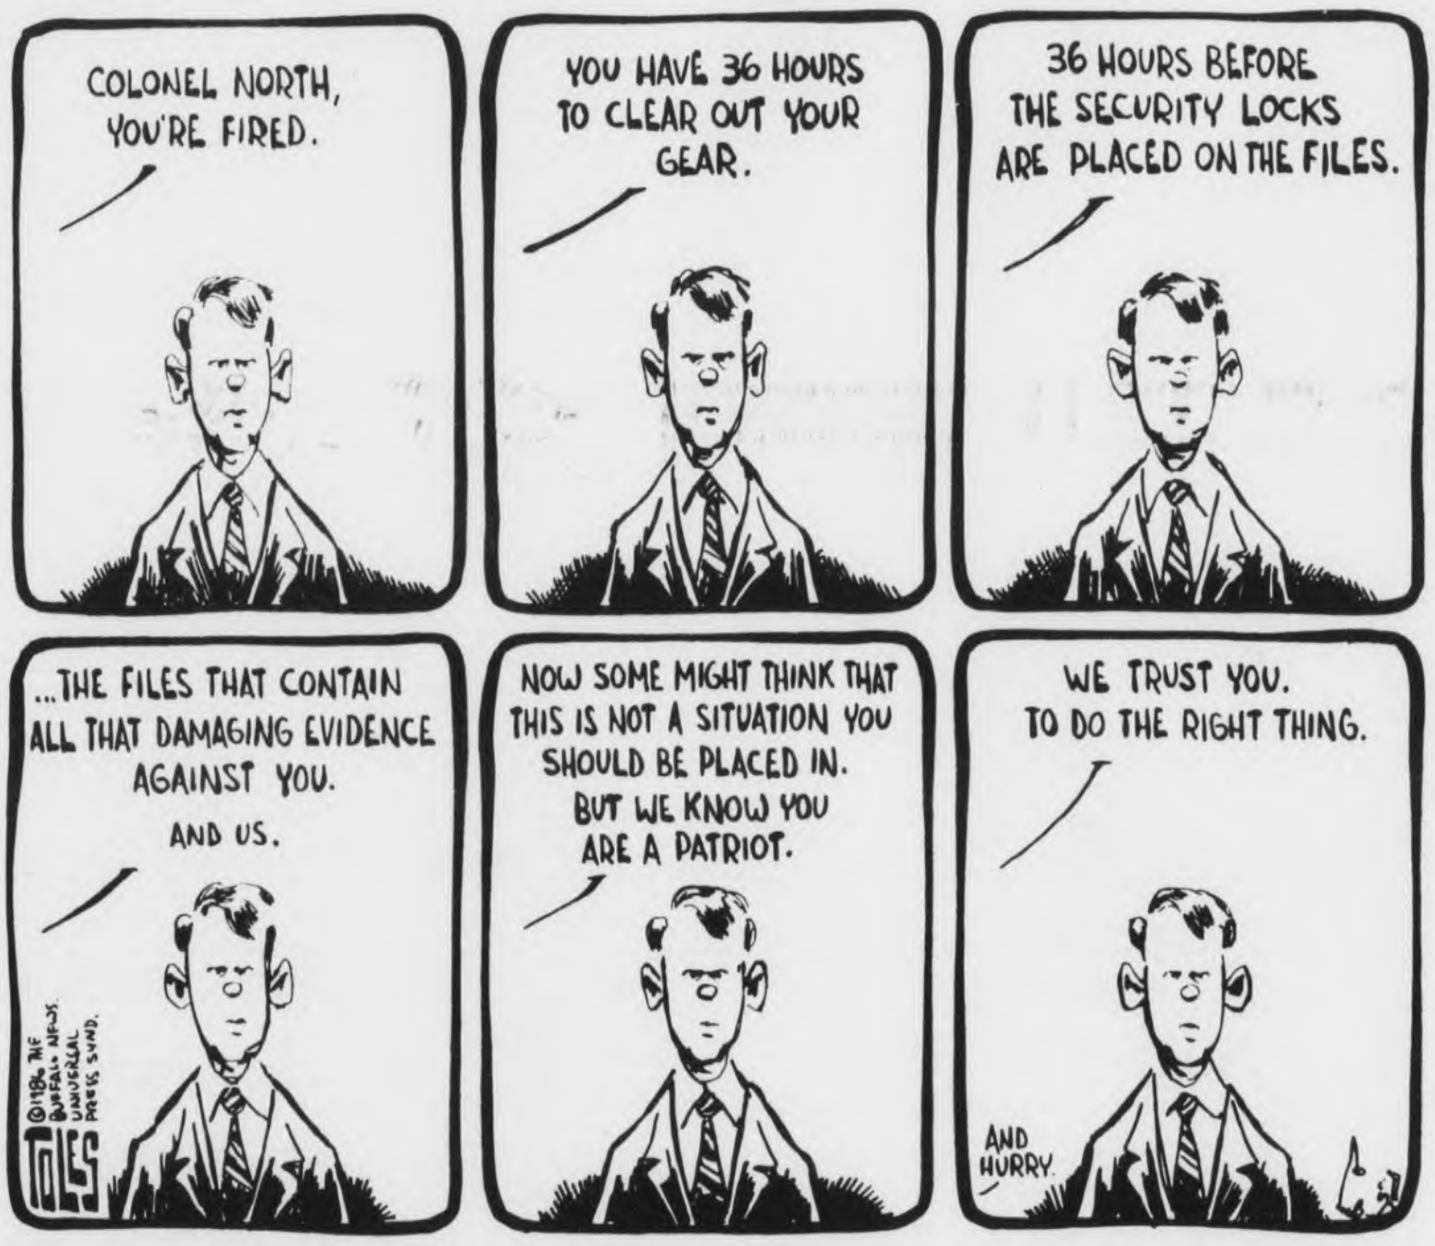
New proposals often have to be implemented before we fully understand their problems. After we have seen them at work, necessary and probably more effective changes can be added.

In addition, Johnson's statement, "I was afraid if it (the proposal) would be voted down, then we would just forget the whole thing" seems awfully defeatist. The proposal needs at least a two-thirds majority from the students to pass as a referendum. If it fails, but a majority of the students vote for it, then Johnson should establish a task force to determine what minor alterations the proposal might need.

Personally, I don't think a task force will have much of an effect upon the election. Students will accept or reject this proposal based upon its theoretical foundations — whether living groups should be guaranteed representation in Senate. They will not change their votes based upon whatever minor structural changes, important as they might be, which a task force could approve.

Should living groups be guaranteed Senate representation? To answer this question, we need to consider what Student Senate should represent and if it currently does so.

Ideal representation probably cannot be achieved, but one which is more representative of student opinion can be. I don't think the average Student Senator picks up his view of student opinion from the college in which he's enrolled. He gets it primarily from the people he lives with and/or talks to on campus.



To be sure, a Senator gets feedback from his college and that is important. The new proposal would preserve representation by college, but it would also include representation by living group.

Against this a good argument can be made that living groups are already represented and that no proposal needs to guarantee what already exists. Indeed, I have no sympathy for the people in the dorms who complain that Senate is greek-dominated. Anybody who wants to get elected to Senate can do so.

While all living groups could be equitably represented in Senate, there is no guarantee they will be and in fact, they almost never have been in the past. If the residence hall folk turned out in force and elected an all-dorm Senate, one could argue that they won the elections fairly. That still would not provide K-State with a Student Senate that equitably represented student concerns.

Living groups are a cornerstone of this University and their presence should be reflected in the electoral system. Guaranteeing each living group a minimal amount of seats will ensure that each of these groups has some voice in student affairs.

The current proposal to alter representation will do this. If you believe, as I do, that this would be a positive step for K-State, signatures are now being gathered to override Johnson's veto and allow the students to vote on this issue.

Surviving 'The 12 Days of Finals'

Collegian Columnist

'Tis the season to be jolly — not until after finals are over, however. In the meantime, the next two weeks will be "survival of the fittest," a real marathon of studying and little sleep.

Along the lines of "The 12 Days of Christmas," I offer "The 12 Days of Finals." It can't be put to music as easily, but by next week, don't be surprised if you find yourself singing it at all hours of the day, quite loudly and incoherently.

"On the first day of finals (today), my true love said to me, 'Hey, don't get me wrong, I really like you a lot, but it's that time of the year again and you're beginning your biannual change. Within a few days you'll be foaming at the mouth and very wild-eyed. I think I'll just keep my distance 'til finals are complete. Call me when it's all over (literally or otherwise), and not a minute before. Oh, and by the way, good luck!"

So much for hearing from my "true love" for the next 12 days. Now, instead of "you and me" against the world, it's "me and me."

The rest of the day is spent doing nothing but reassuring myself that I'll start studying tomorrow. After all, it's too early to start now; I'd forget it all by the time the test rolls around.

On the second day of finals (Tuesday), my true love pities me. All that studying I put off yesterday is catching up with me. After skipping class and sleeping 'til noon to be rested for the long night of studying ahead, I watch soap operas. Finding out whether Bob is really the father of Betty and Billy, the illegitimate Siamese twins joined at the nose, is simply higher on my priority list than chicken nutrition.

I finally begin to study at 9:30 p.m. Ten minutes later, I'm asleep. I always have loved to study in bed.

On the third day of finals (Wednesday), my true love is beginning to forget about me. Oh well, at this rate I will have flunked out of school by next Thursday, and then we can spend all our time together. But now it's time to attend class and do what I've been waiting for all semester. It's teacher evaluation time!

After filling in all the little boxes next to the "almost, never ever" statements, as in "teaches with a warm heart and an open mind, gives pud tests and doesn't believe in giving anything less than a 'B,'" I hurriedly flip the computer card over and write, in 500 words or less, how the class could be improved. Usually, "shouldn't be a requirement for graduation" suffices.

A long, grueling day of "pencil pushing," leaves me too tired to think of about studying. I opt for a night of "socializing" instead.

On the fourth day of finals (Thursday), my true love has me on his mind. "Thank God it's her and not me," he thinks. Meanwhile, I'm up at 8 a.m. ready to hit the books really hard. But my roommate wants to go Christmas shopping, and I can't resist.

A long day of shopping leaves me too tired to study. Oh well, I've always got tomorrow.

On the fifth day of finals (Friday), my true love doesn't remember me. I do finally begin studying, however, approximately one hour on each subject (six in all). When I finish at 5 p.m., I know absolutely nothing more than before I began, but I'm a lot more confused.

On the sixth day of finals, my true love doesn't care, and I'm beginning to do the same. I'll never be able to learn, or better yet, remember all this stuff. I think I'll go to Aggieville instead.

On the seventh day of finals, who cares about my true love. I spend the day "resting." After all, that's what he did.

On the eighth, ninth and 10th days of finals, my true love begins to worry about me. I'm convinced my brain is rotting from the inside out, if it doesn't explode first. What a mess that would be! I doubt anybody else would notice, though; it's bound to happen to them, too.

On the 11th day of finals, my true love laughs at the thought of me. I'm really quite a sight — a combination of "Bill, the cat" of Bloom County and road kill. After my final, I collapse in front of the television and watch Christmas specials, more Christmas specials, and finally, when nothing's left, The Weather Channel. I'm too tired and burnt out to think, and it's a real effort to breathe. I'm convinced I'm going to die. Maybe I'm already dead. I never thought hell was going to be this bad.

On the 12th day of finals (Dec. 19), my true love remembers what I once was, before I lost my mind. I've "gone crazy, will hopefully be back later." My last final is over, yet I'm too tired to rejoice. It's time to go into hibernation 'til next semester. Then, in May, I'll get to do it all over again. I can't wait.

Trip helps professor verify research study

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

A November trip to the "land down under" initiated one K-State professor's research comparing attitudes and situations facing career women in other nations.

Betsy Bergen, associate professor of human development and family studies, spent two weeks in Australia establishing contacts with professional women to aid in the distribution of her research questionnaire.

The study will examine four groups of professional women: attorneys, journalists, educators and professional businesswomen. Bergen's research is focusing on their career habits, role model selection, educational requirements and problem-solving methods for family life situations.

"Random samples will be gathered from Australia, France and China, as well as the United States," she said.

Bergen is working to pilot test her 50-question research questionnaire in Australia and throughout the United States. She will be assisted by a professor from The Wichita State University with the studies in China and France.

"Few studies have been done in such magnitude," she said, "and no studies were found that compared these particular groups of professional women."

Bergen already knows what some of the comparisons in her study will be.

Education, for example, has different requirements in each country. School teachers in Australia can be certified after three years of college. Education is highly unionized, and teachers are contracted by the state.

"The state places you where you are needed most," Bergen said. "You have no guarantee about where you will teach."

Bergen will also investigate a random sample of women journalists. She said journalism is also a highly unionized trade, and she hopes to discover why Australia has few women journalists.

Bergen said she wants to investigate further their career habits and the strength of the national regulations for print media.

During her visit, she also learned that all people 18 and older were required to vote or face a $100 fine.

"Needless to say, they have good turnouts."

The lives of business-women are also an area of interest in Bergen's research. Most places of business in Australia close at noon on Saturday and remain closed for the weekend.

Computer consumers exercise caution

By The Associated Press

"It's beginning to look a lot like Christmas,

"Everywhere you go,

"Take a look at the Five and Ten,

"Glistening once again,

"With junk computers lined up in a row."

Apologies to those who wrote different lyrics to a nice tune, but it doesn't hurt to recall that not everything that goes beep is necessarily worth putting into some unsuspecting Christmas stocking.

Reader Nettie A. Freeman of Flint, Texas, raises the point by wondering if an advertisement for a "computer" word processor with a built-in printer is worth the money. The answer is "No," unless the intended use is nothing but a smart typewriter — and you can still get some very smart typewriters for about half the $500 or so cost of these single-minded word processors.

True computers are general-purpose machines, meaning that depending upon what program you give them, they can be word-processors, checkbook balancers, pilot trainers — name it. The "dedicated" word processors that some are trying to sell lack the ability to be general-purpose tools. Stay away if computing's your bag.

The holiday ads are also going to be suggesting that the machine they are peddling is best because it is: (a) cheapest; (b) used in schools; (c) has the largest body of software, or (d) has the best future. Reader M.A. McGowan of Playa Del Rey, Calif., touches on that when asking what machine to get for a grandson, 10.

McGowan, who has done a good job of identifying the issues, knows the computer would be used "first for games and entertainment — second provide a familiarity with computers as a basis for his future use in school."

McGowan says the boy uses an Apple II in school, has friends who own Commodore computers and most of McGowan's associates recommend an IBM or clone. The Commodore 64 would win the sweepstakes in categories "a" and "c" above, while Apple would take "b" and IBM-and-alikes would own "d."

"My basic question is of course which one?" says McGowan. No machine now made is going to win the across-the-board best, never mind what the hired publicists say. And in a sense, it doesn't matter. For someone just cracking double digits in age, any computer is going to be a help and a stepping stone.

The CompuBug's choice in that spread would be whichever machine could be had from a major manufacturer for the least money — with odds that way stacked mostly in favor of Commodore, with Apple and IBM-and-alikes costing more in most configurations. Later, if the boy developed an interest, he could always switch.

As far as confusing a youngster with the differences between the brands, most machines have a great deal in common when dealing with humans.

Reader Armand W. Frament of Crow Agency, Mont., writes that he has access to a computer and a computer scientist with FORTRAN experience, and is there a good correspondence course? Maybe, but with someone to help you nearby, the best way to learn to program would be to program. Read the documentation that came with your version of FORTRAN, set yourself a task that you know how to do without a computer, then see if you can write the code that would get the machine to do it.

Cancer death rate decreases as cases multiply

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The death rate from cancer is decreasing for Americans under age 55 despite a slow increase in the incidence of the disease in this age group, reports the National Cancer Institute.

The agency, in its annual statistics review to be issued Monday, attributes much of the 7 percent decline in the death rate for the group from 1975 to 1984 to advances in cancer treatment.

Dr. Vincent T. DeVita, director of the institute, said the death rate drop from 38.2 per 100,000 population to 35.7 per 100,000 is evident for every age group under 55. About 24 percent of all newly diagnosed cancers occur in these age groups.

DeVita, who was to present the report at a meeting of the National Cancer Advisory Board in New York City, said in a statement that another measure of treatment success is survival rates, which also are going up.

"People under 55 have a higher overall five-year relative survival rate for cancer than older patients, indicating that we're being particularly successful in treating these patients," he said.

The relative five-year survival rate — the percentage of patients surviving five years after their cancer is diagnosed — for those under age 55 is 59 percent. This includes patients of all races and both sexes diagnosed with all types of cancer between 1974 and 1983.

The institute said the latest data on cancer incidence and deaths are now available through 1984, and survival statistics are available through 1983.

The cancer incidence rate for the entire population, which has been increasing about 0.7 percent annually, was 351.8 per 100,000 in 1984. The death rate, also on the rise an average of 0.5 percent yearly, was 170.7 per 100,000 in the same year.

The report said the five-year survival rate for the entire population, regardless of age and other factors, was almost 49 percent.

For whites diagnosed between 1977 and 1983, the survival rate was 49.8 percent. For blacks, the figure was only 37.6 percent, which some experts attribute to later diagnosis of the disease, lack of access to health care and not as good a response

Bankruptcy law aids farmers

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

Bankruptcy, as defined by Webster's Dictionary, is a state in which a person is left without any value or worth. But to the Kansas farmer, it may be defined as something in the near future, with the word becoming one used every day by farmers throughout the country.

In view of the current economic crisis, legislators have enacted a new form of bankruptcy.

The new form, or "chapter," which went into effect Thanksgiving Day, is titled Chapter 12.

"It's been put in effect to give the farmer some time to reorganize his operation," said Mark Bacon, bank farm specialist at the Farmers State Bank in Lindsborg.

Bacon said he believes the new Chapter 12 provision will be beneficial to both the farmer and their bank.

He described Chapter 12 as a chance for farmers to achieve economic recovery.

Under the new provision, the farmer is first notified that his creditor(s) have moved to declare bankruptcy on his operation. After notification, the debtor has 90 days to do what he can to avoid the bank's actions.

"I think it's a good idea," said Chad Walter, senior in business education. Walter also works on his family's farm, located near Lincoln.

Walter's family has felt the pinch of the farm economy and has seen neighbors and friends who have not been able to keep their family farm operating.

"In my opinion, it's about time there has come a different stipulation to just a general bankruptcy," Walter said.

Until the enactment of Chapter 12, farm bankruptcy procedures were basically identical to those of any other business operation.

TRAIN WITH THE NUCLEAR INDUSTRY'S LEADER, AND YOU COULD END UP LEADING THE INDUSTRY.

Over half the nuclear reactors in America are operated by one organization. The United States Navy.

The technology is the most advanced in the world. The men in charge are the industry's best. That's why the Navy Nuclear Propulsion Officer Candidate Program is among the most sophisticated training available.

It has to be!

College juniors and seniors who qualify for the program can earn $1,000 a month while still in school. In addition, you get a $4,000 bonus upon entrance into the program and an additional $2,000 when you complete your Naval studies.

And, as an officer in today's Nuclear Navy, you receive a year of paid graduate-level training, gaining the experience and credentials that can put you at the forefront of the nuclear industry.

You must be a U.S. citizen, 25 years of age or younger upon commissioning, working toward a bachelor's or master's degree. You must also have completed a minimum of one year each of calculus and calculus-based physics with a "B" average or better.

If you're thinking about a career in the nuclear field, start at the top. And lead the adventure as a Navy officer. You can apply after your sophomore year. Call Navy Management Programs for more information. 1-800-821-5110 OR SEND TRANSCRIPTS TO:

After 143 years, sending Christmas cards still a tradition

From Staff and Wire Reports

"A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to You."

The most used thought on holiday greeting cards today, that Christmas card sentiment goes back to 1843 England. That same year "A Christmas Carol" was written by Charles Dickens.

It was British businessman Henry Cole who apparently originated the Christmas card custom, three years after English postal reform made it possible to send mail near and far for a penny.

Cole asked an artist friend, John Calcott Horsley, to design the card. Horsley, an artist in the Royal Academy, divided the card into three panels. The main illustration showed the elders at a family party raising wine glasses in a toast.

The panels on either side showed two of the oldest traditions of Christmas of English people feeding the hungry and clothing the needy. The charming card bore the greeting, "A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to You.

Original copies of the first Christmas card are extremely rare and valuable. Of the 1,000 original Christmas cards printed, only about a dozen are known to exist.

Two of the original dozen known copies of this first Christmas card are part of the 40,000-card Hallmark Historical Collection, said its curator, Sharron Uhler.

"The Christmas card-sending custom has weathered war, economic turmoil and vast social changes spanning well over a century," she said. "It serves a timeless human need to stay close, to share special thoughts and feelings with friends far and near during our most cherished holiday season."

Designs and themes have changed along the years, though the sentiments remain much the same.

In the 1860s, several greeting card companies were established in England. One of the front-runners was Marcus Ward and Company of London, which published cards designed by one of England's most famous female artists, Kate Greenway. Greenway's cards featured children dressed delightfully in high fashions.

The custom of sending Christmas cards spread slowly to the United States. For more than 30 years, the only cards available were imported.

In 1875, lithographer Louis Prang began publishing Christmas cards in America.

Prang is referred to as the father of the American Christmas card. Prang perfected the lithographic process of multicolor printing in the 1870s. His reproductions of oil paintings often used as many as 20 colors and were so perfect that at times only experts could recognize printing from painting.

By 1881, Prang was printing five million cards a year — most of them Christmas cards. To acquire excellent designs for his cards, he sponsored contests for artists, with prizes as high as $4,000. Many of the outstanding designs were of the Nativity and other religious scenes, marking the beginning of a popular theme that has increased yearly and is still present today.

Prang continued manufacturing cards until 1890, when he quit in disgust because the American market had become flooded by cheap penny postcards imported from Germany.

Penny postcards remained popular for about 20 years, until World War I blockades clogged shipping lanes. By the time the war ended, the modern greeting card industry was born in America.

Major greeting card publishers emerged in America around 1910. By 1920, these publishers were meeting the demands of a public once again concerned with good design and quality. Even during the Depression, greeting cards remained popular.

The industry survived the Depression to run head-on into World War II. War shortages curtailed the paper supply. Glitter was suddenly more scarce than gold, and special cards for servicemen were in demand. "Across the Miles" and "Missing You" sentiments reflected the somber reality of the day.

Since World War II, the industry has grown phenomenally. In 1945, Americans exchanged 2 billion Christmas cards. In 1977, more than 3 billion Christmas greetings were exchanged.

Choir brightens season with musical greetings

By The Collegian Staff

If you're tired of sending traditional Christmas cards to friends and relatives each season, send them cards that sing.

Members of the Kansas State Choir are providing a "Singing Christmas Card" service, and will provide a quartet, octet, or larger ensemble to sing selected Christmas carols for parties, meetings or other gatherings, said Rodney Walker, professor of music and choir conductor.

Choir members will perform seven Christmas carols at any location in the Manhattan area upon request, Walker said.

"We have even sung carols over the telephone — long distance — in the past," he said.

To begin their Christmas season festivities, members of the choir sang Friday in President Jon Wefald's home.

Members of the choir will each carol several more times before the holiday recess, Walker said.

Although the Christmas season is a busy time for students, Walker said he believes this service is worthwhile.

"This gives us a chance to thank the many people who support us throughout the year," he said. "The caroling also gives the community an opportunity to meet the student body, and allows students to get involved in the Manhattan community," he said.

This is the fifth year the choir has provided the service.

Walker said he thinks choir members have as much fun performing as others do listening.

"Caroling departs from the commercialized aspects of the Christmas season," he said, "and tends to bring us back into the Christmas spirit we experience during our childhood."

In addition to singing Christmas cards, choir members will also sing in Aggieville every Saturday before Christmas.

The K-State choir may also be heard on CBS Radio, on the "Cavalcade of Christmas Music" program, at a time yet to be announced, Walker said.

Cable TV to raise rates 55 cents per month

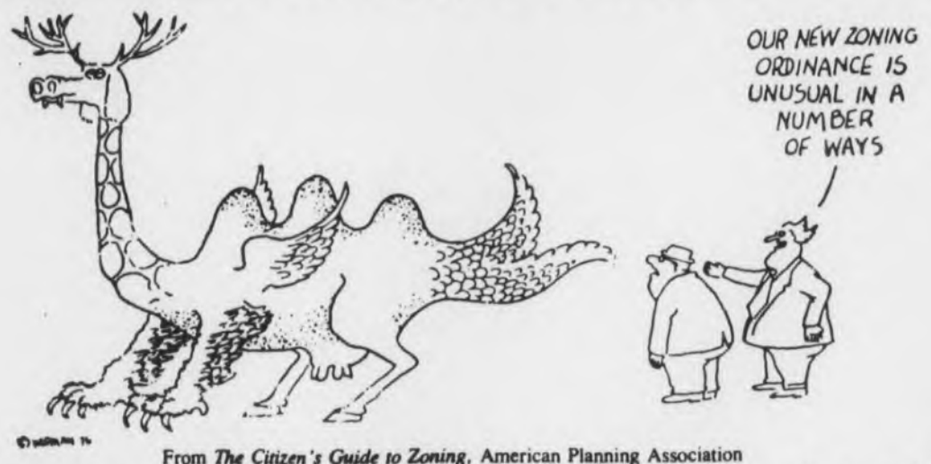
By The Collegian Staff

Due to unforeseen increased costs during the past year, the price for cable service in Manhattan has gone up.

"The price increase will be 55 cents a month, and the only cable rate being increased is for the basic cable service," said Dan Hebert, general manager of Manhattan Cable TV Service. "There will be no other extra charges for the movie package and other extra cable services."

Because the Manhattan Cable TV Service is not rate-regulated by the FCC Act of 1984, it did not need permission from the city commission to raise its cable rate, Hebert said. The rate increase was based on escalations, primarily in the marketplace.

"As of January 1, 1987, the whole cable industry will be deregulated," Hebert said. "Almost all (cable companies) will have a rate increase, with some as much as 20 percent."



Manhattan's rate hike was 5 percent, amounting to a cost of $11.55 for the basic cable service. Manhattan Cable TV Service sent inserts in the December cable bill informing subscribers of the rate increase.

Salary talks with Knight break early

By The Associated Press

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. — Ray Knight, the Most Valuable Player in the New York Mets' victory in the World Series, apparently will not be back with the team next season.

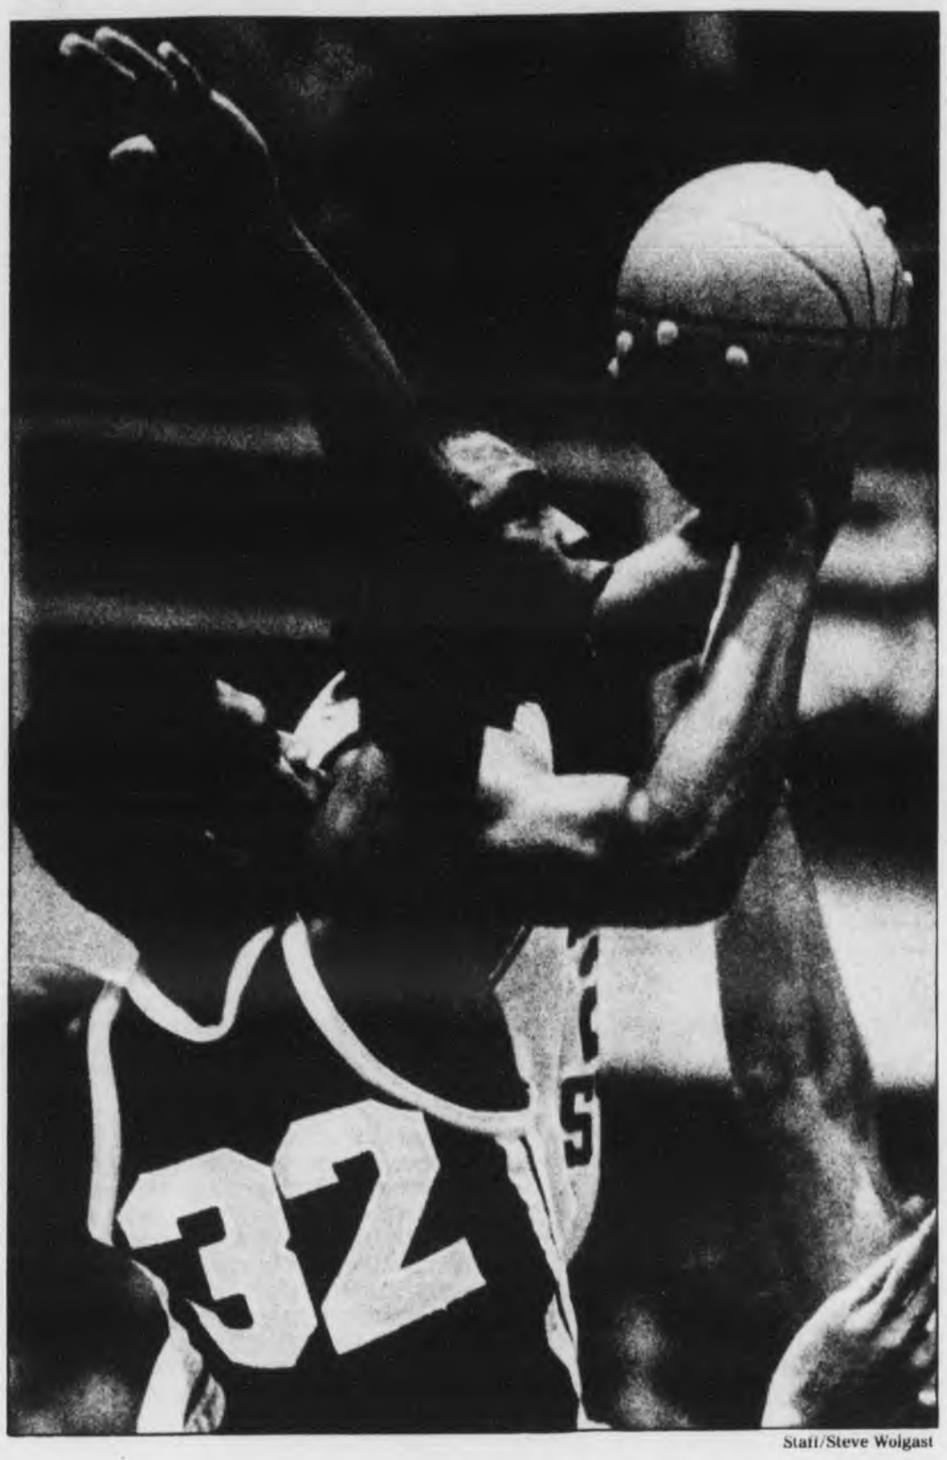
The Mets, hours before a midnight deadline, said Sunday night that contract talks with Knight had stopped and that they would not offer him salary arbitration — meaning the team would lose its right to re-sign the free agent third baseman before May.

"We've determined that we will be unable to sign Ray Knight before midnight," Mets General Manager Frank Cashen said. "Talks have broken off."

The Oakland A's said goobye to slugger Dave Kingman, announcing that he wouldn't be offered arbitration.

Tom Seaver, Boston's 300-game winner, and Kansas City outfielder Lonnie Smith were among the other free agents who had not signed new contracts or been offered salary arbitration Sunday night. The Texas Rangers said earlier in the day they would not offer arbitration to Gary Ward.

While there was speculation Seaver and the Red Sox would work out a last-minute deal, Knight's career with the Mets seemed almost certain to end.



Knight's agent, George Kalafis, said he did not see the situation changing in the final hours.

"That's my understanding, that their position is final," Kalafis said. "I believe they're sincere. I don't see it changing unless Ray has a change of heart, which I don't forsee."

Earlier Sunday, the New York Yankees averted that possibility by offering salary arbitration to co-captains Ron Guidry and Willie Randolph, along with three others. The California Angels took the same step with free agents Doug DeCinces, Bob Boone and Brian Downing.

Free agents have until Dec. 19 to accept or reject arbitration. If they refuse, their teams must sign them by Jan. 8 or lose that right until May 1.

Bobcats scare K-State before losing

'Cats' guard Mitch Richmond drives past Southwest Texas State center Patrick Williams (32) during Saturday's game. Richmond scored 27 points leading the K-State attack.

Upstart Southwest Texas State threw a scare at the Wildcats Saturday night before the K-State men captured a 98-83 victory at Ahearn Field House.

The win left K-State as the only undefeated team in the Big Eight Conference so far this season.

K-State actually trailed with less than six minutes to go, 79-77, after a three-point goal from the Bobcats' Eliezar Gordon.

But William Scott and Charles Bledsoe quickly dashed any hopes of a Bobcat upset as they combined for 12 points during a 15-0 Wildcat run and assured K-State of its fourth consecutive victory against no defeats.

"Certainly, we were concerned at that point when we were down," 'Cats' head coach Lon Kruger said. "We had to respond then or it would have been very difficult.

"It was right at that moment where we were going to find out some things. I thought (Mitch) Richmond, Will Scott, Bledsoe and (Steve) Henson did an excellent job of stepping up there when it was really crucial."

K-State opened the game with a 29-13 lead and appeared to be headed for another easy home victory against an outclassed opponent. But the Bobcats, 3-2, would not cooperate.

Southwest Texas State outscored the Wildcats 10-1 during one stretch to close the gap to 30-23. K-State scrapped back and was able to stretch its lead to 52-43 at the half.

Scott, who scored 25 on the night, hit three quick buckets to open the second half and extended K-State's lead to a seemingly comfortable 58-43 margin.

But the pesky Bobcats pulled close again because of costly K-State turnovers and defensive lapses.

"We got the lead and I think we got comfortable and stopped moving our feet on defense," Bledsoe said. "Then they showed us they could play some basketball. I've got a lot of respect for their team; they've got a lot of heart."

After the Bobcats closed to 61-58, it was Richmond's turn to provide the offensive spark. Richmond scored eight of the 'Cats next 10 points and extended K-State's lead to 71-58.

"Richmond will play in the NBA someday," said the Bobcats' first-year head coach Harry Larrabee. "We knew what he could do coming in, but we couldn't seem to stop him."

Southwest Texas State countered Richmond's heroics with the newly installed three-point line and began to dominate the action on the floor.

Guard Gerald Wright, who hit for a game-high 31 points, and Gordon, who added 15, combined to hit five three-pointers and gave the Bobcats their only lead of the game.

Scott then came down on the other end and launched a three-point attempt from the left wing. The ball bounced on the rim several times before it finally fell through to give the 'Cats a lead they never relinquished.

Richmond later said that falling behind Southwest Texas State seemed to awaken the lethargic Wildcat squad.

"We looked up at the scoreboard, and we knew we couldn't lose at home," he said, "so we had to fight harder and get back on top and pull it out."

Kruger, who used to face the Bobcats each year when he coached at Pan-American University, expressed a great deal of respect for their team after the game.

"They were very well prepared. Coach Larrabee has done a good job everywhere he's been, so their battle and fight didn't surprise us at all. They did a heck of a job," he said.

K-State will host Creighton Tuesday and Abilene Christian Thursday before playing Saturday at Henry Levitt Arena in Wichita against Wichita State University in the first of a two-game series between the two schools.

Streaky Bledsoe sparks Kruger's 'Cats to wins over Texas adversaries

By DAVE WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

When Charles Bledsoe arrived at K-State this year from Moberly (Mo.) Junior College, along with forward Mitch Richmond and assistant coach Dana Altman, Bledsoe was expected to make up part of a three-man nucleus to lead the team this season.

For the first two games, though, it didn't appear this would be the case.

But lately for Bledsoe, things appear to be coming of age.

After a shaky start, scoring a total of 14 points in the first two regular-season games, Bledsoe exploded in the third K-State contest.

He scored 18 points and pulled down nine rebounds and helped lead the 'Cats to a 73-72 victory over Texas Tech.

With this performance, Bledsoe was quite satisfied, but didn't take all the credit himself.

"We just went to the boards hard and my teammate Mitch Richmond gave me some nice passes to set up some plays," Bledsoe said.

Coach Lon Kruger doesn't hesitate to say that it is this kind of performance from Bledsoe that is going to make K-State a winning team this year.

"He's got to come and play with that kind of excitement and enthusiasm (as in the Texas Tech game)...for us to be as good as we can be," Kruger said.

It didn't appear, though, that the excitement Kruger likes to see in Bledsoe was there in the first half of Saturday night's game against the Southwest Texas State Bobcats.

Bledsoe got into foul trouble early, hit only one-of-three attempts from the field and spent much of the half on the bench.

This only lasted until the second half when, with 5:58 remaining in the game, the Wildcats found themselves trailing the Bobcats 79-77.

This was the only lead that the Bobcat's would have. After a three-point bucket from William Scott to regain the lead, Bledsoe seemed to wake-up, scored the next seven Wildcat points and engineered a 15-point run on the sputtering Bobcats.

'(Charles Bledose has) got to come and play with that kind of excitement and enthusiasm (as in the Texas Tech game)...for us to be as good as we can be.'

— Lon Kruger

K-State went on to dump visiting Southwest Texas State 98-83.

"Charles made three basketball plays as good as you're going to see," said Kruger after the game. These were "effort type" plays Kruger says he likes to see from Bledsoe.

Much of Bledsoe's scoring so far this season has come in streaks of seven and eight points at a time. He takes the attitude that if this is the role he plays in helping K-State win, then so be it.

"I really don't mind the role...as long as I can help the team to win, and I'll do what ever it takes to do it," he said.

Kansas City thrashes division-leading Broncos

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — By whipping the division-leading Denver Broncos 37-10 Sunday and intercepting four John Elway passes, the Kansas City Chiefs kept up a strange, four-year hex on the Broncos' strong-armed quarterback.

Since coming into the NFL as the No. 1 draft choice in 1983, Elway has quarterbacked four victories and three losses against Kansas City. But he's thrown only three touchdown passes while suffering 16 interceptions.

"For some reason, we play well against Denver," said safety Deron Cherry, who thwarted one thrust Sunday with an end zone interception.

"It's not a matter of how badly he's played, but how well we've played," said cornerback Albert Lewis. "He can kill you. But we just match up well against them in the secondary."

Todd Blackledge, in relief of injured Bill Kenney, threw two touchdown passes as the Chiefs snapped a three-game losing skid and improved their record to 8-6. Elway's backup, Gary Kubiak, threw an interception in the final minutes that Lloyd Burruss returned 72 yards for the final score as the Broncos dropped to 10-4 and left town still needing one victory for the AFC West title.

"I don't know what it is," Elway said when asked about his problems with Kansas City. He wound up hitting 23 of 42 passes for 246 yards, but suffered five sacks along with four interceptions.

"Hopefully, I'll be able to figure it out," Elway said. "We played well here last year, but one in four years is not good."

Tackle Pete Koch, who supplied much of the pass rush Sunday, said Elway's frustrations against Kansas City may lie in the nature of athletic competition.

"Statistics can be very misleading," Koch said. "Elway is one of the NFL's best. But I don't think there's an athlete in this league who doesn't have a team he tends to excel against and a team he tends to have a lot of trouble with."

Blackledge, benched for ineffectiveness seven weeks earlier, got the start because of an injury to Bill Kenney. He snapped a 9-yard scoring pass to Stephone Paige in the second quarter and hit Jeff Smith with a 17-yard touchdown pass in the third. Boyce Green, following Gary Spani's interception in the fourth period, scored on a 1-yard plunge that put the Chiefs ahead 24-10 with 12:56 remaining in the game.

Nick Lowery kicked a 30-yard field goal in the first period and tacked on a 45-yarder in the fourth after Scott

Tiger forwards pace Mizzou to 77-65 win

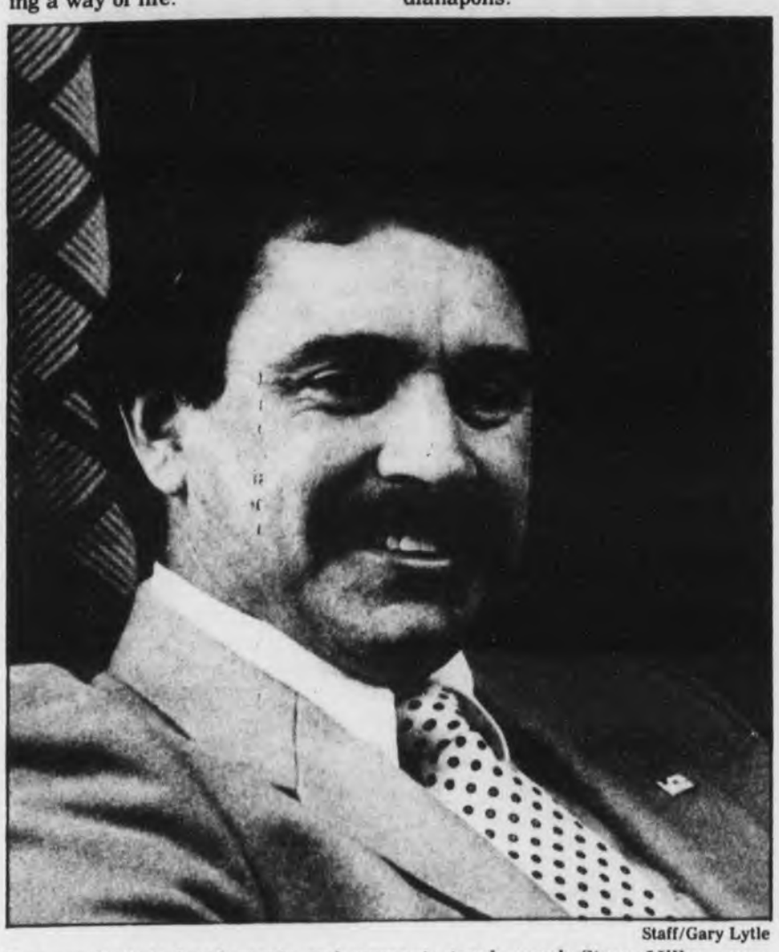
By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Derrick Chievous scored 18 points and Nathan Buntin added 10 to lead the Missouri Tigers to a 77-65 victory over Chaminade Sunday in a non-conference college basketball game.

Chievous paced Missouri with 11 first half points before being taken out midway through the second half after he got into foul trouble.

The Tigers got off to a slow start but outscored the Silverswords 16-4 to build a 21-8 lead with 9:42 left in the first half.

Marty Moore completed four three-point goals to bring the Silverswords within 12 at 67-55 with 2:19 left in the game. But Chaminade could get no closer as Missouri completed eight of nine free throws in the final two minutes to seal the victory.



Moore and Rod McCray finished the game with 20 points.

Former 'Cat coach to lead indoor team

By DAVID WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

For former K-State head men's and women's track coach Steve Miller, coaching laurels are becoming a way of life.

Miller, now an associate athletic director at K-State, was recently named head coach for the United States Men's indoor track team for the 1987 World Indoor Championships to be held March 6-8 in Indianapolis.

Staff/Gary Lytle

Former K-State head men's and women's track coach Steve Miller, now associate athletic director, was recently named head coach for the United States Men's indoor track team for the 1987 World Indoor Championships.

This is Miller's third straight year of being selected for an international track and field appointment. In 1984, he was the head coach for the U.S. track team in an international meet against Germany. Last year, Miller coached the Americans at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"I'm really excited to be chosen for this honor," he said. "This is the third year in a row that I've received an international appointment with the U.S. track team, and I couldn't be happier.

"Next to the Olympics and the World Outdoor Championships, the World Indoor Championships are the most prestigious and important track event around," he said.

Adding to the honor of being appointed to the position is the fact that this is the first time the World Indoor Championships have ever been held in the United States.

Miller, 42, was nominated and named to the position at The Athletic Congress's national convention last week in Tampa, Florida. The position was given to the coach who received the most votes cast by more than 200 track coaches nationwide from a ballot of nominees, Miller said.

"Yeah, it was really a big, big, surprise for me," he said. "I didn't expect it all because I've been working more on the administrative level here (at K-State) and didn't even attend the convention last week when they named me head coach. It was a complete surprise," he said.

The next step for Miller will be to contact prospective athletes who qualify to participate in the meet. The final selections for the members of the 1987 U.S. team will be made at the TAC National Indoor Championships on February 27 in New York.

It is unlikely that many collegiate athletes will be participating in the championships, Miller said. The TAC qualifying meet for the World Indoor Championships is the same weekend as the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships, thus eliminating the possibilities of many fine collegiate athletes from participating, he said.

"We will be seeing a lot of the Carl Lewis and the Billy Olson types," said Miller.

> 'Next to the Olympics and the World Outdoor Championships, the World Indoor Championships are the most prestigious and important track event around.'
> — Steve Miller

Along with Miller, there were three assistant coaches named to the World Indoor Championships as well. Dick Roberts, head track coach from Florida State and Joe Lange, head track coach from Georgetown University were named assistant coaches. Chuck Skow, a highly regarded track and field writer from Fresno, California, will be working as press manager for the U.S. team.

Even though Miller is out of coaching on the university level, he is quite satisfied, if not a little surprised, with the way things have been going for him since leaving coaching last year.

"It is gratifying to know that even though I've gotten out of coaching a year ago, my colleagues still admire and respect me enough to select me for this honor," he said. "It's quite an honor."

Parrish acquires contract extension

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics announced Friday that K-State's head football coach Stan Parrish received a contract extension through the 1990 season, according to Athletic Director Larry Travis.

The contract extension, which was approved by K-State's Intercollegiate Athletic Council at the conclusion of the regular season, adds to Parrish's contract when he was hired as the University's 25th head football coach on Dec. 2, 1985.

"I am very committed to making the Kansas State football program work. I am very pleased that K-State has the confidence in me to extend my contract, which show me that the administration believes in me and thinks the program is headed in the right direction," Parrish said.

"We are pleased with the job done by Coach Parrish in just one year as head coach of the Kansas State football program," Travis said. "We want to make sure everyone is aware of our commitment to bettering Kansas State football under Coach Parrish's leadership."

Parrish also said there would be no changes in his coaching staff for the next year.

The second-year coach said he is excited about recruiting for next year at this time.

"The staff and myself are busy traveling the country on recruiting assignments this time of year," he said. "We will have several of our recruits visiting the University in the next few weeks."

He and two of his staff members have just returned from Wichita State, where they are actively recruiting five or six players from their program which folded because of financial woes last week.

Parrish, who just completed his first season as the 'Cats head coach, guided K-State to a 2-9 record after a 1-10 season a year ago.

As a head coach, Parrish has compiled an eight-year college mark of 57-20. His overall coaching record is 77-29 which includes three years of high school coaching.

Parrish graduated from Heidelberg College of Tiffin, Ohio, and held the asssistant coaching position at Purdue University, before accepting the head-coaching position at Wabash College of Crawfordsville, Ind., and Marshall University prior to coming to K-State.

For Parrish, the 1985-86 campaign at K-State was his first losing season ever in his 11 seasons as a head coach.

Lady Cats capture second at Louisiana Tech

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

K-State's women's basketball team captured second place at the Louisiana Tech Dial Classic Friday and Saturday at Ruston, La.

The Lady Cats, 3-1, dumped American University 54-51 in the opening round but fell 67-45 in the finals to nationally ranked Louisiana Tech.

"In our first-round game against American University, we beat a very good basketball team," K-State coach Matilda Mossman said.

"Even with a record of 0-2, having lost to Boston College and Pittsburg, they have a good program with some outstanding athletes. We were very fortunate to win this close of a game," she said.

K-State only scored 18 points in the first half against American, but free-throw shooting was the difference in the opener as the Lady Cats outscored American 12-3 from the charity stripe.

"In the American game, we got off to a sluggish start, only scoring 18 points. This had a lot to do with our inexperience while playing on the road and the distractions associated with road action," Mossman said.

K-State led by as much as 11 points in the second half but American managed to crawl within two before Tracy Bleczinski sealed the win with a free throw.

The Lady Cats were paced by Sue Leiding and Carlisa Thomas in the opener. Leiding had 16 points and nine rebounds, and Thomas chipped in 14 points and was credited with five assists.

But against No. 2-ranked Lousiana Tech, K-State was hampered by a horrendous first half and the much-taller Lady Techsters jumped out to a 38-14 halftime lead.

Still, Mossman said, the experience her team gained from playing a nationally ranked team was almost worth the defeat.

"To give our players a shot at playing a team with this caliber was a good experience. Chances are we will not meet a team like Louisiana Tech the rest of the season," Mossman said.

K-State only shot 11.5 percent from the field the first 20 minutes and 26.8 percent for the game. According to Mossman, the Lady Techsters are tough to beat on their home court.

"Louisiana Tech is the No. 2-ranked team in the country, and when they play on their home court, their record is unbelievable," Mossman said.

"They have only lost two games at Thomas Assembly Center since it was built six or seven years ago," she added.

Mossman said Louisiana Tech's outstanding size advantage and lack of support from some of the younger players were the differences in the ball game.

Louisian Tech outrebounded K-State 59-34 and because of K-State's poor first-half shooting effort held a whopping 40-12 rebound advantage at the intermission.

Tech never trailed in the contest and led by as much as 30 points midway through the second half.

"With a front line consisting of players 6-3, 6-3 and 6-foot, LTU has the size and mobility to force their opponents outside, and opens their game up inside," she said.

"We did not get the scoring from our younger players as we had in the past. With a team including six freshman, a game like this gives us the needed experience and concentration level while traveling on the road."

K-State again was led in scoring by Leiding who had 17 points. Thomas had another good rebounding effort with 11 boards. Mossman also noted the effort of one of her freshman players.

"Stephanie Lane, our 6-4 freshman, provided us with an outstanding performance," Mossman said. "She was a big help for our inside game, but did not have the experience needed to face a team like Louisiana Tech."

Named to the All-Tournament team from K-State were Leiding and Thomas. The tournament's Most Valuable Player was Louisiana Tech's Tori Harrison. Lousiana Tech placed two players on the all-tourney team and Central Michigan and American were represented by one player apiece.

"We had an outstanding scoring performance from Sue Leiding, who led the team scoring in both games and Carlisa Thomas, who provided the large share of our rebounding and leadership," Mossman said.

K-State will play against Drake University Thursday at Des Moines.

Drake, 22-8 last season, is a member of the Gateway Collegiate Conference and finished second in the league race with a 16-2 mark.

The Lady Bulldogs return three starters but lost top-gun Wanda Ford who averaged 30.6 points per game during the 1985-86 campaign. Head coach Susan Yow is in her first season at Drake.

K-State leads the overall series 6-4 and the Lady Cats won the meeting in Manhattan in last year 77-64.

Giants dump 'Skins for NFC East lead

Colts win first game of year

By The Associated Press

The New York Giants moved into position to play at home for the next month, including all of their NFL playoff games, and the Indianapolis Colts moved into the winner's circle for the first time Sunday.

The Giants, led by a big play defense that intercepted six Jay Schroeder passes and sacked the Washington quarterback four times, won the NFC East showdown with a 24-14 victory over the Redskins. It was Washington's first loss at home this season, dropping it to 11-3, one game behind the Giants. New York has won seven consecutive games, it longest winning streak since 1962, and needs to beat either St. Louis or Green Bay — who are a combined 6-21-1 — to clinch its first title in 23 years.

The Colts finally won their first game of the season under new Coach Ron Meyer. Eugene Daniel returned a blocked punt 13 yards for a touchdown with 20 seconds remaining for a 28-23 victory over the Atlanta Falcons.

Other upsets on Sunday included Cincinnati taking New England 31-7. Also, it was San Francisco 24, the New York Jets 10; Cleveland 21, Buffalo 17; Minnesota 32, Green Bay 6; Chicago 48, Tampa Bay 14; Pittsburgh 27, Detroit 17; Miami 31, New Orleans 27; San Diego 27, Houston 0; and St. Louis 10, Philadelphia 10.

Giants 24, Redskins 14

The Giants and Bears are the only 12-2 teams in the league, but the Giants hold the tiebreaker edge on the Bears because of a better conference record.

While Schroeder was victimized for the six interceptions and four sacks, three by league leader Lawrence Taylor, New York quarterback Phil Simms was having a big day. Simms threw for 265 yards and three touchdowns, while tight end Mark Bavaro caught five passes for 111 yards.

Colts 28, Falcons 23

The Colts got lucky just before the blocked punt and on the last play of the game.

One play before Tate Randle's block of Rick Donnelly's kick, Donnelly had been roughed by Randle while trying to punt from the Indianapolis 43. But a personal foul infraction against Atlanta's Aaron Brown caused offsetting penalties.

Randle then broke through with 30 seconds remaining, and Daniel picked up the ball and ran in for the score.

The Falcons almost pulled out the game as quarterback Turk Schonert hit Floyd Dixon guided them to the Colts' 12 with three seconds to play. Schonert then passed to Arthur Cox over the middle on the final play, but Cox couldn't hold the ball near the goal line.

The Colts, 1-13, were within one loss of tying the NFL record for consecutive defeats in one season. Meyer replaced the fired Rod Dowhower last Monday.

Bengals 31, Patriots 7

James Brooks rushed for 163 yards and caught six passes for 101 yards, while backfield mate Stanley Wilson ran for 120 yards, including a 58-yard scoring run as Cincinnati set club records of 584 total yards and 300 rushing yards against the NFL's No. 4-ranked defense. Meanwhile, the Bengals' defense shut down the NFL's highest scoring team as they denied the Patriots a chance to clinch a playoff berth.

Bears 48, Buccaneers 14

Doug Flutie entered the game in the second quarter, ran for one touchdown and passed for another. Flutie's first NFL completion was a 52-yard pass to Willie Gault. On the next play, he passed for 27 yards and a touchdown to Walter Payton with 20 seconds left in the half.

Chiefs

Radecic hauled in the fourth interception. Lowery third field goal carried 44 yards with 2:58 left in the game.

Sherman Cocroft's interception in the second quarter gave the Chiefs the ball on the Bronco 17 and moments later Paige snared Blackledge's pass for a 10-3 lead. Elway's two-yard touchdown pass to Sammy Winder made it 10-10 in the final seconds of the first half. Then the Chiefs went up 17-10 when Smith beat Randy Robbins for the touchdown pass in the back of the end zone.

The Broncos, who beat the Chiefs 38-17 in Denver three weeks earlier, could win the AFC West title Monday night if Seattle beats the Los Angeles Raiders.

The Broncos were in trouble on their first possession when Jim Colbert's punt sailed 56 yards to the 2-yard line. Moments later, Jeff Smith returned a Denver punt 9 yards to put the Chiefs in business on the Bronco 35.

Blackledge immediately hit Paige for 17 yards to the 13, but the drive stalled and Lowery came on to kick a 30-yard field goal.

Rich Karlis, who later missed field goals of 47 and 42 yards, drew Denver even at 3-3 with a 26-yard field goal following an embarrassing turnover by Blackledge. The fourth-year quarterback faded back to pass on third-and-three from the Bronco 19 but had the ball slip out of his hand. The ball skittered away and was finally controlled by Denver's Tony Colorito on the Broncos 45. The play was ruled a team sack and a fumble.

Elway hooked up with Mark Jackson on a 51-yard pass play early in the second quarter to the Chiefs' 23. But Deron Cherry intercepted Elway's next pass in the end zone, marking the fourth straight year the all-pro safety has made seven interceptions.

New cola advertises 'all the sugar and twice the caffeine'

Staff Illustration/Robert Squires

By ANNE BRANDSBERG
Collegian Reporter

It's a study warrior's dream: "All the sugar and twice the caffeine."

Now, that dream has become a reality with the electric introduction of Jolt cola, a soft drink that has been gathering attention around Manhattan. Jolt is bottled by an independent company in Rochester, N.Y.

"Our philosophy is to give people a choice. We went back to an old-fashioned taste. We were sick and tired of the big two — Coke and Pepsi — dictating what cola should be," said Jolt spokesman Jim Post.

Jolt's founders, Joseph Rapp and his son T.J., had the idea in 1978 to offer an alternative while the big two were preoccupied with their much-ballyhooed "cola wars." T.J. Rapp developed the acclaimed formula — one that frightens any self-respecting doctor — during the next six years.

They had the cola packaged properly and distributed it to local grocery stores in the Rochester area. Post said that after receiving numerous phone calls from people who had heard about the new soda and were interested in buying some, it became apparent Jolt would begin national distribution.

"We've come a long way since we started in April," Post said. "Our revenue has exceeded our wildest dreams."

Post said they had not defined the market for Jolt before distributing it, but it has become apparent that it appeals to young people most. College students and young professionals seem to be their best customers.

"They love it," Post said.

Young people aren't the only ones enjoying the novelty. Post said he has received letters from middle-age people thanking the makers of Jolt for taking them back 20 years because Jolt tastes like soda fountain cola.

"They were tired of drinking stuff that didn't taste good. Pepsi and Coke have been taking all the good things out and putting in all sorts of things like artificial sweeteners. My parents were sick of it. We said, 'Let's put all the things that made cola fun back in,'" Post said.

Diane Nordhus, manager of Shop Quik, 1816 Claflin Rd., said the shop received 10 cases of Jolt last week, and by Monday all 10 cases had been sold. Nordhus said Jolt had sold so well they plan to carry it indefinitely.

"I was really surprised," Nordhus said. "We don't sell that much Pepsi in a week. We sell a lot of No-Doz this time of year when there are a lot of tests. I'm sure we sold the Jolt because it has so much caffeine."

Bank protests farm loan law

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An attorney for the Federal Land Bank of Wichita told the Kansas Supreme Court Thursday the Legislature created "a mechanical monster" when it passed a law this year to help financially troubled farmers forestall foreclosures.

Calvin J. Karlin made the assertion in the Supreme Court hearing room packed with more than 100 spectators, including farmers, state agriculture officials and farm group representatives.

Karlin and attorneys for farmers that have attempted to make use of the state's Family Farm Preservation Act not only disagreed on the effects of the law but also on how it works.

At least two of the seven Supreme Court justices said they too were confused about the law's provisions because they have yet to receive a copy of the measure.

The law, which applies only to loans made before the act became effective on May 8, would allow insolvent farmers to delay execution of mortgage foreclosure judgments against their land and equipment for up to three years while they make attempts to restructure their debts, the attorneys said.

In the interim, the farmers are required only to make partial interest payments. Attorneys told the court the statute applies only to land that was purchased before Jan. 1, 1986 and to foreclosure actions that began after Oct. 1, 1985.

Karlin said the court should rule the new law unconstitutional because it applies retroactively, interferes with pre-existing contracts, takes property that rightly belongs to the land bank without due process, interferes with the exclusive right of Congress to pass bankruptcy laws and illegally tells the Federal Farm Credit System what interest rates to charge.

The law also would have the effect of driving up interest rates for other land bank customers, he said. Moreover, Karlin said a smart farmer could use the law to refinance and redeem property in a maneuver aimed at preventing the land bank from ever recovering its principle and interest.

"Will the Legislature next expand the protections to Main Street businesses who are affected by the farm economy," Karlin asked.

The case stems from rulings this summer by Washington County District Judge Richard Wahl, who held the law to unconstitutional in two unrelated foreclosure cases.

William Madden, a Hays attorney who represented the Nelsons, said the law allows a creditor to remain in substantially the same position as before a farmer sought protection and it receives interest at a rate 2 percent above the current rate paid for U.S. Treasury bills.

First Vietnamese Rhodes Scholar fled homeland with boat people

By The Associated Press

CLAREMONT, Calif. — An Air Force cadet who as a boy fled Vietnam with the "boat people" nearly a dozen years ago is among 32 Americans chosen as 1987 Rhodes Scholars, the Rhodes Scholarship Trust announced Sunday.

Others selected include 10 aspiring scientists, four former congressional interns, a Peace Corps volunteer and a Mormon missionary.

The 32 winners will join an international group of students chosen from 18 countries for two or three years of study at Oxford University in England, said David Alexander, president of Pomona College and American secretary of the Rhodes Scholarship Trust.

A third of the Rhodes Scholars this year are women, two are black, three are Asians and four winners hail from Yale University, which had the most graduates on the list. Women have been selected only since 1976.

Hoang Nhu Tran, 21, who will be the second Vietnamese graduate from the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado, is the first Vietnamese Rhodes Scholar.

Tran, who is majoring in biology and chemistry and is second in his class of 960 scheduled for graduation next spring, is a free-fall parachutist, a wrestler and a glider instructor. His father was a general officer in the Vietnamese Air Force before the government collapsed in 1975.

"I never thought of it or dreamed of this day," Tran said by telephone Sunday from his squadron barracks.

Tran said he will spend two years at Oxford then return to the United States for four years of medical school. He wants to become an Air Force flight surgeon.

He and his parents, a brother and an aunt fled Vietnam by boat in 1975 before the fall of Saigon.

He said they were picked up several days later by a commercial vessel near Subic Bay in the Philippines. They soon gained sponsorship from a church in Fort Collins, Colo., where they moved on July 7, 1975.

'Oz' combats 'complacency' in profession of architecture

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

Since 1978, students in the College of Architecture and Design have provided the world of professional architecture with a thought-provoking publication named "Oz" magazine.

"Oz," now entering its ninth year of publication, is designed and edited solely by K-State architecture students. Articles address issues affecting the architecture profession and activities within the college.

Each year, the magazine's editors solicit renowned professional architects to be contributing authors of articles to place in "Oz". Kathy Troutfetter, fifth-year senior in interior architecture and one of this year's editors, said this is a special year for "Oz."

"We put a theme together for the whole thing, and this year ours is 'beyond complacency.' They picked the staff earlier last year, and we started working on it during the summer," Troufetter said. "We picked a list of about 50 names of architects out in the profession who, to us, did architecture above and beyond the norm."

About 15 have responded — which is unusally high — because of the success of last year's edition, Troutfetter said.

In the ninth edition, the theme "beyond complacency" is based on how complacency has become the plague of our society, and that architecture, too, has been reduced from an art form into just a profession.

The edition will explore new and unique solutions to functional architectural problems and explore the meaningful depths of what lies beyond complacency.

"What happens is that people just do stuff for the grade, or just to get by. It seems like when you look at the profession it's like that, too," Troutfetter said.

"In choosing our theme, we felt that if you're going to do something, you might as well do it right, and you might as well make it look good," she said.

Students from the College of Architecture and Design may apply annually for editor or staff positions. This year 14 students work on the publication.

Concert offers variety of dances

By CAROL LENKNER
Collegian Reporter

WinterDance '86 presented students and faculty a variety of ballet, jazz and modern pieces, which ranged in theme from silly to serious.

Review

The dance concert, presented Dec. 5-6 in McCain Auditorium, was a production of the Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies.

The concert provided K-State a good variety of dance pieces. The dancers were well rehearsed and performed professionally. The stage settings worked well with the pieces, although the length of time it took to change settings between pieces was distracting.

Dancers dressed in brightly colored sweatsuits portrayed children playing games in a piece titled "Child's Play." The piece, choreographed by dance instructor Roxanne Bartush, was filled with imagination and adventure. Long wooden sticks were magically tranformed to stick horses, a dog leash, dancing canes and rowing oars as the "children" passed their time at play.

"Roxanne got her ideas for the piece by watching children play in a park," said dancer Sharisse Horn, sophomore in business administration. "It's a fun piece that she created for grins."

Bartush also choreographed two other modern pieces for the concert, as well as one jazz number. "Three Women" was described by Bartush as "being a piece that's more of me" and having a more serious vein.

"The piece has a type of movement I wanted to put on the kids,"

Gregory Alan Jennings, junior in theater, and Deni Good, graduate student in speech, did a convincing portrayal the male ballroom dancers. Dressed in tuxedos, Jennings and Good seemed to sweep the women off their feet as they glided across the dance floor. Jennings and Good were two of the three male dancers in the concert. They performed in several numbers, keeping energy and expression alive in everything they did.

Quirk and Bartush were featured in a duet titled "Water Garden," choreographed by visiting professional Mary Martin. The two dancers worked well together, with flowing costumes and movement.

The WinterDance '86 concert consisted 10 pieces and 26 dancers.

"The concert is run just a professional company would run it," said Quirk. "That's the way we treat it, and that's the way the dancers act."

Science fiction interests unite club members

By AMY GREENE
Collegian Reporter

Take a "could be" or "what if" situation. Generate good and bad elements. Describe what the world might be like if science were different. Play up humor, horror and fantasy.

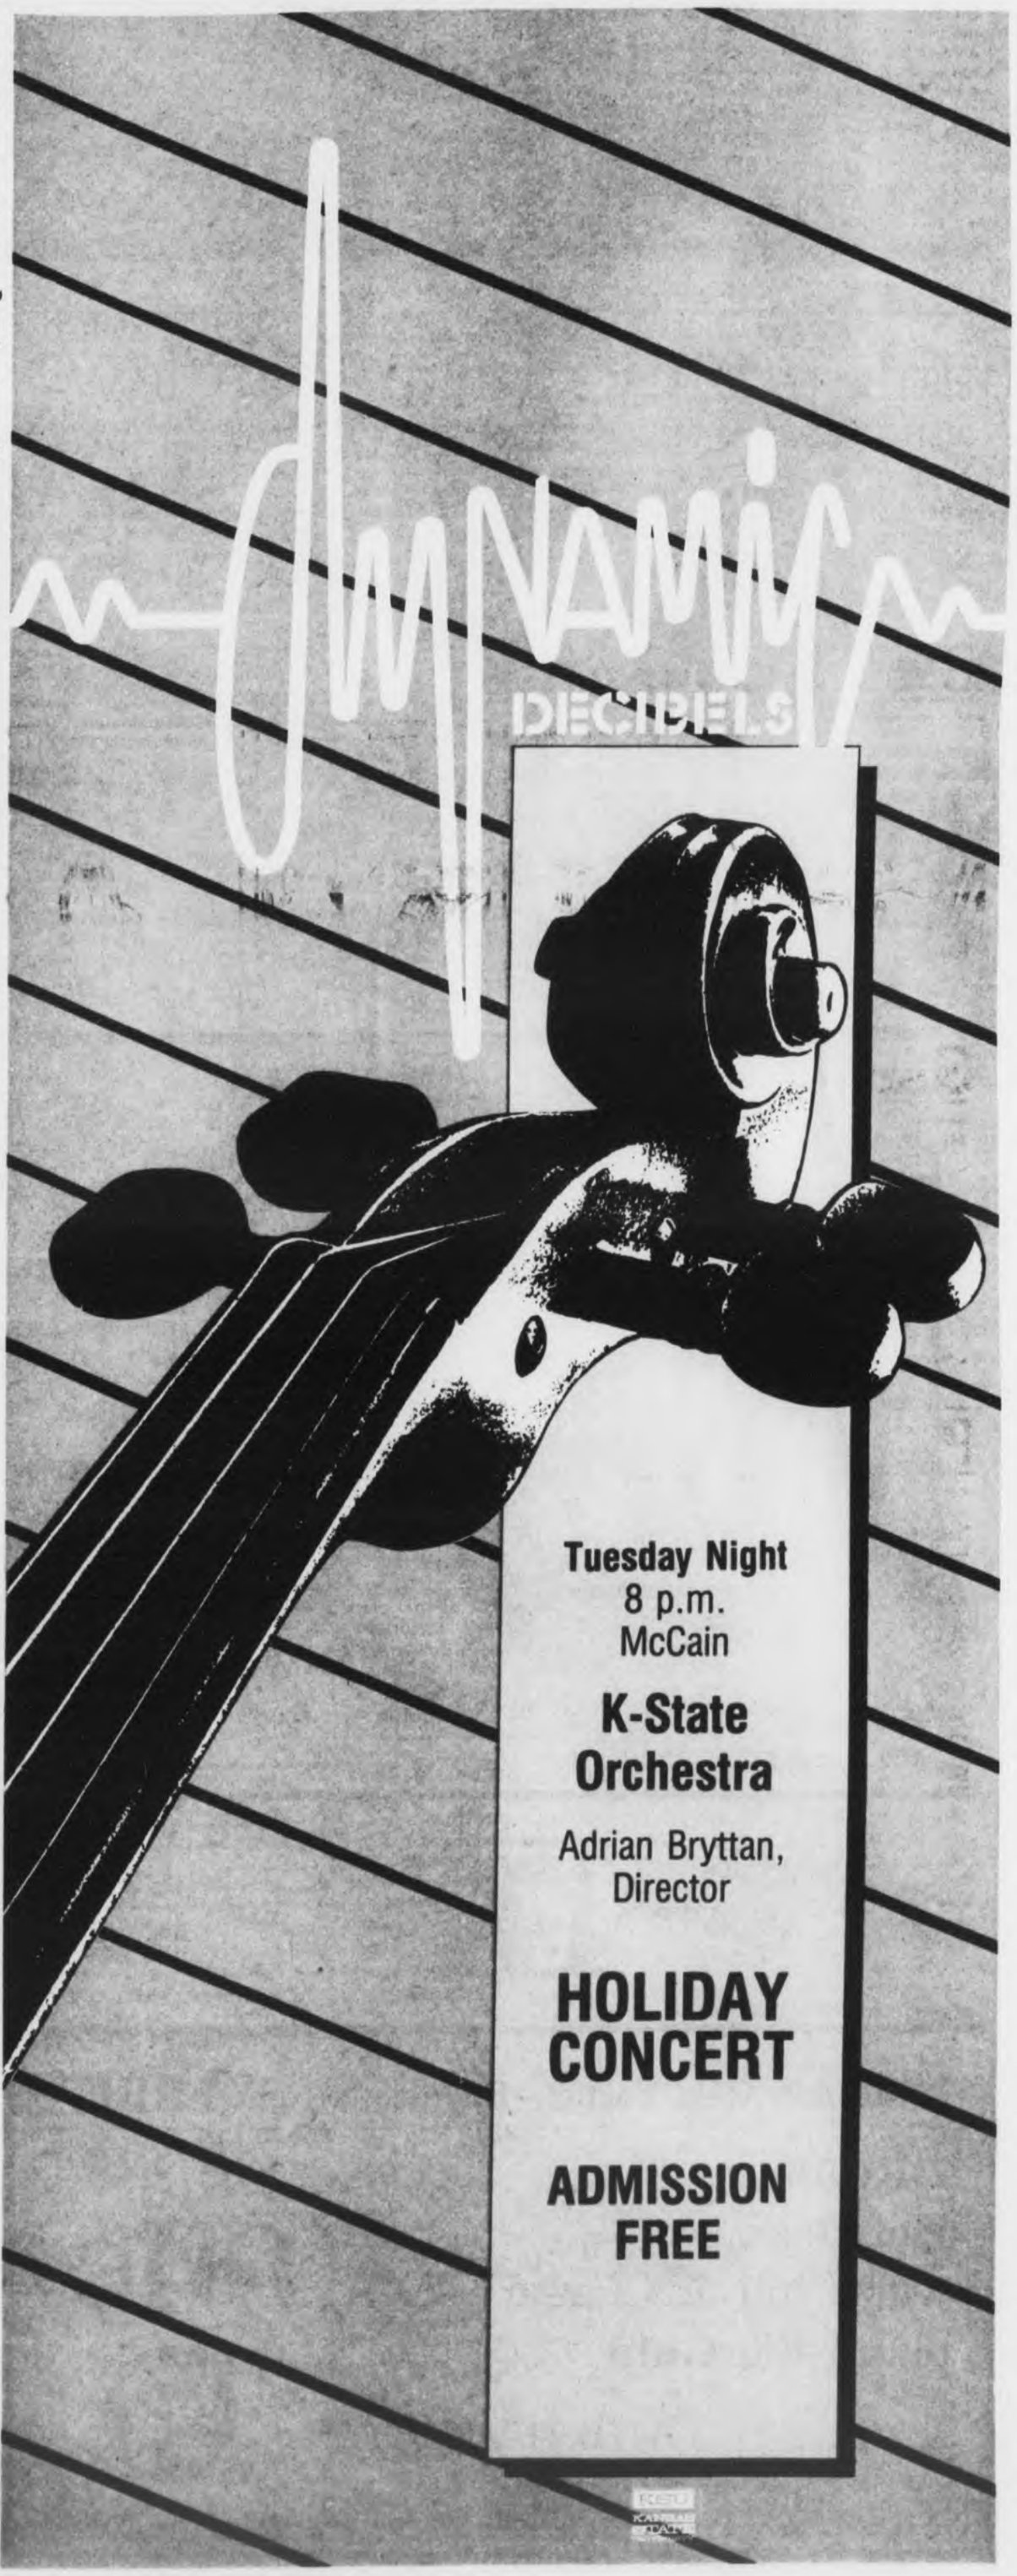
Do all that and one has science fiction, said Isaac Wakabayashi, professor of electrical and computer engineering and adviser of the Starriders club.

Starriders, a science fiction organization at K-State, has a membership of about 30 people from a wide variety of majors and interests.

Starriders was formed six years ago from a parent club, Anomaly, which wanted to use Manhattan for a convention center. Anomaly is also a science fiction organization that sponsors Imagicons.

Sandra Siebert, senior in journalism and mass communications and member of Starriders, said a great interest for science fiction brings together members of the group.

The group is so diversified that the club's president, Coy Kissee, is a high school student in Manhattan. Other members of the group collect and write science fiction.



The organization does several projects throughout the year. Wakabayashi said the Starriders have car washes as fund-raisers and publish a magazine.

scholarships we've received."

Twiss said the work she does is just last-minute preparation and the real key to success is the classroom instruction provided daily by University instructors.

"I think K-State is attracting some top students who are getting a superb education," she said.

The excitement of the selection was shared by all of Welch's family and has given his hometown community of Moran a sense of pride Judy Welch, Kelly Welch's mother, said.

"We are kind of in awe," Judy Welch said. "In a small community, we don't have something like this happen very often."

"I don't know who was more excited, him, or the daughter on this end (Welch's 26-year-old sister Karol)," she said of the Saturday night phone call bringing the news to Welch's home.

Welch first applied for the scholarship on the K-State level, then was nominated on the state of Kansas level and then went to the regional level. He then went to the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis for final interviews with 11 other finalists.

The regional selection committee in Minneapolis selected three other students from the Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas and South Dakota region.

"It's a long shot for anyone, anywhere in the country who applies," Twiss said. More than 1,200 students apply for the Rhodes Scholarship nationally.

Iran

mittee continues its investigation and other panels begin their own. Secretary of State George Shultz is scheduled to testify today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and Tuesday the House intelligence committee opens hearings.

Despite the lingering questions and the continuing investigation, the mood in the capital has changed from a week before.

Senate Republican leader Bob Dole, who last week urged Reagan to summon a special session of Congress to appoint a Watergate-style investigating committee, called the president's speech "a big step in the right direction" and predicted "a turnaround" in the political mood.

Dole, appearing on CBS' "Face the Nation," cited unidentified sources on the Senate intelligence committee as saying that panel's probe "may have a dry hole there. ... And maybe this isn't such a big, big thing."

However, Dole's predecessor as Senate GOP leader, former Sen. Howard Baker of Tennessee, said discrepancies in statements by administration officials suggested the president still was not getting the full story from his aides.

Reagan, Baker said, "simply must get the facts out and do it promptly and be ahead of the committee and ahead of the special prosecutor."

House Republican leader Robert Michel, R-Ill., also urged further steps by thrtz, "it is up to him at this particular juncture to say, 'Yes, I made mistakes. And (my aides) have made mistakes.'"

Sen. Paul Laxalt, R-Nev., a confidant of Reagan, advised the president to "marshall all the forces in the federal government, the FBI and everything else, and get ahead of the information.

"You shouldn't sit idly by in the weeks and months ahead on a Chinese water treatment basis and have these disclosures," said Laxalt, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press."

House Majority leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, slated to become House Speaker when Congress convenes on Jan. 6, also urged Reagan to press administration officials to divulge the facts.

Two ousted White House aides said to have known about the transactions, former national security adviser Vice Adm. John Poindexter and his deputy, Marine Lt. Col. Oliver North, appeared before the Senate intelligence committee last week, but declined to testify, pleading the Fifth Admendment.

Speaker

"We see effectively a reintroduction of an imperialistic policy in Iran," he said.

"The question now is will this be a relationship between two sovereign nations or will this be a subservient relationship?" Saeed said.

The former relationship would be positive for both countries. The latter state of affairs would have disastrous results for the United States, he said.

An Iranian student in attendance questioned Saeed on the role of Islam on U.S. relations and added that Iran would establish relations with any country that respected the sovereignty of the nation.

help reduce the 3.8 percent across-the-board cuts, it will not be nearly enough to eliminate all the mandated budget cuts, Miller said.

In the statement to Stotts, Wefald wrote, "Not only will we be unable to provide our various clientele with the level of services they have a right to expect, but we also will be unable to provide the state with the expertise which is needed if the recent negative economic trends are to be permanently reversed."

Wefald also outlined how much money will be cut from the major University accounts, if the five-point system is not adopted by the state.

Under Hayden's plan, the educational programs stand to lose $1.9 million; research programs, $631,865; public services, $360,565; and utilities, $631,865.

Although the College of Veterinary Medicine receives a separate appropriation from the state, it has been included in the above cuts, which total more than $3.5 million, Miller said. Without the cuts mandated in the College of Veterinary Medicine, the University cuts total $3.06 million.

The cuts in educational programs mean that some spring semester classes will be dropped or combined, and summer school classes will be reduced, according to the impact statement.

The proposed cuts in research could cost the University about $3 million in grants.

"The interpretation is based on estimates from those people responsible in those areas," Miller said.

Robert Kruh, dean of the graduate school, said he didn't know where the $3 million tag was derived, but he said it might be an aggregate figure reached when each of the colleges filed their impact statements with Wefald.

"Through the efforts of the faculty, we have been very competitive," Kruh said, referring to research grants. "To the extent that we will have fewer resources, it may be true."

Also, the proposed cuts in public services will leave rural communities without consultative assistance they need, and a substantial number of citizens needing nutrition and health-related information will be unable to obtain it, Wefald said.

Debt

of institutions involved with the lending of money to sovereign nations.

The extent to which foreign debt affects U.S. banks can be seen in the loans large the banks have made to Latin American countries, he said.

Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. has loans totaling 284 percent of its capital and 10 percent of its assets, and Chase Manhattan Bank has 201 percent of its capital and 7.5 percent of its assets in loans to Latin American countries.

However, banks aren't considered "problem banks" until their non-performing loans have exceeded their capital, Khoury said. Non-performing loans are loans on which no interest payments have been made for 90 days.

"The debt crisis could not have come at a worse time for commercial banks, (and) American banks in particular," he said.

In 1984, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation had 800 banks on its problem-bank list, but by June 1986 the number had risen to 1,321. In 1976, the FDIC had 378 banks on the list, Khoury said.

Of the 1,321 banks, 10 percent are expected to fail, he said.

AND GET YOUR YELLOW TOKEN

★Get your yellow token, which is good for 10% off any non-textbook items, when you sell your books during dead week or final week. You decide what the token is worth by the amount you purchase. THE MORE YOU BUY THE MORE YOU SAVE! You can use the token whenever you want. Use it for Christmas purchases or use it next semester.

★Bring all your books to Varney's (regardless of where you bought them) and our buyers will value them individually. You choose what you want to sell! WE BUY BOOKS EVERY DAY! However, you can usually get the most for your books by selling them to us at the end of the semester.

★The price we pay for books is determined mainly by two factors—if the books will be used again at K-State and if we need the books for our stock. If we cannot buy your books for our stock, we will offer you the best price we can, based on the national market.

★Remember, it's what you get for all your books that counts, and we think that the wholesaler we buy for pays the highest prices.

★We know you're busy and in a hurry so we have four buyers to take care of you. We try to keep the time you spend in line to a minimum. We also buy until 9 at night during dead week and until 10 at night during final week.

Budget cuts to affect temporary employees, spring class schedule

By JUDY GOLDBERG and JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writers

University President Jon Wefald said last week that budget cuts would not affect personnel, but deans of four colleges reported that some temporary assistant instructors and graduate teaching assistants will not be rehired next semester.

Wefald said last week the 3.8-percent reductions mandated Nov. 19 by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden indicated personnel should not have to be cut. Wefald said, "That's true here, too."

Monday night, Wefald defined personnel as tenured professors.

"I suppose when we're talking about personnel, certainly we're talking about tenured professors," he said. "I'm sure in some cases (there are) some part-timers, some fixed-term contracts that would not be renewed and some graduate assistants."

The administration left budget cut decisions to the discretion of the deans, Wefald said.

Colleges where personnel reductions have been instituted include business administration, engineering, arts and sciences and education.

"Definitely, that's the case," said Randy Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration. "We're looking at graduate assistants and temporary faculty members that won't be rehired."

Pohlman said that although no classes will be eliminated in the college, some sections will be closed next semester. He said a "top priority" in the cuts was to ensure seniors would graduate on schedule.

Sections also may be cut in the colleges of engineering, arts and sciences, human ecology and education.

William Stamey, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said the possibility of "phantom classes" may exist next semester. Quoting the phrase from a University of Kansas colleague, he said that although these classes appear on the line schedule, they may not exist in reality.

"This is what worries me," he said. "I'm hoping we don't have any 'phantom classes,' but I'm not guaranteeing it."

Don Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, echoed Stamey's remarks, adding that students may not find out about the closings until spring enrollment.

"We're trying to avoid that, but that's what could happen," he said.

With the decrease in class sections may come a decline in enrollment, as a majority of the deans said recruitment budgets also were cut.

Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, said the amount of phone calls and letters to potential students will be reduced.

"We cannot follow up on contacts in the same quality way we were," Woods said.

David Byrne, dean of the College of Education, said he believes the greatest impact of the budget cuts will be on recruiting graduate students.

He said graduate students will not be attracted to K-State when they learn "that we're suffering a budget dilemma."

The College of Engineering faces the same situation.

"We try to support graduate students and graduate research assistantships," Rathbone said. "Now, we'll have to cut back on them."

Stamey said all personnel positions cut were temporary positions.

McFarlane testifies Reagan approved Iran weapons sales

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Robert C. McFarlane, President Reagan's former national security adviser, contradicted previous accounts from administration officials on Monday, testifying under oath that the president approved an "indirect" shipment of arms to Iran in August 1985.

As the public accounting of the Reagan administration's foreign policy fiasco began on Capitol Hill, Secretary of State George P. Shultz — also under oath before the House Foreign Affairs Committee — denied involvement in the transfer of Iranian arms sale profits to Nicaraguan rebels, saying he had "zero" knowledge of the "illegal" diversion of money.

As Shultz and McFarlane appeared separately before the committee, the Justice Department released the text of its application to a federal appellate court panel in Washington, seeking appointment of an independent counsel to probe possible criminal activity in the affair.

The request raised the possibility that the granting of immunity from prosecution may be necessary to get to the bottom of the affair. It was not immediately clear when the three-member panel would act to name the counsel.

Marine Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, fired as a top National Security Council aide, and "other U.S. government officials" were mentioned as likely targets of the investigation.

McFarlane, who had testified last week in secret before Senate Intelligence Committee, testified publicly Monday before the House panel, saying the president gave his authorization for the indirect shipment of "small levels of arms to Iran for the purpose of strengthening elements against terrorism."

McFarlane did not mention any other country by name, but Israel has been identified as having sent American arms to Iran during the summer of 1985.

Attorney General Edwin Meese III, who made a preliminary inquiry into the matter at Reagan's request, said on Nov. 25, "Our information is that the president knew about it probably after the fact."

On Friday, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said he had "not found anyone who has a recollection of the president approving" the Israeli shipment in advance.

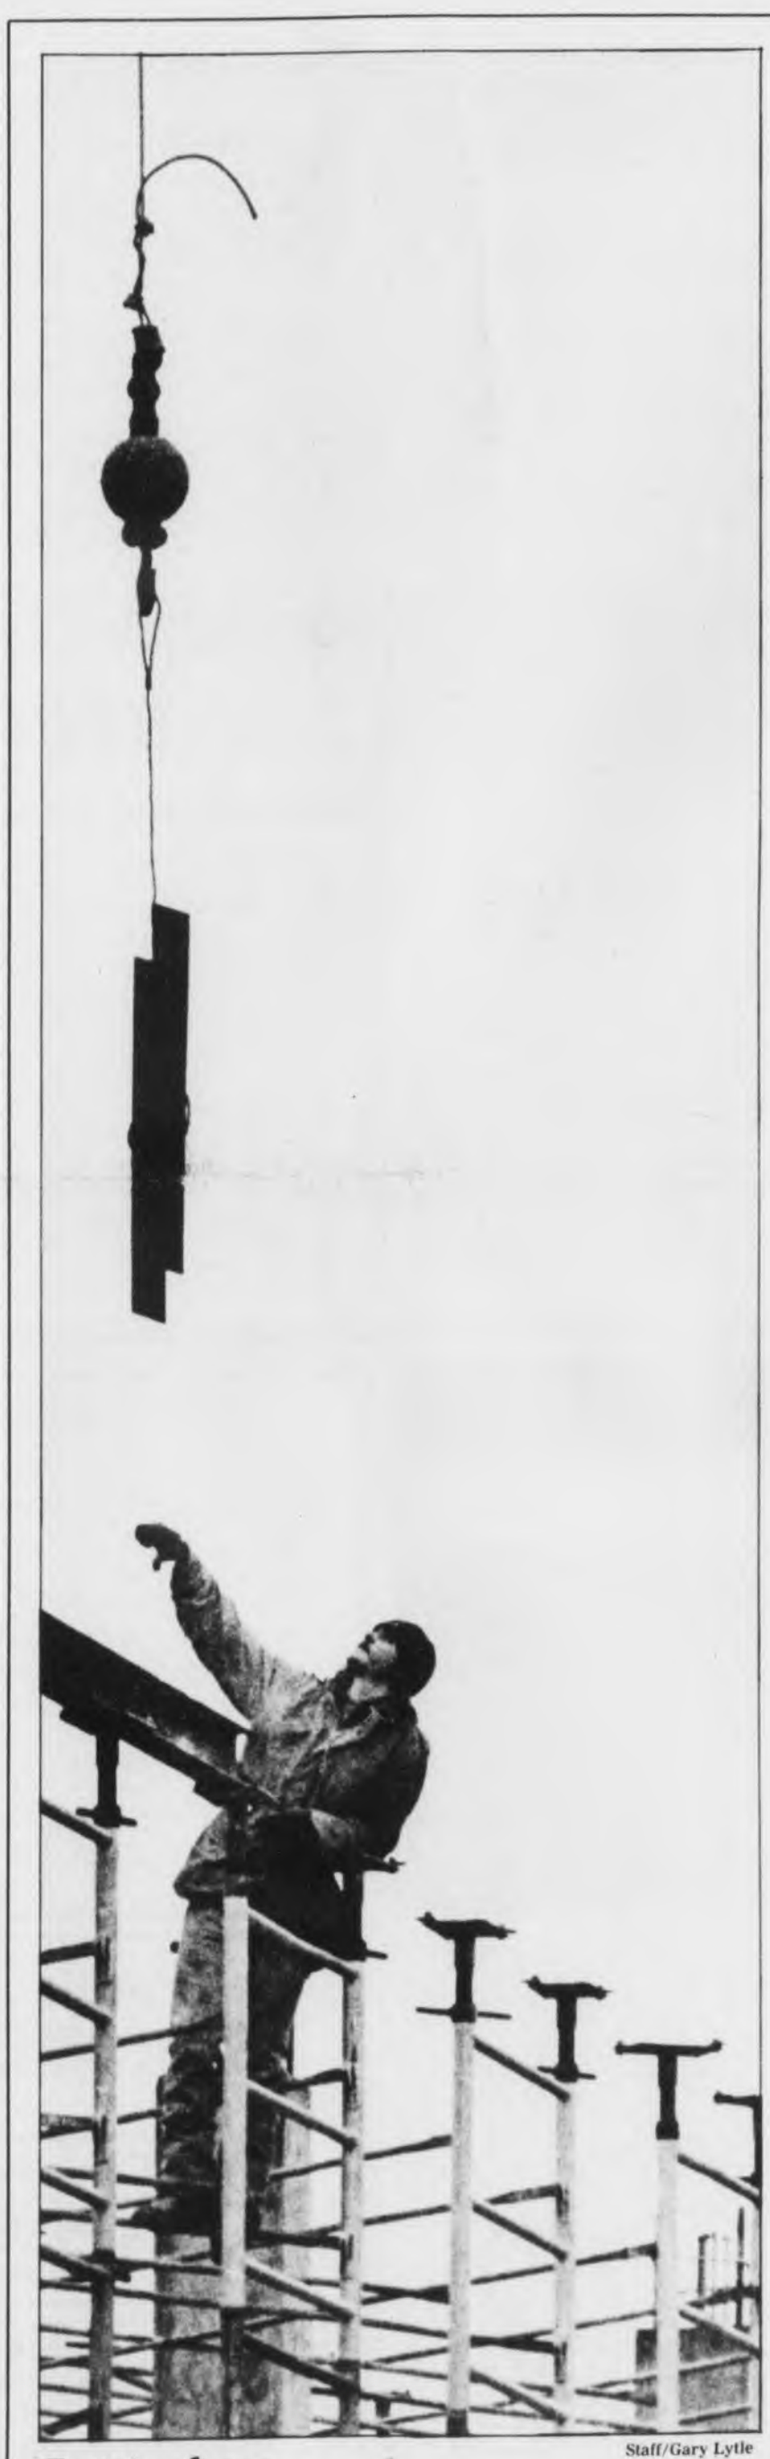
Asked about the transfer of profits from the arms sale to the Nicaraguan Contra rebels, McFarlane, who resigned as national security adviser in December 1985, said the president "did not know of and did not approve such actions."

When asked to speculate on who might have approved such action, McFarlane said, "I wasn't there, and it's out of place for me to speculate."

Across the Capitol, the Senate Intelligence Committee began its second week of secret hearings on the Iran-Contra connection with another key witness declining to testify on grounds that it might violate his Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination.

Robert W. Owen, a conservative activist who reportedly assisted North in contacts with Contra rebels and private individuals sympathetic to their cause, left the committee room about 15 minutes after the time he had been subpoenaed to appear. Owen refused to answer questions from reporters.

Leonard Greenbaum, Owen's attorney, said his client declined to testify because "we have not had much time to talk to him. The picture is complex and cloudy."



Last week, Vice Adm. John Poindexter, who succeeded McFarlane as Reagan's national security adviser, and North, a National Security Council aide to both Poindexter and McFarlane, both declined to testify before the Senate panel.

McFarlane undertook a secret mission to Iran after he left the White House, and in a prepared statement he submitted to the committee but did not read, McFarlane said he was advised while returning from Tehran at the end of last May "that the U.S. government had applied part of the proceeds from arms transfers carried out in 1986, to support the Contras."

Shultz, meanwhile, declared: "My role in that was zero, I knew nothing about it until it came out. ...From what I have seen and what the attorney general has said, some things took place that were illegal."

Shultz added a startling new

Universities 'rip off' state, official says

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Universities in the regents system have been "ripping the state off" at a clip of $250,000 a year in their recruitment practices of new faculty, according to a Kansas lawmaker who Monday predicted the 1987 Legislature will require reimbursement from the schools.

However, Stanley Z. Koplik, executive director of the Board of Regents which governs the six schools, said no one has "intentionally defrauded the state" and he objected to the call for total reimbursement.

Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, said several of the six state-funded universities have been stealing from the state by coaching new employees how to dodge a two-year waiting period mandated by law before they can qualify for participation in the regents retirement program.

"The regents have been ripping us off," Miller said after hearing a report from Meredith Williams, the Legislative Post Auditor, whose staff uncovered the scheme in a recent audit.

Although no actual laws may have been broken, Miller said the schools "clearly violated the intent of the law."

"These schools have not been following the intent of the law and requiring new employees to wait two years before the state starts paying into their retirement," Miller said. "The schools have been showing new faculty how to get immediate participation when they recruit them. And even though they've been coached, there were 23 who didn't even follow the scam correctly."

Miller is a member of the Legislative Post Audit Committee which employs Williams and his staff as the watchdog arm of the Legislature and state government. The committee met Monday to review a number of audits performed by Williams' staff.

Koplik said the regents board, which sets policy and budgets for the state universities, would never condone any violation of the law by its institutions and he believes some reimbursement may be in order.

"The violations, for the most part, have been inadvertant and I would hope they would not be viewed crassly as us doing something we knew was improper," Koplik said. "I hope no one views this as a deliberate conspiracy to defraud the state.

"I think it may be justifiable to recoup money from the institutions in those clear cases where violations occurred. However, I think the statute could be clarified to provide more direction to the institutions and prospective employees as to the conditions of their employment. I think presently there is some confusion on the part of those engaged in recruitment."

If the universities were asked to reimburse more than the $70,000 linked to 23 clear violations, Koplik said he didn't know where the money would be found since the universities already trying to cut 3.8 percent from their budgets, as mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden.

In the audit of the regents' system, Williams and his staff found that 29 percent of the new faculty hired in the past two years at the regents' in-

Board plans to change purpose, help agricultural economy

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Sam Brownback, recently appointed Kansas Secretary of Agriculture, said Monday he sees the role of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture as "changing its function dramatically."

In the past, the board primarily has been viewed as a regulatory agency, one that is there to enforce the laws, Brownback said.

"We (the board) are changing to focus in on what we can do to help this agricultural economy that is imperative for the future of Kansas," he said. "If we are going to have a strong state, we have got to have a strong agriculture. It's that simple."

Providing assistance to rural communities is one area Brownback is addressing, and he sees it as a top priority for the board.

"Everyone knows we have a problem (in the rural communities)," he said. "We have a problem of major-league proportions.

"People are tired of hearing about the problem, they want possible solutions."

Brownback and the board has requested that the Legislature allow the formation of a rural initiatives division to be operated as a joint K-State/Board of Agriculture project. The division would be in the form of a Farmers Assistance Counseling and Training Service program for rural communities — a hotline assistance program.

Brownback attributed economically depressed agriculture and oil industries to the downfall of the rural communities.

"Most rural communities don't die, they commit suicide," Brownback said.

One development in the battle against the downturn in the agricultural sector is the formation of a commission on the future of Kansas agriculture. The commission was organized to develop a blueprint of projects that could be undertaken to assist current Kansas agricultural activity and help it become better in the future, Brownback said.

The commission is utilizing people and industries that are not traditionally associated with agriculture but are affected by what happens to Kansas agriculture, Brownback said. Examples Brownback cited include chambers of commerce and the state's bankers.

"Developing options and alternatives for profitability for Kansas farmers is another top priority for the board and myself," he said. "We (board members) have worked with the vegetable growers, and there are good possibilities for alternative crops."

The board is becoming increasingly involved in identifying agenda items and developing facts for the discussion and decisions of the items, Brownback said. Agenda items include the question of corporate activity in the pork and poultry industry and the enacting of a

French premier drops protested bill

PARIS — Premier Jacques Chirac on Monday withdrew a bill to revise the the state-run university system, giving in to a three-week campaign of sometimes violent protests by high school and college students.

In the Latin Quarter, the capital's student district, about 30,000 demonstrators marched peacefully through the streets to mourn the death of a 22-year-old student who had been beaten by police. According to an autopsy, the student died of a heart attack after he was beaten.

Throughout the country, people paused for a moment of silence.

Opposition to Chirac's center-right government has been snowballing since the protests began. Teachers, unions, leftist politicians and even government officials have spoken out against the university bill.

The government has said the measure would make higher education more competitive, but critics claim it is elitist and diminishes students' freedom of choice.

"No modification of the universities, as necessary as it may be, can be carried through without wide support from all of the interested parties, notably students and teachers," Chirac said in a televised announcement.

"It can only be done in calm. It clearly appears that that is not the case today. Demonstrations in process, with all of the risks of violence and the dangers they entail for all, are the proof," Chirac said.

S. Africa says 256 children in jail

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — The government said Monday that 256 children under 16 were in jail without charge, including one only 11 years old. Anti-apartheid groups reported a huge troop buildup in black townships.

Police Commissioner J.P. Coetzee made the announcement about children detained under the nationwide state of emergency imposed June 12.

Monitoring groups estimate the number of black children under 18 being held at 1,300-4,000 and have demanded they be freed before Christmas.

Coetzee gave no indication of how many people aged 16-18 were being held. One monitoring group, the Detainees' Parents Support Committee, called that omission "the most cynical sleight of hand."

"It is clear that the 16-, 17- and 18-year-old group are the prime target of state repression," it said. "Whatever the exact number may be, even one child in detention is too many."

The End Conscription Campaign, an anti-draft group that opposes the use of white army draftees in black townships, said Monday there had been a "massive concentration of troops" in townships over the past week.

Farmer digs up undetonated bomb

CLYDACH, Wales — A farmer said he carried an unexploded World War II bomb off his land because he didn't want bomb disposal experts trampling his newly sown grass seed.

"I know it was a silly thing to do, but it was just on the spur of the moment," 46-year-old Gordon Griffiths said Monday, after bomb experts defused the device and found its detonator still intact.

He said his pickax struck the bomb while he was working on his 100-acre farm near Swansea in south Wales during the weekend. He called the bomb squad, but then picked up the 30-inch-long projectile and carried it 60 yards to the edge of the field.

Griffiths said he was "sweating and frightened" but guessed that if his pickax hadn't detonated it, it was safe. "I knew what these police and bomb disposal people would be like, and I was worried about my grass. I'm just a down-to-earth farmer and I wanted to keep my land tidy."

Court to decide child abuse case

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether a person charged with sexually abusing a child must be allowed to attend pretrial hearings in which the child is questioned.

The court will review a ruling that threw out a Kentucky man's sodomy conviction because he was excluded from a hearing held to determine his alleged victims' competence to testify at trial.

The Kentucky attorney general says the ruling, if upheld, could increase "traumatization and intimidation of child victims by the criminal justice system."

In other matters, the court:

—Agreed to consider killing a lawsuit against the government by a former Army sergeant who was given LSD without his knowledge 28 years ago in secret chemical welfare tests.

—Voted to decide, in a case with millions of dollars in consumer savings at stake, whether the government must stop allowing the importation of some foreign merchandise bearing U.S. trademarks.

—Rejected the appeal of a Louisiana family trying to change from "colored" to "white" the state's official racial listings for two deceased family members.

Report shows 1988 recession likely

WASHINGTON — The nation's economy will be weaker than the Reagan administration predicts next year and a new recession may well be looming in 1988, U.S. business economists said Monday.

Total national output will actually grow a bit faster in 1987 than this year, but not enough to make much of a dent in the nation's 7 percent jobless rate, the economists said.

Though they issued no specific economic storm warnings, the forecasters seemed to think such sluggish performance couldn't go on forever. And a majority thought things would get worse rather than better.

"As the U.S. expansion begins its fifth year, economists continue to be concerned about a recession on the horizon," said Jerry Jordan, the group's president.

"Although only about 30 percent believe we will be in recession by the end of 1987, about 60 percent expect a downturn by the end of 1988 and over 90 percent anticipate a decline before the close of 1989," said Jordan, a former member of President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers and currently senior vice president and chief economist of First Interstate Bancorp in Los Angeles.

Boston firm to buy Learjet stock

DENVER — The Gates Corporation announced Monday it has signed a contract with Cobey Corporation of Boston for the sale of Gates' 64.8 percent stock holding in Gates Learjet Corp. of Tucson.

Cobey is an investment firm, and the sale involves a consideration of $8 a share, composed of $7 cash and $1 in eight percent preferred stock of the acquiring company.

Gates owns 7,840,585 shares of Learjet, resulting in a purchase price of $62.7 million.

Closing is scheduled by the end of the year.

On Dec. 4, Gates announced the end of an earlier agreement to sell its Learjet shares to M.J. Rosenthal & Associates, Inc., of New York.

That announcement said Gates would conduct discussions with other potential buyers.

Gates Learjet sales through the first nine months of 1986 were $175.7 million.

The company reported a third quarter loss of $24.5 million primarily due to inventory write-downs and adjustments resulting from the sale of C-212A aircraft to the U.S. Air Force.

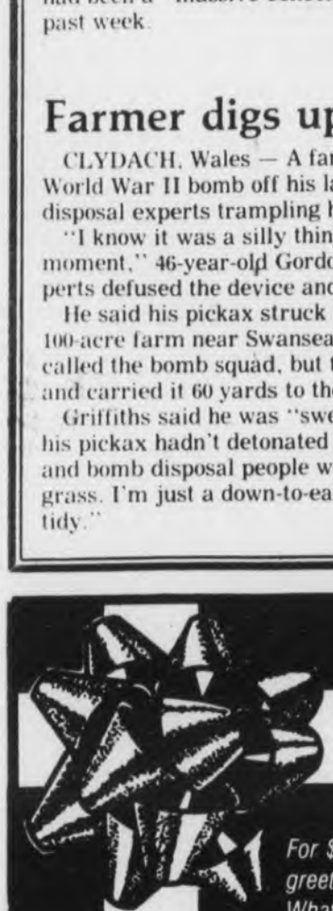
Correction

The author of the column, "Surviving 'The 12 Days of Finals,'" on Monday's editorial page was misidentified. It was written by Tracy Carlile, Collegian columnist.

Due to a reporter's error, women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman was incorrectly quoted in Monday's story, "Lady Cats capture second at Louisiana Tech." Mossman's quote should have had American University's record at 2-0 with the school defeating Boston College and Pittsburgh.



According to information provided by the K-State Office of Sports Information, Sue Leiding also was incorrectly listed as a member of the all-tourney team.

In addition, the Lady Cats' overall record should have been reported as 4-1.

GSL fee elimination affects office's funds

By The Collegian Staff

One of the many cuts the University's Office of Student Financial Assistance will have to deal with next semester is the depletion of a $10 processing fee assessed to students applying for Guaranteed Student Loans.

This cut will account for nearly $60,000 of the financial aid department's budget, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

"This (fee) simply has been an important part of our operating budget," Viterna said. "And now, it will no longer be available, which is definitely going to have an effect on the processing of GSLs."

Viterna said the cut in the processing fee is a result of part of a reauthorization bill passed by Congress and signed Oct. 17 by President Reagan.

He said the bill will affect most colleges and universities in different ways.

Viterna said he knew of one school that paid the salary of a financial aid employee with the proceeds from the fee and two other schools that had been using the money to pay the wages of the people who processed the GSLs.

He said the financial aid department had planned to use the fee acquisitions to expand and improve upon its computer system, which would speed up the processing and distribution of GSL applications and checks.

In the past, the funds have been used to help improve the financial aid system and office, Viterna said.

Recent improvements included a personal computer, which was installed in the financial aid office. It offers students a special program to aid in the planning of repayment on loans and management of loan debt.

Struggles, rewards greet older students

By BARRY STEFFEN
Collegian Reporter

They are of a different generation and have varying perspectives. Often what they have experienced firsthand is only a lesson in a history book for their fellow students.

They are returning students, and their numbers are increasing.

Karla Crook, assistant director of the FENIX Program, said nearly 15 percent of all students enrolled at K-State last spring were 25 or older. Of these, 75 percent were enrolled full time, 33 percent were married, and most worked 20 to 40 hours a week.

Scholastically, 60 percent averaged at least 3.0 during the fall semester of 1985, compared to 35 percent of the 18- to 22-year-olds at K-State.

The FENIX Program, along with the Association of Adults Returning to School, are two groups that have been formed on campus to give support to older students.

The FENIX Program, with its office in Holton 101, acts as a resource and referral center for adult, undergraduate students 25 and over.

AARTS, which meets twice a week in the Union Stateroom, is a student support group that provides camaraderie and friendship for older students.

"We are open to everyone, particularly the non-traditional or older-than-average student," said Melvin Kroeger, president of AARTS and senior in electrical engineering.

Kroeger said the group tries to discuss topics of interest and invites speakers to attend meetings. Past topics have included family counseling, stress management, improving study skills and financial aid.

Lela Brown, freshman in business administration, is a student who has had to deal with the many complications of working toward a college education.

Brown is married, has two children and is a full-time student who commutes three days a week from Clay Center. She has quickly become acquainted with the problems that arise when college studies are incorporated into the everyday duties of family life.

"I'm going to do everything I can so my family can live a comfortable lifestyle," she said.

Brown spends about two hours a day on the road and squeezes 15 hours of classes into her three-day schedule. Add a 6-month-old baby, who has been sick part of the semester, and one will find a very busy woman.

"Time management is my biggest problem," she said.

Home, school and day-care costs are just a few of the other problems Brown and her husband have had to deal with since her enrollment.

"It's funny. We don't have enough money to qualify for a credit card, but we make too much to qualify for a Pell Grant," she said.

Brown's husband is a construction worker, and she sells flower arrangements for weddings and crafts to help make ends meet.

"My husband has really supported me and been in favor of the whole thing," she said of going to school. "But at times, it's hard for him to understand why I'm not always home to prepare dinner or see to the children's needs."

Brown said she had no idea what she was getting into when she enrolled at K-State. Many people told her the instructors didn't care, and there would be no way she could accomplish some of the tasks that would be asked of her. But she found out differently.

"Instructors are not here just for a paycheck," Brown said. "They're here to teach and they do care."

She also has had to overcome dyslexia, an impairment which affects the ability to read.

Because of the problem, she was put into learning-disability programs in high school and never had chemistry, biology and some of the difficult math classes she is now encountering.

Brown has trained herself to cope with the impairment. All of her assignments were tape recorded for her in high school, but now she is reading college-level material.

"I heard about a girl who was classified as retarded because of the problem (dyslexia), and now she's a doctor," Brown said.

"If I've learned anything since I've been here, it's that school is not going to be what everyone else says it is."

Despite the challenges, Brown is confident she will succeed.

"It's going to be a tough battle, but it's one I have to win," she said. "We've worked to hard to get me here and I can't afford to fail."

Honduran troops continue looking for Nicaraguan raiders

By The Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — Honduran troops, flown by U.S. helicopters, hunted for stragglers Monday of a Nicaraguan force that Honduran officers say crossed the border during the weekend and burned three deserted villages.

A military intelligence source said the troops also were acting as a guard against further incursions.

The source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said about 20 Honduran air force planes had bombed and strafed retreating Nicaraguans, who he said were pursued by three Honduran infantry battalions.

Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government denied that an incursion took place and claimed that warplanes from the Honduran side of the border bombed two villages inside Nicaragua, killing seven soldiers and wounding 11 people.

Honduras said that 18 of its soldiers were wounded in intense fighting in the border area over the weekend and that its troops inflicted undisclosed "heavy" casualties on a force of 700 Sandinista raiders.

U.S. Embassy and Honduran military sources, who spoke on condition that they not be identified for security reasons, said 14 U.S. helicopters ferried hundreds of Honduran troops to the border site on Sunday after the Nicaraguan force crossed into Honduras the day before.

The helicopters, all unarmed, provided transportation from Palmerola, an air base where U.S. forces are headquartered 30 miles northeast of Tegucigalpa, to an air strip called Jamastran, about 90 miles east of the capital, they said.

The Jamastran air strip is 30 miles from the border, in line with standing instructions to American troops to avoid possible clashes with the Nicaraguans.

Honduran officials said residents of about 40 villages fled to safety elsewhere when the Nicaraguan force penetrated 3 miles inside Honduras on Saturday and set fire to three deserted villages near the town of Cifuentes, about 70 miles east of Tegucigalpa. The villages, Mitingale, Buena Vista and La Esperanza, all were in El Paraiso province.

Capt. Carlos Quezada Aguilar, spokesman for Honduran armed forces, said heavy fighting raged Sunday around Cifuentes but subsided Monday morning as the Sandinistas began withdrawing to the Nicaraguan side of the border.

Independent confirmation of the battle accounts was not possible, since reporters were barred from the area.

Last weekend marked the second time this year that President Jose Azcona Hoyo asked President Reagan for military help to fend off purported Nicaraguan incursions along the border, where U.S.-backed Contra rebels maintain base camps in their fight against the Sandinista government.

The United States also provided military helicopter transportation for the Honduran army in March, when Honduras complained that a force of about 1,500 Sandinista troops crossed the border in pursuit of a Contra force.

Gen. John Galvin, commander of the Panama-based U.S. Southern Command, flew to Tegucigalpa on Sunday to supervise the latest airlift.

K-State professor dies after prolonged illness

By The Collegian Staff

Corwin A. Bennett, 57, professor of industrial engineering and resident of Manhattan, died Wednesday in a Wichita hospital.

Bennett, who had been at K-State since 1970, was teaching a class this summer when he had a mild stroke. He recovered temporarily but had been bedridden since then.

Bennett was active in engineering research for many years. He was a member of the American Psychologist Association; Human Factors Society, where he was chairman of the education committee in 1968 and 1969; Ergonomics Research Society; Illuminating Engineering Society; and Society of Engineering Psychologists. He was president of Northern Kansas Chapter of Illuminating Engineering Society in 1973 and was the new engineering education delegate in 1974 and 1975 for K-State to the American Association of Engineering Education.

Bennett was born May 20, 1929, in Des Moines, Iowa, the son of Corwin R. and Jean Arthur Bennett. He received a bachelor's degree in industrial psychology from Iowa State University at Ames in 1950. He also obtained a master's degree in 1951 and a doctorate in 1954 in experimental psychology from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln. He was a certified psychologist in the state of New York since 1958.

Bennett was named a Fellow of Human Factors Society in 1975 and a Fellow of Illuminating Engineering Society of North America in 1983. He also wrote many professional articles dealing with illumination — the art of adorning texts, pages or letters with decorations — and lighting.

Frank Tillman, head of the Department of Industrial Engineering, said Bennett was a real team player, was always willing to take on his load and didn't let his deteriorating health get in the way of his teaching.

"The students and faculty found him to be an inspiration, Tillman said. "He never complained (and) never asked for favors because of his illness. He simply went until he couldn't go anymore."

Bennett is survived by his wife, Beverly; three sons, C. Griggs Bennett of Dallas, D. Clark Bennett of Albany, Calif., and Kirk A. Bennett of Lincoln, Neb.; and a sister, Mrs. Frances Kopel of Cape Coral, Fla.

Services were held Saturday at Parkview Funeral Home, followed by cremation services.

Major problems face society in '87

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

As 1986 winds to a close and as we approach 1987, now is a good time to reflect on the issues of this year. In doing so, we find there are many questions yet to be answered. Phil Donahue will have a busy schedule trying to find the answers to all these questions. Two of these questions that he is certain to address are probably on everyone's mind at least once a day. Therefore, to end the curse of sleepless nights for many people, we must find their answers in 1987.

The first of my concerns is an issue of extreme importance to every person on Earth — another question about Col. Moammar Gadhafi and Libya. Although we found the answer to how his name is spelled this year, we are faced with another question that still needs to be answered.

The question for 1987 deals with the bombing of Libya by the United States last April. Many people are still arguing about whether this action was right or whether it curbed the spread of terrorism against Americans. But these trivial things aren't really that important compared to this still unanswered issue.

If you recall, in the wake of the U.S. bombing of Gadhafi and his home for alleged terrorist activities, his wife came to his defense proclaiming, "If I thought he was a terrorist, I would not stay with him and have children with him." However, in stating so, she may have let the cat out of the bag regarding her own personal activities.

Because her husband portrays himself as a terrorist by voicing support for acts of terrorism against the West and promising to spread his war against the United States by terrorizing the streets of America, it would not be improper to consider him a terrorist. Therefore, if his wife is telling the truth about not having children with a terrorist and with the colonel qualifying as a terrorist, then just who is the father of Mrs. Gadhafi's children?

Clearly, Mrs. Gadhafi was launching a disinformation campaign against someone (perhaps this is where President Reagan got the idea for his). But who? Was this directed toward her husband to hide that she had been occupying herself with hanky-panky while the colonel was rambling to the world about how much he hated the United States? Or was this disinformation campaign directed toward the United States to convince us of her husband's innocence? Or was it both? A soap opera indeed. Not only is the colonel's innocence in question, but so is his wife's.

Finding out who is the father of Mrs. Gadhafi's children will be a major task and many people will be asked, "Are you the father of Mrs. Gadhafi's children?" Certainly, we all will want to stay tuned as this drama unfolds and as one investigation leads to another. The whole world might get caught up in the action. Even Robert McFarlane, former national security adviser, might be asked if he had any layovers in Tripoli during his travels to Iran as an arms merchant. Surely, no one will be satisfied until this issue is resolved.

A question of local concern that needs to be addressed stems from a sign in the door at the Manhattan post office.

The sign points out that no pets are allowed in the building "except Seeing Eye dogs." In the interest of making this community a better place, certainly we should find out the usefulness of the part of this sign addressing Seeing Eye dogs.

Perhaps we should investigate the possibility of federal money being wasted here. After all, the part that reads, "except Seeing Eye dogs," serves no practical purpose. Someone using a Seeing Eye dog obviously can't see, so they're not going to know whether the sign is even there. As for the Seeing Eye dog: well, I sure don't know of any dogs that can read.

I'm sure we all can understand that if we are to go on leading normal lives, we must find the answers o these crucial questions. Issues such as arms sales to Iran and state budget cuts to the University are only small matters in respect to issues such as these. So please, join the effort to save the world and spend all of the holiday break contemplating the answers.

South Africa detains activists on apartheid

The latest attempt by the South African government to squelch the growing tide of anti-apartheid sentiment within its own borders is ironic. Instead of suppressing black voices, the government is detaining white, anti-apartheid activists.

Thirteen members of a group that has criticized the government's racist policies were arrested and held without charge late last week. Nearly 20 others were ordered to halt their participation in other groups critical of the government's discrimination policy.

The arrests and orders of nonparticipation reflect a realization by the South African government that its stated racist policy is generating fervent criticism. American corporations are pulling out, and there appears to be an even more united movement against apartheid within the country itself.

Interestingly, white dissidents are now more of a target than black protesters because the government is trying in vain to present a united front of white approval of its policies. Unfortunately, this futile effort has resulted in the government becoming even more oppressive than it once was.

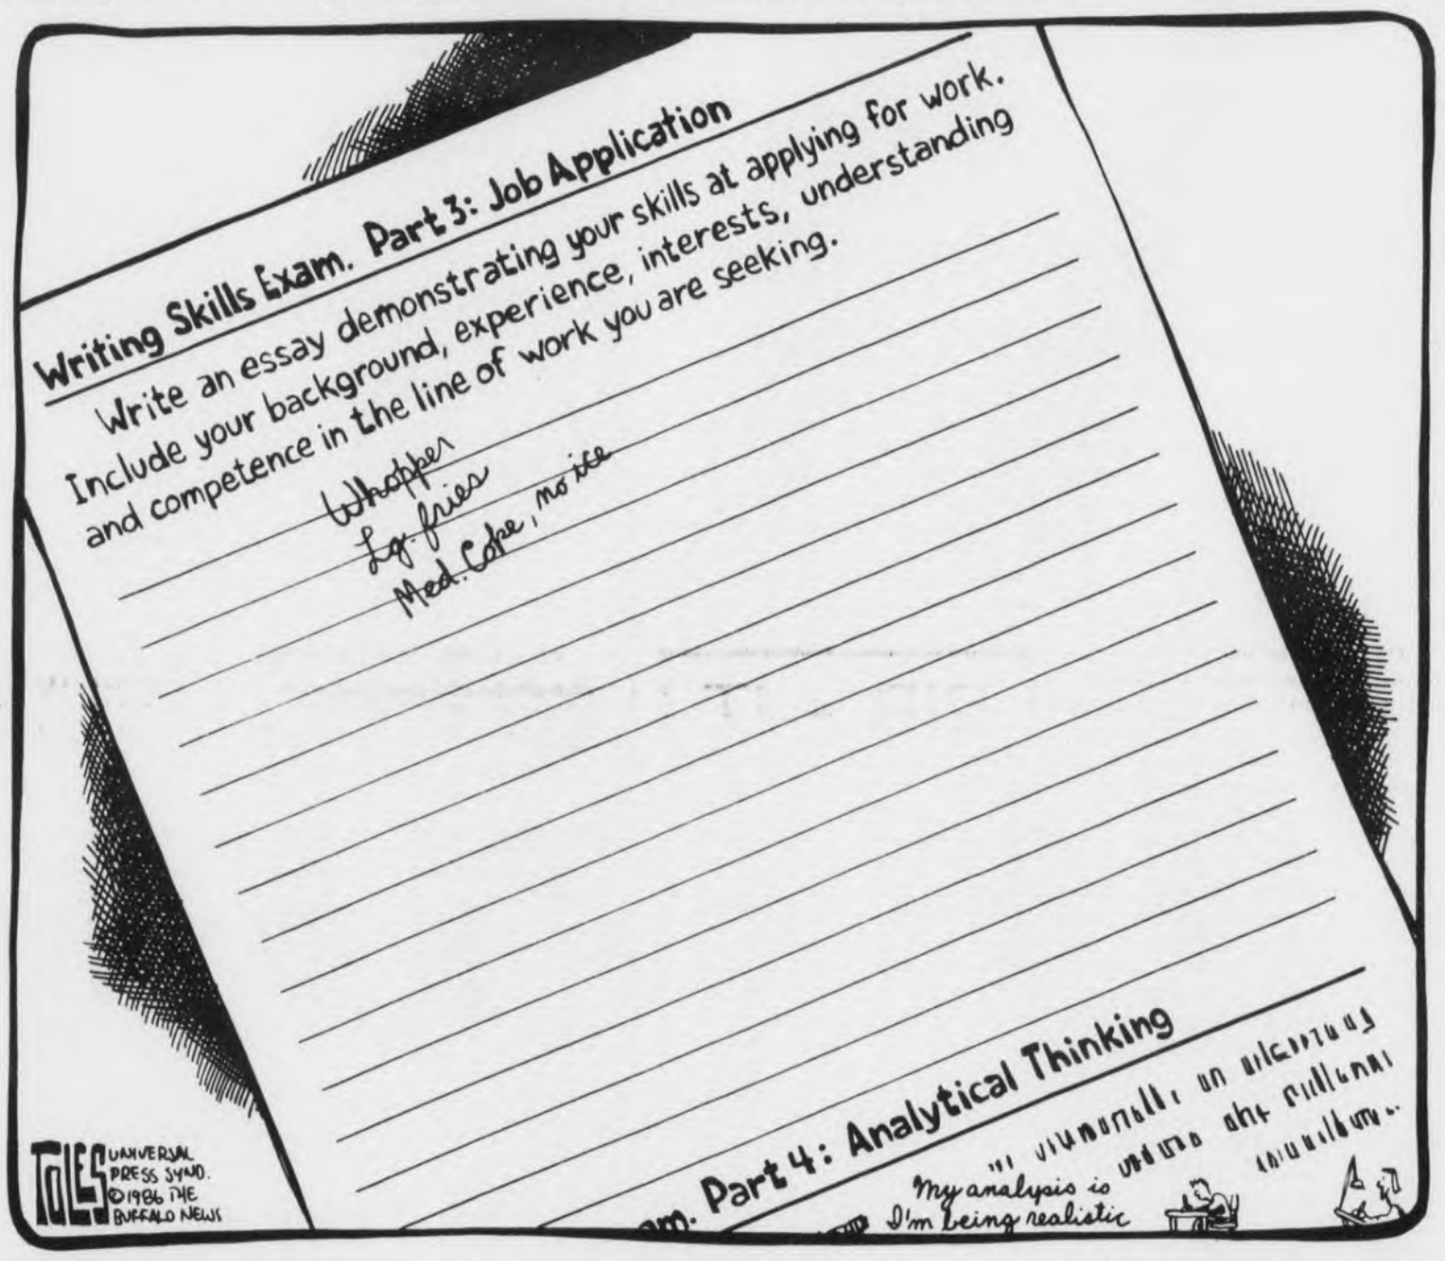
About 20,000 people — most of them blacks — have been detained since a nationwide state of emergency was imposed June 12.

Instead of the government bowing to pressure, it is resisting, and a bad situation is deteriorating even more. The South African government needs to read the writing on its oppressive wall: The international community has little tolerance for its actions and neither do its citizens.

If the government is at all rational, it will dispose of its ugly policies.

Rhodes scholars add prestige to University

For the fifth time in 13 years, the academic excellence of K-State students has been noted — the University has produced yet another Rhodes Scholar.



Kelly Welch, senior in economics and agricultural economics, Saturday was named a recipient of the $32,000 award, one of 11 regional and 32 national scholars.

The scholarship brings with it not only the prestige of the institution at which Welch will study (Oxford University in England) but also the recognition of the top education K-State students are receiving.

Much of the success of Rhodes applicants can be attributed to the work of Nancy Twiss, pre-law adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences and coordinator for the Rhodes and Marshall scholars committees. Twiss has been cited for her ability to prepare students for the competition and her knowledge about the scholarships and their qualifications.

Welch's appointment, in addition to those of his predecessors, will help the University in attracting top students and providing them with a quality education. Future students who look at our Rhodes record may be influenced by it enough to choose K-State for their education.

The students, faculty and staff should be proud of the students they are turning out and should strive to continue the K-State tradition of high-quality education. The University can take pride in its students — the concerned and informed citizens of tomorrow.

In defense of Johnson

Editor,

I would like to comment on the criticism received by Student Body President Steven Johnson resulting from his recent veto of the proposed Student Senate representation bill. Johnson has been labeled by sponsors of the bill and a member of this paper's editorial board as "undemocratic," "autocratic" and "insane" for his actions.

The criticisms of Johnson focus on the allegations that he denied the students their right to make a choice on the issue and that he offered no solutions of his own. It seems as though the supporters of the bill are pushing a proposal based on their own perceptions of what problems with the existing system might be and what the right solutions are. Instead of defending their reasons for submitting the bill as it is, they assault Johnson's character and integrity. His veto is an expression of his desire to see that the best proposal is presented to the students, who trust their elected representatives to give them just that.

The merits of change are not based on the rate at which it is made, but rather on the nature of the results that it brings about. The bill passed Senate by only three votes and an attempt to override the veto failed, which suggests that Johnson is not the only student leader who questions its suitability. How Johnson's decision can be autocratic when he was present for the Senate debate and consulted with his cabinet and Senate leaders before making any decision to veto escapes me. As a member of Johnson's cabinet, I can attest that his decision was arrived at after much discussion and input from many sources.

As to the criticism for not proposing his own solution to the problem at this time, such proposals would only have drawn further criticism for promoting Johnson's own alleged biases. His move was made not to influence the outcome of this issue, but to point out some key areas that need to be studied before a good solution to this problem can be formulated.

Cutting too deeply

Editor,

I appreciate K-State President Jon Wefald's efforts to cut campus spending to meet the budget cuts ordered by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden. However, we must be careful not to cut too deeply in areas that bring funds into the University, lest these income sources also dry up and blow away.

I refer specifically to research grants. If the faculty members responsible for attracting grant funds cannot adequately serve them because, for example, computer equipment is overheating from lack of air conditioning, the loss to the University will surely exceed the 2.3-percent savings from turning off the equipment. In my corner of Nichols, four of us do our research work late in the evenings because it is not possible to accomplish much before 5 p.m. Just the four of us are responsible for grants totalling more than the budget cuts mandated for the entire University. Is that what Wefald really wants, or are we merely pawns in his game with the state?

Medical system needs socialization

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

No one can argue against the fact that the rising cost of medical care in the United States is a major problem. In 1982, Americans spent a total of $287 billion on medical care, which equaled 10 percent of the total gross national product. By 1984, that figure had risen to $325 billion. This figures at an average of about $1,625 per person per year for medical care.

What is happening here? Why is the cost of medical care rising so fast? After all, we are in a low inflationary period. If this trend continues, we could end up paying more for medical care than anything else. The trend is caused by the vicious circle of the medical society, the insurance industry and the consumer. If one were to make a movie of this spectacle, it would probably be named "Dr. Frankenstein meets capitalism."

To get a better look at this vicious circle, we must go back in time. Believe it or not, a long time ago people used to pay for their medical care directly. There were no insurance companies, Medicare or Medicaid. Because people paid directly for medical care, doctors and hospitals had competitive prices.

Then came insurance. People started realizing that modern medicine could become a booming business. Insurance companies started springing up, capitalizing on the people's fear of not being able to afford necessary medical care. Now, about 90 percent of Americans have some sort of medical insurance.

This took the competitive aspects out of medicine. People stopped comparing prices because the insurance companies were footing the bill. When this happened, doctors and hospitals started raising their rates. These higher prices did not discourage people from seeking medical care, but more people started seeking medical help in situations when they would not have seen a doctor before the advent of insurance. Also, people are seeking the most expensive medical help because insurance pays for it. Having an expensive specialist is kind of like a yuppie status symbol.

Once medical prices started climbing, the insurance companies started raising their rates. The people were then forced to pay higher premiums, for there was no way they could pay the extremely high prices charged for medical care should they need it. They were locked into the system for life.

The once humanitarian nature of medicine has been replaced by the inhuman nature of big business. Hospitals have become corporations whose only goal is monetary gain. The family doctor has become the millionaire specialist. Albert Schweitzer has been replaced by Dr. Frankenstein.

What I am trying to say is free-market medicine cannot work. The cost of medical care will keep going up, far outstripping any improvements in the care itself. The medical establishment will always be more interested in profits than care, for this is what our economic system requires. Without the premise that people will always try to maximize profits and minimize labor, our capitalist economy would wither and die.

So what do we do? Getting rid of the insurance companies would be unthinkable. The medical prices would not fall immediately and we would be left with a medical system only for the very rich. Trying to put price limits on medical care would be a disaster because black-market medicine would be discovered by greedy doctors looking for a fast quarter of a million dollars (the average salary of doctors in the United States).

Let's face it. Medicine is too important to be left to the whims of the free market. It is a necessary social service. What we need is a government-controlled medical system, one that all citizens can use free of charge. This kind of system is commonly called socialized medicine.

The arguments against socialized medicine are that the quality of care goes down and the expense goes up. But after looking at several examples of countries with socialized medicine, these arguments against actually turn into reasons for socialized medicine.

No one can argue with the quality of care under socialized medicine. A usual standard of measure for a country's health care is the infant mortality rate. The United States ranks 14th in the world for lowest infant mortality. No. 1 on the list is Sweden, a country with socialized medicine. Other countries that rank better than the United States in this vital statistic are the Soviet Union, East and West Germany, France and Canada. In fact, nearly all of the countries with lower infant mortality rates than the United States have some sort of socialized medicine.

As for the cost of socialized medicine, the facts really surprised me. I thought that even if it was expensive, it would be justified because of its human benefits. But after talking to students from Canada and Great Britian, I started looking into the costs associated with socialized medicine. I found that while Americans spend around 12 percent of the current gross national product on medical care, Canada spends about 8 percent of its gross national product on a free medical care system. In fact, we spend more on medical care per person than any place in the world.

Socialized medicine is better and cheaper than this unworkable medicine-for-profit system that exists in America. The United States needs to adopt socialized medicine before the old one completely breaks down. Socialized medicine will inject a dose of humanity into this inhuman society.

Group's effort contributed to coliseum

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

Editor's Note: With the groundbreaking of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, the persistence of four University alumni while they were students has resulted in the actualization of the $15.4-million project. This article, the first of two, focuses on two of the four men who were instrumental in the beginning stages of the coliseum.

The origins of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum began in 1978 with a group of students known as the "Advocates for the New Arena."

Bill Manning, 1980 graduate in accounting, Mitch Holthus, 1979 graduate in journalism and mass communications and 1980 graduate in business administration, Sam Brownback, then student body president and 1979 graduate in agricultural economics, and Brian Rassette, 1980 graduate in marketing, comprised the students that made up the committee.

Manning may have been the last of the four to join the committee, but he soon became spokesman for the group.

"I had heard about the committee. I liked the idea to build the new arena. So I decided to jump in there and help," Manning said in a telephone interview from his home in Wichita.

Manning said the four spoke to every living group on campus and many off-campus students. They also spoke to many social and civic groups, including the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

The four determined that to make the idea a reality would require a referendum vote by the entire student body and to drum up enough interest and draw enough voters to the polls. In the end, they would have to tell their story approximately 160 times.

Tell it they did. Each of the four gave about 40 solo performances of about 1 to 1½ hours each, Manning said.

"The response to our 'ad hoc' speakers' bureau was overwhelming," he said. "The audiences were very open-minded about it. The attendance was 100 percent on some floors in the dorms.

"Brian (Rassette) checked himself into the hospital the day after the elections. He was exhausted. Of course, Brian was always right in the middle of the controversy.

"It was a tremendous time in our lives. Actually, the rest of my time in school was a letdown by comparison."

Manning said the rules for student elections required a two-thirds majority vote on an issue if less than 5,000 people voted. A simple majority carried an issue if 5,000 or more cast ballots.

"People were wary, at that time, of politicians and the political process in general," Manning said. "The Watergate scandal was still being discussed. The Student Governing Association 'funds scandal' was still a hot issue.

"The 'scandal' was over the fact that SGA funds were used to purchase slide pictures of other coliseums and arenas in the Big Eight for our presentations, yet SGA was supposed to be neutral on the issue."

Because sales of season tickets accounted for all of the seats allotted to students at the time, he speculated that a great many other people would like to attend an occasional basketball game, but could not get tickets.

"The burning question at that time was, 'Would we get enough voter turnout to make it pass?' Well, the arena issue passed by a margin of three to one. That's something I guess none of us will ever forget," Manning said.

Manning has since finished a law degree and is working as a lobbyist for the Kansas Republican Party.

Holthus, known as the "Voice of the Wildcats" on WIBW radio in Topeka, also was instrumental in the push for the coliseum.

"It's certainly satisfying to know that after eight years, we are finally beginning to see the fruits of our work," Holthus said. "This is the culmination of a lot of work."

When they started trying to sell the idea of a new sports arena, the four found it would be necessary to sell it to the entire student body. The only chance they had of convincing the Kansas Board of Regents and the Kansas Legislature to fund the project was to get the whole student body and the alumni behind it, Holthus said.

"KSU basketball gets support compared to how well it maintains its winning trend," Holthus said, referring to K-State's winning streak in the Big Eight Conference in the '70s.

"If a school can't attract new talent for its teams and compete with other schools for the best players, it won't continue to win. That's all there is to it," he said.

Holthus said it became obvious to them that a newer plan was needed. Good players don't want to come to a school that has an old, substandard arena, because they won't get enough exposure to be noticed. Ahearn was built in 1951. By 1978, it was substandard, Holthus said.

"We tried to convince people to look ahead a bit — to take the initiative. We wanted to create some excitement about the idea," he said. "Brian Rassette saw to that. He had a knack for playing up controversy and excitement.

"Brian, Sam, Bill and I went out, individually, to speak to any group that would listen to us. We must have talked to every group on campus, and practically every group in Manhattan."

Their speeches centered around a comparison study of arenas in the Big Eight. Iowa State had built a basketball arena in 1970, the University of Kansas had renovated theirs and Nebraska and Oklahoma had recently built new facilities, Holthus said.

"When it comes to staging a concert, McCain is fine but it's not big enough to accommodate the large audiences that some groups can attract. Ahearn is big enough but the acoustics are terrible. If we don't have a facility that can seat 30,000 in comfort and with good acoustics, a lot of performers just won't come," Holthus said.

Holthus recalls shows put on in Ahearn by big names like Bob Hope and Red Skelton. A summer evening in a building packed full of people but without air conditioning can be "pretty grim," Holthus said.

Holthus was chairman of "Advocates for a New Arena," the group that promoted the project. After talking to the Legislature, the group found that the chances for state funding were slim, and the main focus of the committee turned to finding alternative funding, Holthus said.

Holthus also said the legislators were scared about building new buildings when enrollment was expected to go down, and the decline already had started.

"The fact that funding was found for the coliseum is a tribute to the hard work and dedication of many people over the years. It's rare for a state university to build a facility without state dollars," Holthus said.

Post office prepares to receive Santa mail

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

Although the bells of Christmas aren't ringing yet, Manhattan post office officials are preparing for the many letters they will receive this year addressed to Santa Claus.

Every year during December, the post office receives scores of letters addressed to the North Pole. Marvin Roth, postmaster, said that in the past, the letters were either distributed to local civic groups, published in local newspapers or sent directly to the Topeka post office.

This year, the Manhattan post office, in conjunction with the United Way Volunteer Clearinghouse, will answer the letters addressed to Santa.

"The organization is committed to promoting volunteerism within the community," said Lynda Spire, program coordinator of Volunteer Clearinghouse.

"What we do is match volunteers with organizations that need help in certain things," she said. "People will call in and tell us they would like to volunteer for something. Then we will match the person with an organization that best suits their capabilities.

"Basically, we are a clearinghouse for volunteers."

The organization is sponsoring a "Santa's Helper" project for the Christmas season. Spire said Roth will give the children's letters to Volunteer Clearinghouse.

The organization is searching for about 100 volunteer Santas to answer the letters that will be received, she said. Many volunteers already have come forward.

The organization already has volunteer Santas from various backgrounds in the Manhattan community. Spire said the volunteers include postal workers, business merchants, K-State faculty and some professors that have retired.

These volunteers will have specific guidelines to follow.

"We want to make sure the Santas won't promise the children anything that can't be kept," Spire said.

To ensure the project will be successful, the organization will publicize Santa Claus locations.

"At this point, we are still ironing out the details for this project," Spire said.

"The benefits will be twofold," she said. "I think it would be a very exciting part of the child's holiday season to receive a personal note from Santa. However, the benefits for the volunteer Santas may be even more valuable, because what can be more rewarding than to make a child happy?"

Library adopts limited hours during Christmas holiday

By The Collegian Staff

Farrell Library will be open for a limited time during the Christmas vacation despite efforts to reduce energy costs by shutting down University buildings over the break.

The library will be open on Dec. 29, 30, 31 and Jan. 2. It will be closed on the remaining days of the vacation, said Brice Hobrock, dean of the library.

"This is a period in which the faculty and many graduate students use the library to catch up on research, and this is very important," Hobrock said.

At this time, there will be two staff members and three students employed at the library to provide security and circulation.

Hobrock said the library will provide service on an "access-only" basis in the circulation department during the break.

Library hours during vacation will be 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Current trends show big businesses are becoming more visible in college athletics as corporations contribute money by sponsoring teams and players, including those in the Big Eight Conference.

Sponsors aid athletics in collegiate programs

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the first of a three-part series titled "Corporate Sponsorships in College Athletics." The series will run through Thursday on the sports page.

Major college athletic programs have long been considered as big business, but current trends show big businesses are becoming more visible in college athletics through corporate sponsorships.

It's good news for athletic coffers such as K-State's, which ranks last in the Big Eight Conference.

"It means that money Kansas State would have had to spend to run...a tournament or something like that, it's money that we get to hold on to," Administrative Assistant Kenny Mossman said. "When you consider that, budgetwise, our athletic department is eighth in a conference of eight, that's obviously more important to us than anybody else in the conference."

Sponsorship fever has even hit the Big Eight Conference, which is pursuing a sponsor for its men's basketball program.

"We're certainly doing that," said Big Eight Assistant Commissioner Bill Hancock. "It probably won't become a reality during this season. We're looking more at next season, but this season is still a possibility."

Hancock said the conference is not presently negotiating with any corporation, but "the word is out on the street that we're looking for a sponsor." He also said a couple of syndicates have expressed interest in the proposal.

At K-State, Athletic Director Larry Travis said corporations are more involved with assistance — such as purchasing scoreboard or program advertising — and not total sponsorship.

"You could always use more influx of revenues," Travis said. "If you could have a leading sponsor for KSU football and they would pay you a million dollars to do that, it would be great. But we don't have anything like that right now, and I don't know of any schools in the country that do. Maybe it will be a thing of the future."

Currently, the most visible example of corporate sponsorships is with college football's bowl games.

Corporate $ponsorship$ in College Athletic$

With many bowls, such as the Sunkist/Fiesta Bowl, taking on the name of sponsors and with the additional revenues generated by these sponsors, the so-called minor bowls are able to successfully bid for big-name teams, such as the Fiesta Bowl landing Miami and Penn State for a national championship showdown Jan. 2.

Post-season college football bowls are the most perceptible example of the marriage between athletic events and corporate sponsors. Some of these games now recognize titles such as the Sunkist/Fiesta Bowl, the John Hancock/Sun Bowl and the Sea World/Holiday Bowl.

After repeatedly losing the television ratings race to the Orange Bowl and losing advertising revenue in the process, the Sugar Bowl became the first major New Year's Day bowl game to accept a corporate sponsorship.

And with the intervention of sponsors in collegiate athletic programs, there is the possibility that corporations could fund non-revenue sports such as tennis or cross country.

Monte Johnson, athletic director at the University of Kansas, said KU's sports budget is largely dependent on the generosity of several corporate sponsors.

"We've just done a very large amount of (seeking corporate sponsors) because, in a way, it becomes the marketing budget for a college program," Johnson said. "Very few of us have the luxury of unlimited resources for marketing."

Of course, there are critics — the "be true to your school" crowd — who say corporate sponsors ruin an image. Travis and Mossman said they didn't believe sponsorships presented that sort of problem.

"I don't think you're ever going to lose that 'personal touch,'" Travis said.

Johnson said KU officials attempt to avoid image problems from the onset.

"In all cases, we try to work it out so it's a quality sponsor that benefits from being involved in college athletics and hopefully (is) not too controversial," Johnson said.

Neither K-State nor Kansas' athletic director predicted that corporate sponsors would assume total control of specific collegiate athletic programs.

"The situation there is that I'm not sure you're ever going to be able to get those kind of sponsorships to underwrite a whole program — especially in some of the non-revenue sports," Travis said. "I don't look for corporate sponsors to come in and say 'we're going to take care of your whole basketball program.' I don't think you're going to see that."

But, as Johnson admitted, ideas often change with time.

"A few years ago you didn't think that there'd be that many corporate sponsors involved in the way that they are today," Johnson said. "So I'd hesitate to say that those things are totally out of the question."

Wednesday's installment in this series deals with corporate sponsors and their influence on college football bowl games.

Unbeaten Wildcats, Creighton to battle

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Look out, Big Eight Conference opponents. Here come the Creighton Bluejays.

Creighton, 2-0, will attempt to win its third straight game against Big Eight foes when the Bluejays tangle with K-State tonight in Ahearn Field House in a battle of undefeated teams.

The Bluejays already have defeated Iowa State (80-65) and Nebraska (78-66) in their first two games. Both victories occurred on Creighton's home floor.

K-State, 4-0, will attempt to maintain its position as the only unbeaten team in the conference. The Wildcats are coming off a tough 98-83 victory over Southwest Texas State Saturday night.

"I know (Creighton is) a very good ballclub," said Wildcat head coach Lon Kruger. "They're 2-0 against the Big Eight. Hopefully, we can do something to step up there and change their momentum."

Tip-off for tonight's game is at 8:05. The game will be aired locally on KSN-TV, Channel 27.

Kruger compared Creighton to Texas Tech, a team the Wildcats defeated by one point, 73-72, the third game of the season.

"This ballclub is very similar to Texas Tech — both are hard-nosed and well-organized. They lean toward being more patient offensively, and they play good, sound man-to-man defense," he said.

Creighton is coached by Tony Barone, in his second year at the school. Barone's squad finished in a tie for fifth place in the Missouri Valley Conference last year and finished 12-16 overall.

The Bluejays this season are paced by a pair of 6-foot-4 senior forwards. Gary Swain, Creighton's leading rebounder, is scoring 21 points a game, while Kenny Evans averages 14 per outing. Freshman guard Matt Roggenburk adds 15 points a game to the Bluejays' attack.

While he expressed concern about those players, Kruger said the Bluejays possess tremendous depth.

"They've got a group of pretty good ballplayers...Right down the line they run some real solid, tough kids at you, and they do an excellent job of executing," he said.

As for the 'Cats, Kruger said they must improve defensively to counter Creighton's potent offense.

"We're really disappointed in that aspect of our game," Kruger said after Saturday's contest. "We're playing hard and flying around, but we're not really sliding our feet and playing very solid (defense)."

Kruger did say he is more pleased with the team's performance on the offensive end of the court, where K-State averages almost 90 points per contest. Forward Mitch Richmond leads the way with an average of 21 points per game, while guard William Scott averages 18 a contest.

Richmond and Scott, along with the rest of the 'Cat offense, have used the newly installed three-point line to their advantage in the early season.

As a team, K-State is shooting nearly 46 percent from long range — the same as their overall percentage — while limiting opponents to less than 30 percent from beyond the 19-9 mark.

Third-ranked Purdue shocks Wichita, 77-62

By The Associated Press

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. — Sophomore center Melvin McCants keyed the scoring streak that gave Purdue the lead for good and finished with 20 points as the third-ranked Boilermakers beat Wichita State 77-61 Monday night in non-conference college basketball.

Wichita State took a 2-0 lead, but Purdue, undefeated in four games, came back with nine straight points, including two field goals by McCants.

A second spurt, in which Purdue outscored the Shockers 9-2, was capped by Doug Lee's layup that put the Boilermakers up 20-12 with 9:58 remaining in the opening half. Finally, Purdue had another run, 17-9, to go up 39-23 on Troy Lewis' 18-footer with 3:30 left before halftime.

Purdue led 42-30 at halftime, and the closest Wichita State could get was, 51-40, when Joe Griffin hit a three-point goal with 14 minutes remaining. The Boilermakers stretched their lead to 70-48 on a McCants free throw with 5:09 left in the game.

Everette Stephens scored 15 points for Purdue and Doug Lee added 10.

Race for NFL's 10 playoff positions moves into final weeks

By The Associated Press

The race for the NFL's 10 playoff spots moved into its final two weeks Monday with the AFC in a mad scramble that could go down to the final game of the season.

Kansas City's 37-10 upset of Denver and Cincinnati's 31-7 win over New England Sunday meant no new teams were added to the three that had already clinched playoff berths — the Chicago Bears, New York Giants and Washington Redskins.

But the Giants' 24-14 victory over the Redskins moved them a small step away from the NFC East title and the Los Angeles Rams 29-10 win over Dallas left them equally close to the NFC West championship. The Rams' triumph also left the Cowboys near elimination.

Denver remained on the verge of the AFC West title — a win by Seattle over the Los Angeles Raiders Monday night would clinch it for the Broncos.

The Indianapolis Colts, meanwhile, may have jeopardized their shot at Heisman Trophy winner Vinny Testaverde by beating Atlanta 28-23. That left them at 1-13 to 2-12 for Tampa Bay with a decent shot at another win this week at home against Buffalo.

If Indianapolis and Tampa Bay tied for the worst record in the league at 2-14, the first pick would go to the team with the easier schedule. Tampa Bay's opponents are currently 73-78-3 to 86-79-2 for Indianapolis, giving the Bucs the edge for Testaverde in the event of a tie.

As for playoff berths, here's the way the conferences break down:

AFC

New England and the New York Jets, both losers Sunday, remain tied for the lead in the East at 10-4. The Jets can clinch a wild-card berth with one more win — either at home Saturday against Pittsburgh or the following week in Cincinnati. The Patriots, who are at home to San Francisco and at Miami on the final Monday minght could clinch a wild card with a win and a loss by either the Raiders and Cincinnati..

Miami, 7-7, needed an unlikely combination of circumstances to avoid missing the playoffs for the first time since 1980.

If the Patriots and Jets each win their final two games, New England would win the division title.

Call earns nomination to regional v-ball team

By The Collegian Staff

K-State volleyball player Shawnee Call was named by the Collegiate Volleyball Coaches Association to its Midwest all-region team Monday.

Call was the only sophomore named to the 12-player squad.

"It's just one of the many honors she has received this season," K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson said.

"She has only played two seasons at K-State, and it surprised me that many coaches in the Midwest were aware of her abilities."

Earlier this year, Call was named the most outstanding player of the Pepsi/KSU Invitational and also was selected to all-tournament teams in five of the six tourneys K-State played in this season.

Call also was named a first-team, All-Big Eight choice, making her the third Wildcat player in two years to receive such honors.

In addition to Call, five Big Eight athletes were selected for the team. Nebraska's Karen Dahlgren, Tisha Delaney and Enid Schonewise, in addition to Kansas' Catalina Suarez and Iowa State's Linda Evans, qualified for the team.

Other players named to the team were Southwest Missouri State's Kathy Crotty and Mindy Struckhoff, Iowa's Kathy Griesheim and Ellen Mullarkey, Northwestern's Janine Makar and Southern Illinois' Pat Nicholson.

Call led the Big Eight this year in offensive kills and finished second to Suarez in total defensive digs.

"This speaks very well for the conference and Kansas State," Nelson said. "It's a great honor for Kansas State. We didn't have a good year, and most times players that play on below .500 teams don't get the notoriety they might deserve despite having good years."

Nelson said Call, even as a freshman, played consistent in all matches. This year, he said, Call has elevated her level of play and is "consistently performing at a higher and higher level each year."

K-State to meet UNC during holiday break

By The Collegian Staff

Christmas will come two days late for first-year head basketball coach Lon Kruger if his Wildcats could pull off an upset of nationally ranked North Carolina.

Tickets went on sale Monday for the K-State-North Carolina game Dec. 27 at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

North Carolina, ranked No. 1 in The Associated Press' preseason and first regular-season polls, is ranked fifth in this week's poll after going 2-1 last week.

"North Carolina has been one of the dominant programs in college basketball over the last two decades, and obviously, it will be a very difficult test," Kruger said.

The Tar Heels, 4-1, lost 89-84 to UCLA last week before stomping Stetson 100-64 and Miami of Fla. 122-77. Dean Smith, in his 25th year as the head coach at UNC, is 579-171 overall.

"(North Carolina has) a lot of big, strong, smart athletes that take a lot of pride in their tradition," Kruger said. "Coach Smith is also highly respected, so there are many reasons were concerned."

Before facing UNC, K-State has games with Creighton, Abilene Christian, Wichita State and will play in the Music City Invitational at Nashville, Tenn., along with Illinois State, Tennessee Tech and Vanderbilt.

North Carolina, a member of the always-tough Atlantic Coast Conference, will meet Jacksonville, Illinois and Furman before tangling with the 'Cats.

Tickets are $8 for lower-level seats and $6 for upper-level seats. K-State student season-ticket holders can purchase tickets for $4 apiece.

UNLV garners top spot in AP's basketball poll

By The Associated Press

Nevada-Las Vegas took over the No. 1 spot in The Associated Press college basketball poll Monday as previously top-ranked North Carolina fell to fifth, behind three teams from the Big Ten.

The Runnin' Rebels, 5-0, moved up from last week's No. 2 ranking with 39 first-place votes and 1,236 points from the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters. UNLV's only game last week was an 80-77 victory at Memphis State.

The last time Nevada-Las Vegas held the No. 1 ranking was in February 1983. However, that lasted just one week as the Runnin' Rebels, then 24-0, lost road games at Fullerton State and West Virginia.

Nevada-Las Vegas' next game will be Saturday at Nevada-Reno.

Indiana is second with 14 first-place votes and 1,144 points, followed by Purdue, seven first-place votes and 1,126 points, and Iowa, which had 1,029 points.

Indiana, 3-0, beat Notre Dame and then-No. 13 Kentucky last week, while Purdue, 3-0, registered victories over Illinois State and Connecticut. Iowa beat Missouri-St. Louis before winning the Amana-Hawkeye Classic, which it hosts.

North Carolina, 4-1, fell from the top spot it held in the preseason and first regular-season poll as it won two of three games last week. The Tar Heels, who had one first-place vote and 1,012 points, lost 89-84 at UCLA before posting home victories over Stetson, 100-64, and Miami, Fla., 122-77.

Illinois, the fourth Big Ten team in the top six, jumped from last week's No. 9 ranking with a 99-97 road victory over then-No. 12 Pittsburgh. The Fighting Illini, 4-0, had one first-place vote and 857 points.

Rounding out the Top Ten were Auburn, which also received one first-place vote and 779 points; Western Kentucky, 663 points; Oklahoma, 627 points; and Navy, 547 points.

Regents

stitutions have been brought into the regents' retirement annuity plan immediately upon being hired.

Those 406 new employees did not wait the required two years and Williams said most had a valid reason for immediate participation — such as transfering from another state where they had a valid retirement contract.

However, Williams said about one-third of that group had entered the plan prematurely. Those employees had not been enrolled in a valid retirement plan at another school, according to the audit. And others unfairly had part-time work or student employment credited toward their retirement participation.

"These two groups of employees' immediate membership in a retirement annuity plan may not have met the original intent of the law," the audit concluded. "The state is incurring an annual cost of about $250,000 to pick up these employees' retirement contributions."

Specifically, the audit found 23 employees who did not meet any of the legal requirements and, Willaims said, the state is contributing nearly $76,000 more than it should have to their retirements.

Another 126 obtained an annuity contract just prior to starting work at a Kansas university and Miller said they were "coached" by school officials during recruitment that by doing so, they could gain immediate participation in the retirement program. Although it's not a clear violation of law, Miller said the practice violates legislative intent.

Only Pittsburg State University, and the Kansas Technical Institute in Salina, did not have any employees who fell into this category.

Miller said he expects the 1987 Legislature to address the question and clarify any misconceptions about the retirement policy. And he said he expects the Legislature will require the schools to make reimbursement rather than requiring the employees to repay the state.

wrinkle to the unraveling scandal as he revealed during his appearance that former White House officials and John Kelly, the U.S. ambassador to Lebanon, secretly discussed negotiations aimed at freeing Americans held hostage in Lebanon, without either party notifying the State Department of the consultations.

"I am, to put it mildly, shocked to learn this," Shultz said of the consultations behind his back.

Rep. Dante B. Fascell, D-Fla., the Foreign Affairs chairman, told reporters after Shultz appeared that the secretary had "obviously treaded a very difficult line," trying to balance his support for the president with his respect for the law and his relationship with Congress.

Reagan demonstrated his determination to pursue his Central American policy as he approved the use of U.S. helicopters over the weekend to carry Honduran troops to a border battle with Nicaraugan forces. Speakes said Monday that the airlift has been completed and the fighting has subsided.

semester is in any jeopardy," he said.

The College of Architecture is not reducing personnel positions, said Mark Lapping, dean of the college.

"At this time, no personnel positions have been cut," Lapping said. "Basically, we were able to find our cuts in operating expenses, so we did not have to discontinue any personnel."

James Coffman, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said that although no staff members were dismissed, a number of positions vacated or left open last semester will not be filled in the spring.

Coffman said the college still will suffer "because we're already short of manpower."

Lapping said he was not instructed to make any personnel cuts.

"If there are instructions like that around, I don't want to know about them," he said.

Rathbone said his orders were to try to not hurt instructional programs and salaries.

"The bottom line is that each college is responsible for how they handle the cuts," he said.

All colleges took major cuts in operating costs.

"Our operating expenses are being cut severely," Rathbone said. "We're getting clobbered."

Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, agreed.

"That's where we had to take the major part of the cut," Stowe said of operating expenses. "Through other budget cuts that have been sustained by this college, we had very little flexibility."

If these cuts continue, she said, the hotel and restaurant management program with the University Inn could be hindered. Because the Kansas Board of Regents has not yet met to approve the new program, Stowe said the college would not feel the consequences until next fall.

Other areas in which reductions have been instituted in human ecology are faculty travel and telephone calls. "These are tough times," Stowe said.

Woods said decreased travel funds for field trips in the College of Agriculture will result in fewer learning opportunities for students.

"It will be extremely difficult to maintain the quality and diversity in our instructional program," he said.

Stamey said one of his biggest concerns is the availability of class supplies, citing computers and microscopes as examples. If one breaks down, he said, students will just have to share or do without.

For Chris Fahrenholz, temporary assistant chemistry instructor who will not be rehired, the concern is in how she will continue to help support her son and husband. Her husband, Charles, is a graduate student in grain science.

"This is quite a horror for me," she said. "I thought perhaps I'd get a cut in salary, but never dreamed I'd lose my job." Fahrenholz said she has held the position for 2½ years, including summer semesters.

moratorium on farm foreclosures in the state.

"What would happen if we did allow corporations to come into the state of Kansas and operate (without limits) in the area of pork and poultry?" he said as an example. "What would that do to our current producers? What would that do to outsiders?

"We need to develop the factual basis, not politically saying this should be done and that should be done, but develop the factual basis of this is what will happen."

In view of the ties between food processing and production agriculture, Brownback also has set the industry of food processing as a high priority.

"We have meetings set up with food processors, trying to encourage their expansion and retention in the state of Kansas," he said. "Food processing is a very good possibile strength area for agriculture, its jobs and its local markets for our produce."

Brownback said that during his first six weeks on the job, he has been "real heartened by the way people are willing to address issues now and not just stand on tradition."

"We have got to seek out other areas and avenues in agriculture," he said. "Innovation is the byline."

Brownback said that although he has enjoyed meeting people and representing agriculture in Kansas, he does miss his previous job as Cooperative Extension specialist in agricultural law.

"I miss the students at K-State and the Extension work," he said, "but this job was too much of a challenge (to pass up)."

Poll reveals bookstore pays best text buy-back prices

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State Union Bookstore pays more for used textbooks than the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Fort Hays State University.

These are the results after polling Steve Jewett, textbook coordinator of KU; Jack Gilette, textbook supervisor of WSU; and Steve Gonzales, bookstore manager of Fort Hays State campus bookstores. The bookstores were asked when professors have to turn in their book orders to the bookstore; when the bookstore turns in the book orders to the publishers; how much the bookstore marks up new books; how much they buy back used books for, and how much they sell used books for.

The four bookstores vary in the amount they pay for used books.

Fort Hays State pays 50 percent of what the student bought the book for, whether the book was new or used when the student bought it, Gonzales said.

KU and WSU pay 50 percent of the current new book price, even if the book was bought used.

K-State pays 60 percent of the publisher's list price (new book price) for books that professors will use again, said Jerry Fields, book department manager of K-State Union Bookstore.

Professors in all four universities are supposed to turn in their book orders to the bookstore in April for the fall semester and in October for the spring semester. Each bookstore gives the professors specific deadlines each semester. These dates give the publishers' representatives time to introduce new textbooks to the professors and allows the bookstores time to contact vendors to buy as many used textbooks as possible.

The bookstores turn in their book orders to the publishers in June for the fall semester and in November for the spring semester. When teachers turn in book orders late, change their order, or if the books are not available, students have a delay in getting their books at the semester start.

All four bookstores mark up new books 20 percent to 25 percent of wholesale. The increase is to pay for overhead and freight expenses.

The four bookstores do not buy back books the professors will not use again. Vendors buy these books to sell to other schools which will continue to use the book. The prices paid to the students for these books are determined by the vendor in accordance with the amount of books he has in inventory and the demand he or she foresees for the book.

KU, WSU and K-State, charge 75 percent of new book price for used books when selling them to the students. The mark-up varies from book to book at Fort Hays State.

Wefald to see eviction case's closing appeal

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

In the last month, John Torres, a 17-year-old freshman in commercial art, has been dismissed from Marlatt Hall by the hall judicial board, reinstated by a higher judicial board (the Tribunal), only to have that decision appealed by the housing department. Now the final decision of Torres' status rests in the hands of University President Jon Wefald.

Torres said he can't understand why the Department of Housing is taking steps to evict him from the residence halls.

"I don't know why it's so important that they (housing department officials) want me to get kicked out," Torres said.

"We have appealed that particular decision because we feel the Tribunal does not understand all the ramifications of keeping that individual in the residence halls," said Thomas Frith, director of the housing department. "Maybe the Tribunal did not give enough consideration to certain things and too much consideration on other things."

> 'I don't know why it's so important that they want me to get kicked out.'
> — John Torres

Problems started for Torres when the 13-member Marlatt Hall Judicial Board, headed by Chief Justice Jeff Fetter, senior in electrical engineering, convicted Torres Nov. 6 for violating University Honor Codes 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6. In addition, Torres was charged with violating state liquor laws and hall policy because he is a minor.

He said he was accused by Rick Darnell, junior in radio and television and first-floor staff member at Marlatt Hall, of having alcohol in his punch.

"If I had alcohol in my drink, I would have given it up," Torres said. "I don't like the fact that they were trying to bust me for nothing."

Torres said he has had several run-ins with Dale Stegman, junior in electrical engineering and Marlatt Hall resident staff assistant, including an incident on the night of the Aggieville melee following K-State's 29-12 victory over KU. That incident resulted in his being written up for the honor code violations. Torres was accused of making physically threatening remarks to Stegman.

Violating honor codes can result in disciplinary action initiated against the person, according to SGA bylaws.

Honor code 5 states, "No acts reflecting adversely on Kansas State University, or acts which are detrimental to the public, are committed."

In addition, honor code 6 states, in reference to a student's conduct, "The rights of fellow students are respected."

However, Torres said all charges were ill-founded.

Throughout the incident, Torres has denied wrongdoing on any of the charges. He said he was especially upset with how the hall judicial board handled his case.

"They did not seem worried about giving me a fair shot at all," Torres said. "At the board meeting, one (member) had his head on the table and others were spacing off."

"I think they knew the verdict before I was tried," he said.

Chief Justice Fetter disagreed with the allegations that Torres made against the judicial board.

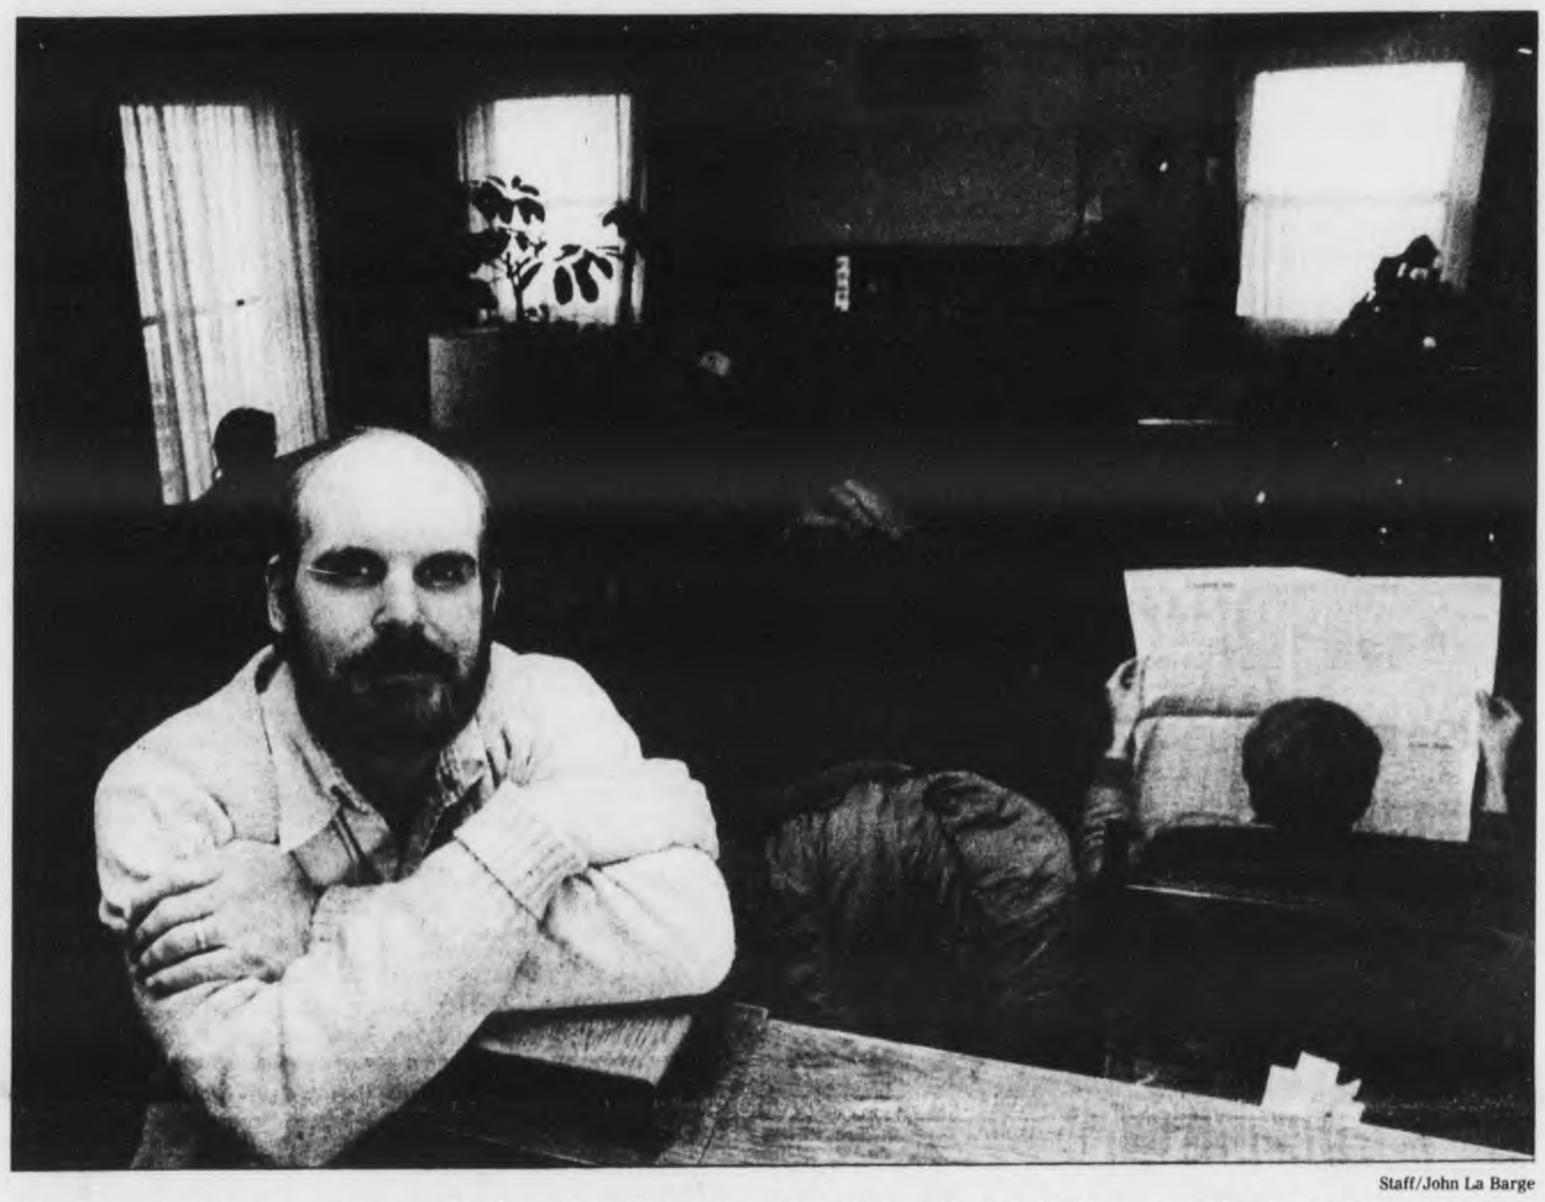
"I didn't get the same feeling (as Torres)," he said. "I feel as though he had a fair trial."

His appeal was heard by the Student Tribunal Nov. 21.

Torres said he based the appeal on procedural error and harsh sanctions imposed by the judicial board.

He said procedural error was violated because he was not given a copy of the Judicial Code of KSU immediately before the Marlatt Judicial Board trial, which is required by SGA judicial by-law Article 5, Section 5.A.5.

At the Tribunal hearing Torres told the board that he thought the hall judicial board's decision was "unjust," and he was unaware of the violations with which he was being charged.



Fetter defended the decision to the Tribunal saying, "Ignorance of the law is no excuse."

He added that Torres had previously been on Marlatt Hall probation and had several run-ins with Marlatt Hall staff earlier in the semester during which he threatened staff members.

Because Torres was on hall probation at the time he was convicted of violating the liquor law and honor codes, Fetter said his board did "strongly recommend removal" of Torres from the hall.

Torres was placed on probation because he was found in possession of a cereal malt beverage in the hall.

Earl Robinson, Manhattan, who earned his degree in social work at K-State, is one of two people that are in charge of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., located at 831 Leavenworth St. The shelter serves as a temporary home for people that have no place to go.

Shelter provides refuge for homeless

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

Two years ago, Manhattan gave a home to the homeless. It came in the form of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., a temporary home for people who have nowhere to go.

The shelter is located in a residential neighborhood at 831 Leavenworth St. Although certain connotations often accompany the word "shelter," this one looks like all the other houses on the block, from the red, illuminated Santa Claus figure perched on the front porch to the intimate family-room setting.

That, however, is not the case.

"It's not a very typical place," said Earl Robinson, who earned his degree in social work from K-State after 15 years of being a construction worker on the West Coast. Robinson, now 35, is one of two people in charge of the daily operation of the shelter.

Robinson said 21 residents stayed in the shelter last week, and of those 13 were placed in jobs and found apartments. The shelter has one large room for women, three smaller rooms for men and one room in the basement for anyone.

The shelter currently has nine homeless residents. He said there is no such thing as a "typical" resident.

One man was in a car accident and was left with only three fingers on each hand. Robinson said the shelter saw to it that the man received medical attention and made sure he was delivered to his home in California.

Robinson also described a 49-year-old resident who had previously lived with a landlord for $80 a month. When the landlord died, the man, who was afflicted with diabetes and respiratory emphysema, had nowhere to go but the emergency shelter.

Another family came to town thinking the downtown mall was providing jobs in the area. They were surprised to find the mall wasn't completed.

They had just more than a dollar to live on, and the emergency shelter turned out to be their only hope, assisting them in traveling on, Robinson said.

"We also had a group of people you'd have to call throwbacks from the '60s," he said.

"They had a big bus painted with 'one world, one faith' and flags of all the nations, and long hair and beards," he said.

The group stayed in their bus, but they made phone calls, washed dishes and bathed in the shelter, Robinson said.

Even K-State students have used the emergency shelter.

Robinson said one student, a mother of three, ran out of money and was evicted from her apartment. She had her teaching assistant position and was working on her master's degree in English when she completely ran out of funds, he said.

"It's a very humiliating experience to come to a shelter and say, 'I'm broke, I don't know where to go, and it's cold outside,'" Robinson said.

"We try to get them comfortable. That's part of the reason we use a house. We try to provide as much of a home atmosphere as possible," he said.

The shelter is funded, through donations, by the United Way, city of Manhattan and community. Robinson's salary came from a grant last year, and he said he hopes the grant will be renewed so he can stay at the shelter.

Money is far from being the only reward for his job, he said.

"It's when people come back and thank us, or (when we get) letters and mail from people who get settled in other places.

"After a while, you can see more positive feelings starting to develop and relationships beginning between the people who are here," Robinson said.

"Maybe they have nothing in common on the outside, but they have in common the fact they're here," he said. "They begin to sort of prop each other up and be their own support system. That's the transition we look for."

Aggieville merchants make plans to prevent future disturbances

By CHRIS DOLL
Collegian Reporter

The Aggieville Merchants Association wants to attack future Aggieville disturbances with rigid ordinances, backed by strict enforcement.

Jim Schottler, president of the association, presented a 9-point plan at Tuesday night's city commission meeting for preventing future "destructive vandalism and disregard for law and order."

The plan included the closing the streets to Aggieville before halftime of the K-State-University of Kansas football game, and controlling pedestrian access into Aggieville to prevent alcoholic beverages from being carried into the area.

Other points include the posting of signs stating the city's open-container laws and possible fines, and other signs stating that access to the roofs of buildings is punishable by law.

The plan also advised strict enforcement by police of all city ordinances and laws.

The University would also be asked to review disciplinary actions possible for students convicted for acts of violence.

Another point was that the University should consider alternative activities such as concerts and dances.

The plan also recommends that parents of minors should be advised to keep their childen out of Aggieville that night. The association also suggested the city work with various sectors of the community to develop cooperation from the public in advance of the event.

"We do not believe these steps will end our problem. It is just a first step," Schottler said, adding that prevention will only ensue if the community and the University work together.

In other action, the commission discussed forming a special committee to look in to Manhattan's need for non-alcoholic clubs.

A group of high school and college-aged students asked the commission to consider advising and subsidizing them in the establishment.

Mayor Rick Mann said he had received other requests for the same idea, and suggested the alcohol and advisory committee look into it.

Although the governing body expressed approval for the formation of the committee, they delayed action pending further study.

Poindexter, North refuse to testify on arms sales, Contra aid scandal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Two of President Reagan's recently departed national security aides — both still active-duty military officers — refused to publicly answer questions Tuesday from a House committee trying to explore the Iranian-Contra arms-and-money connection.

The dramatic invocations of Fifth Amendment rights by Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter and Marine Lt. Col. Oliver L. North brought an increasing aura of mystery to the burgeoning foreign policy scandal.

The twin refusals to testify came as the Reagan administration appeared, still, to be at odds with itself over exactly what happened and how officials should respond to congressional demands for answers. Retired Maj. Gen. Richard V. Secord, another principal figure in the controversy, took the Fifth Amendment before the Senate Intelligence Committee.

In citing their constitutional right against self-incrimination, Poindexter, Reagan's former national security adviser, and North, fired as a key National Security Council aide, declined in separate, nationally broadcast, appearances before the House Foreign Affairs Committee to discuss any aspect of U.S. arms sales to Iran or the transfer of profits to Nicaraguan Contra rebels.

"I must decline to answer that question at this time because of my constitutional rights under the Fifth Amendment," Poindexter, who resigned Nov. 25, told the committee.

"On the advice of counsel, I respectfully and regretfully decline to answer the question based on my constitutional rights," responded North, who worked for Poindexter at the NSC.

At the White House, President Reagan, in an exchange with news reporters during a picture-taking session, said he has caught glimpses of the nationally televised House hearings, but also said, "If I were taking questions, I would remind you that I am the one that told you all that we know about what happened."

In fact, Reagan used his regular Saturday radio broadcast to the nation last weekend to acknowledge that elements of his policy to establish contact with moderate political forces in Iran were "flawed" and that "mistakes were made." Without directly apologizing for the policy that resulted in the biggest flap of his nearly 6-year presidency, Reagan promised to "set things straight" with the American people.

While members of Congress turned up the heat for answers, two former presidents offered their views:

—Richard M. Nixon described the Iran-Contra controversy as "a

Imprisoned Soviet dissident dies

MOSCOW — Anatoly Marchenko, a prominent Soviet human rights activist who recently was pressured by the KGB to emigrate to Israel, has died in prison at the age of 48, a friend said Tuesday.

Marchenko's wife, Larisa Bogoraz, was informed of the death in a telegram that arrived at noon Tuesday, said the friend, who spoke on condition of anonymity. Bogoraz and the couple's 13-year-old son, Pavel, left Tuesday evening for the prison 500 miles east of Moscow, the friend said.

The telegram did not say how Marchenko died or give the date of his death, she added.

The dissident, who spent 20 years in prison and internal exile, was a member of the disbanded Helsinki Watch Group that tried to monitor Soviet compliance with the 1975 accord on human rights. He also wrote the harrowing dissident chronicle "My Testimony" about his labor camp experiences.

Bogoraz has said she believed Marchenko began a hunger strike Aug. 4 to protest the authorities' refusal to allow her to visit him. She speculated during an interview in November that authorities had begun force-feeding him.

Sides reach truce in Philippines

MANILA, Philippines — A 60-day cease-fire between the government and communist rebels who have been battling it for 17 years went into effect at noon today. There were no immediate reports of violations.

The truce agreement was reached when the two sides resolved a dispute over weapons late Tuesday, removing the last obstacle to a cease-fire in the leftist insurgency that has bloodied this archipelago since 1969.

Armed Forces spokesman Col. Honesto Isleta said there would be no ceremony marking the noon (11 p.m. EST Tuesday) start of the cease-fire, but both government and rebel forces had been instructed in advance to stop shooting.

Deputy Defense Minister Wilson Gamboa, in a radio interview aired shortly before the truce began, pledged the military would honor the accord and expressed hope the truce "will truly materialize into a lasting peace."

Under the agreement, the two sides will start second-stage negotiations within 30 days on "substantive issues," such as land reform, social and economic changes and the status of U.S. bases that the communists have demanded.

In a broadcast Tuesday night over government radio, rebel leader Satur Ocampo appealed to the estimated 23,500 members of the rebel New People's Army to respect the accord and stop offensive operations against government forces.

Earth's core rugged, scientists say

SAN FRANCISCO — Crude maps of the depths of the Earth show its molten metal core is not a smooth sphere, but instead is roughened by mountains taller than Everest and valleys six times deeper than the Grand Canyon, researchers said Tuesday.

Friction from the sloshing of the liquid across these features may explain why the planet rotates with a slight jerkiness that makes a day five-thousandths of a second longer or shorter than 24 hours every decade, said the scientists from NASA, the California Institute of Technology and a British laboratory.

"There has been no previous evidence for bumps on the core," said Caltech geophysicist Robert Clayton. "They were only speculated. This is direct evidence that they exist."

A Caltech research team's report on the topography of the boundary between Earth's molten nickel-iron core and the surrounding rock mantle, will be presented Wednesday during the American Geophysical Union's fall meeting.

The maps of the core-mantle boundary, located about 2,000 miles beneath Earth's surface, were made using a 5-year-old technique called seismic tomography, in which varying speeds of earthquake waves through molten and solid rock are measured.

The technique is similar to a medical CAT scan.

Urban schools hit hardest by cuts

TOPEKA — State aid to local school districts will be cut $17.27 million if the Legislature ratifies Gov.-elect Mike Hayden's spending reduction edict as expected, and the big Wichita, Topeka and Kansas City, Kan., districts will feel it the hardest.

Dale Dennis, assistant state education commissioner for school finance, presented to the state Board of Education Tuesday a computer printout showing how much money each school district would lose in state aid under the 3.8 percent budget trimming ordered by Hayden to meet state revenue shortfalls.

The printout showed Wichita Unified School District No. 259 stands to have its state aid cut by $2.53 million. To make up that loss of revenue, the Wichita district would have to raise local school taxes 2.33 mills, based on 1986 property valuations, Dennis said.

Topeka USD 501 would lose $760,526 in state aid, a mill equivalency of 2.39, while Kansas City, Kan., would lose $729,037, which equates to a 2.11 mill levy increase if the revenue were to be recovered by raising taxes.

The big Shawnee Mission School District in suburban Johnson County loses no state aid, because it receives none. That is because its local district wealth is so high it doesn't qualify for state aid, which is designed to equalize per-pupil expenditures among the state's 304 local school districts.

Other big losses would have to be absorbed by the Olathe School District, $491,524; Lawrence $382,462; Southeast Johnson County $340,122; Salina $296,541; Garden City $272,716; Hutchinson $243,178, and Manhattan $237,401. Those districts also would have to raise property taxes between 1.78 and 2.39 mills to make up the difference.

Taylor proposes tripling liquor tax

TOPEKA — The Rev. Richard E. Taylor Jr., president of Kansans for Life At Its Best, a temperance organization, proposed Tuesday that the state nearly triple the taxes it imposes on distilled spirits, wine and beer.

The increases he suggested would generate $83.1 million more revenue to the state annually. Taylor said the new revenue could go to pay start-up costs of the state lottery and pari-mutuel wagering on horse and dog racing, while serving as a deterrent to increased consumption of alcohol.

Taylor's proposal would boost state income from the gallonage taxes on distilled spirits, wine and beer from the present $47.8 million a year to $130.9 million.

He would raise the taxes on those three forms of alcohol to the level of the highest tax in other states. Washington has the highest tax on distilled spirits, Utah the highest on wine and Georgia the highest on beer.

"Revenue received from alcoholic beverages should be increased 10 times for the public to break even," Taylor said in a public statement. He argued alcoholism causes higher manufacturing costs because of lost worker productivity, higher premiums for insurance and higher taxes to pay for law enforcement, welfare and treatment.

Foul-breathed dolls hit the market

SUNNYVALE, Calif. — For $4.99, the holiday shopping public can now buy revolting dolls the likes of ugly George Garbagemouth, a rubbery creature who, when squeezed, blows a foul breath.

George is one of a family of "Breath Blasters" being offered by Silicon Valley entrepreneur Nolan Bushnell, who created the video game Pong.

The hand-size dolls are all ugly and, when squeezed in the belly, emit aromas such as dog breath, dead fish and vomit. They're called "Breath Blasters."

In addition to young Garbagemouth, buyers can choose his other disgusting relations: Mackerel Mouth, Ms. Morningmouth, Dogbreath, Deathbreath, and Victor Vomit. An advertisement boasts, "If (Victor) breathes on you, you'll want to vomit too."

Bumper stickers from University wish campus 'purple' Christmas

By The Collegian Staff

The University administration is getting into the Christmas spirit by playing Santa Claus this week.

Students, faculty and staff are invited to obtain a purple "K-State" bumper sticker as a Christmas gift from the University between today and Friday.

"We hope everyone will display these bumper stickers on their vehicles as they travel home for the holidays," said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement.

Bosco said the bumper stickers are the University's way of wishing everyone a "purple" Christmas.

Christmas gift bumper stickers can be obtained at any of the enrollment management units on campus, Bosco said.

These units include the Admissions Office and Registrar's Office in Anderson Hall, Career Planning and Placement in Holtz Hall and Student Financial Assistance in Fairchild Hall.

"In addition, any living group president can pick up a supply at the Admissions Office for a residence hall floor or greek house," Bosco said.

The design was created by Valerie Spicher, graphic designer for University Relations. More than 20,000 bumper stickers were printed up, Bosco said.

"We have a limited supply, so it will be first come, first serve," he said.

The original idea of the bumper stickers was to give them to prospective students.

The bumper stickers are mailed to admitted students along with the letter of acceptance from the Admissions Office, Bosco said.

"This helps create a presence," Bosco said.

Bosco said the idea was another part of the University's "We're Glad You're Here" campaign initiated last fall.

The bumper stickers are being paid for by funds allocated by the KSU Foundation for recruitment activities.

Drama critic returns to University to lecture, receive honorary degree

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Norman Nadel, president emeritus of the New York Drama Critics Circle and former visiting professor, returned to the University this week to present two speeches, hang an exhibition of his photographic work and receive an honorary doctorate of fine arts.

Recognized as one of the leaders in criticism of drama, Nadel is a contributing editor for Horizon Magazine. He has been a drama critic for the New York World Journal Tribune, guest critic at the Yale Drama Festival and critic and cultural affairs writer for Scripps-Howard newspapers.

Nadel was a co-founder and faculty member of the National Critics Institute and also is a board member of the American Community Theatre Association and New York Cultural Council.

Drawing on his impressions of traveling in London the past several weeks, Nadel will present a speech at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in Nichols Theatre on "The London Theatre Scene, 1986."

Nadel's speech will offer an opportunity to discover what is happening on the stage in London and also to see what will come to area theaters in the future, said Rhonda Miracle, publicity coordinator of the speech department.

"We don't get the opportunity to get to London, but there are a lot of plays that end up on the stage here in a year or two," she said.

Nadel now considers himself "semiretired," but still guest lectures nationally, helps at seminars and travels extensively, Miracle said. His semiretirement has also allowed him to spend more time pursuing his photography.

Nadel will hang an exhibition of his photographic work Thursday in McCain Gallery. Nadel's work will remain on display until Feb. 9.

Nadel's second speech, "Photography as Art," will be presented at 2:30 p.m. Friday in Kedzie 210.

The honor of doctorate of fine arts will be bestowed upon Nadel during the College of Arts and Sciences commencement ceremonies at 11 a.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

Nadel has contributed more than 250 books and 1,000 playbills to Farrell Library. He will return to K-State in April for a one-week visit as guest lecturer and teacher.

Campus food drive to aid area residents

By The Collegian Staff

In a campuswide effort to collect food for needy Manhattan area residents, receptacles will be placed around campus today to receive donations from students, faculty and staff.

All food items received will be distributed by the Flint Hills Bread Basket. Bread Basket staff recommends donations of non-perishable food items such as hams, potatoes and canned goods.

Campus collection receptacles will be available through Dec. 19 at the Union information desk, Dykstra Hall post office, Derby and Kramer food center lobbies, three entrances to Ahearn Field House, Farrell Library turnstile desk, Small Animal Reception Room of the Veterinary Medicine Complex and the front lobbies of Anderson, Justin, Durland and Waters halls.

State should comply with Wefald's request

If Governor-elect Mike Hayden and the state want K-State to help in the current budget crisis by absorbing a mandated $3.06 million budget cut, then they should cooperate with the University and President Jon Wefald in carrying out these cuts.

Wefald has proprosed a five-point budget reform to the state that would help the University absorb these cuts with minimal impact on the academic program. The reforms, which still require approval by the state, should be seriously considered.

Among the positive reforms for the University is the release of $124,199 in tuition fees held by the state treasury from the fall semester. In addition, Wefald is seeking approval to make cuts in capital improvements, which current state guidelines won't allow.

In an effort to help the state meet its cuts, Wefald ordered campuswide energy conservation measures last week that should save $167,000 in the next six months. However, because such cuts come only as a savings to the state, the University stands to gain no benefit from this. Wefald is asking that these energy savings be included in our budget cuts.

Also among his requested budget reforms is the proposal to have the planned 3 percent tuition increase effective July 1, 1987, moved to Jan. 1, so that the spring semester will be included.

Unfortunately, this action would not be fulfilling Wefald's aim to prevent the cuts from affecting K-State's educational purpose. Although most students could handle the $23 to $24 tuition increase, it could be a big problem for others. Furthermore, such a change coming so soon before next semester's fee payment may create problems with financial aid distribution. Therefore, it is best for this idea to be used only as a last resort.

With some temporary assistant instructors and graduate teaching assistants not being rehired for next semester, and with more cuts anticipated in educational programs, the state should act immediately on Wefald's alternatives to prevent any further deterioration of Kansas' higher education.

Medicare may cause poor U.S. health care

If you were ill and in the hospital, would you want to be released from the hospital earlier than you should be, in charge of your own recovery at home?

A survey for the American Medical Association reported that nearly half of the nation's doctors feel under some pressure to release Medicare patients before they are ready to go home because of concerns about reimbursement.

Many doctors believe these mandates set by Medicare are restricting their ability to provide quality care to those who are ill. With the Reagan administration's current system of limiting the amount of govermental reimbursement for treatment of Medicare patients, many doctors feel a loss of control over patient treatment decisions. The plan contains a list of 467 treatment types and a fixed fee for each group, regardless of the length of hospitalization.

While this system may work for some who recover "normally" or have access to participate in home health care, it may endanger the health of those who have no one to care for them at home.

The United States is heading for an assembly-line, cookie-cutter system of medicine, where the individual patient's needs are not considered because Medicare will make no concessions.

Soon, Medicare runs the risk of offering mediocre quality of care for mediocre payments, because physicians will be under such pressure to release these patients early to save on additional costs not covered by Medicare. Or perhaps the United States will follow the many other countries who have adopted the concept of socialized medicine.

Medicare is trying to dictate medicine to those who are experts in determining treatments and recovery times — the doctors themselves. The government needs to understand the importance of this issue and reconsider its methods of handling health care.

We all, including the members of the administration, are consumers of Medicare. And while Medicare probably will not exist in the form as we know it now, the government should remember its responsibility to serve its people.

Roadblocks to Lafene

Editor,

Upon injuring my ankle in a basketball game about 6:30 p.m. Saturday, I drove to campus to get help at Lafene Student Health Center. At the intersection of College Heights Road and Denison Avenue, however, I was stopped at the roadblock that is customarily used at men's basketball games to refuse admittance onto campus.

I was told that my case was not an "emergency" and therefore I could not pass. I could go somewhere else for treatment, I could park in the lot north of Durland Hall and walk to Lafene, and if my car was parked at Lafene, it might be towed because I did not have an orange permit in the window.

I have some questions. How are those tending the roadblock qualified to judge my injury? Why should I go somewhere else when I pay good money for the services at Lafene? Why must I risk further injury to myself when Lafene has a perfectly good parking lot? And why are cars parked at Lafene towed during men's basketball games for not having an orange permit?

It seems that the policy is a paranoid one bent on protecting the parking spaces for those with orange permits at the expense of anyone who may be so unlucky as to need the services at Lafene during a men's basketball game. Would it be so very costly to trust someone who claims they need medical attention?

Iran incident resembles Watergate

Collegian Columnist

The Iran weapons sales scandal promises to be the hottest issue during a presidential term since Richard M. Nixon's exploits in the "Watergate affair."

Testimony Monday by Robert C. McFarlane, President Reagan's former national security adviser, added more heat to an already hot scandal.

McFarlane testified before the House Foreign Affairs Committee that the president, Contrary to earlier reports by administration officials, had approved an "indirect" shipment of arms to Iran in August 1985.

In the Senate Intelligence Committee's secret hearings Monday, a third witness declined to testify, saying it could violate his Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. Robert W. Owen is a conservative activist who reportedly assisted Marine Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, a former National Security Council aide, in contacts with Nicaraguan Contra rebels and private individuals sympathetic to their cause.

Two witnesses, North and Vice Adm. John Poindexter, Reagan's national security adviser, declined to give testimony last week before the Senate Intelligence Committee on the grounds that testifying might violate their Fifth Amendment rights.

Added to this political intrigue is Secretary of State George P. Shultz's statement that he knew nothing about the arms sales.

Furthermore, Shultz said that, unbeknownst to him, former White House officials and John Kelly, the U.S. ambassador to Lebanon, secretly discussed negotiations aimed at freeing Americans held hostage in Lebanon.

At the calm center of this political hurricane sits Reagan, apparently immune to the turmoil that surrounds him. Yet, questions have been raised by congressional leaders, the media and the public about the legitimacy of Reagan's claim of non-involvement in the affair.

Many people are drawing parallels between developments in this incident, especially concerning Reagan's involvement, and the political nightmare during the Nixon administration. At the outset of both investigations, the presidents denied any prior knowledge of the pertinent incident.

During the Watergate hearings, Congressional officials uncovered proof of Nixon's involvement. The public was outraged. Nixon resigned rather than face impeachment.

Overall, 30 Nixon administration officials, campaign officials and financial contributors pleaded guilty or were found guilty of breaking the law.

As the Iran arms sales investigation continues, the question of Reagan's involvement remains unanswered. If officials determine that the president has broken the law, deeper questions come to the forefront.

First: How will the American public respond?

Some people have argued that Reagan's popularity will affect Americans' perception of the incident. Unlike Nixon, Reagan appears to have no major political liabilities. Nixon was not as popular with the people as Reagan appears to be. Moreover, Reagan's vice president did not resign because of illegal dealings as Spiro Agnew did under Nixon.

Because of the public's seemingly blind infatuation, many fear that if Reagan crawls on his knees to the American people, acknowledging his erroneous ways and begging forgiveness, Americans will take pity on the poor slob and say, "Forget it, Ronnie. No hard feelings."

Others wave the standard of the flower children and claim they will not stand for this blatant abuse of power. "Crucify Reagan!" will be their battle cry.

A third school of thought is that the failure of apathetic voters to voice their opinion will contribute to the vocal support of the minority who adore Reagan and lead to Reagan's absolution.

These considerations lead me to my second question: What should the congressional response be?

The extent of any sentence depends, in part, upon the severity of the crime and the criminal record of the defendant. Moreover, if the individual holds a significant place in society, he is sometimes punished as an example to other would-be criminals.

Reagan has no known criminal record. As to the severity of the crimes, the laws that he could have violated concern this nation's international policies. The effects of these violations will stretch far beyond this country's boundaries and have severe ramifications on foreign policy.

Reagan's position as president of the United States is the only gray area in the analysis. During the "Watergate affair," Nixon supporters said the president is above the law in some instances.

Some people believe that Reagan should be exempt from prosecution for the same reason. Others question whether the country could withstand another scandal from the highest office in the land and the president's subsequent resignation or impeachment.

In response to the first point, I would say that although the presidency is the highest office in the land, the position is filled by a "natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States," according to Article I, Section 1, of the U.S. Constitution.

Because Reagan is a citizen and every citizen is subject to the law, Reagan should not be exempt from the rule of the law. Just as the courts would not absolve "Joe Blow" citizen who had committed murder, so too must the country not be blinded by the position of the president and absolve him from any wrongdoing.

Concern about the welfare of the nation is valid, but the principles on which this nation rests are more important. These make up the fabric of the U.S. Constitution. Desecrate the cloth of the law, and this country would commit a far greater crime.

Maintaining the integrity of the justice system and the United States in the eyes of the world is paramount. Turning away from injustice on any level would damage this nation's credibility, but ignoring a commission of crime at the highest level would be unforgivable.

I believe this nation could survive another "Watergate affair." The repercussions of ignoring the situation would be far more serious.

Secular humanist to invent church

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

I was taken aback recently when a Tennesee Court of Appeals ruled that a group of Christian fundamentalists had the right to remove their children from public schools. What surprised me was not so much the court's decision as the reasons the Bible-beaters gave for pulling their kids out of school. They disagreed with the school's curriculum, which they claimed was teaching various forms of religion, including (God forbid) "secular humanism."

I didn't know there was a secular humanist religion. If there is, I'd like to know where the church is located, so I can join. I checked the new phone directory, but there doesn't seem to be a Church of Secular Humanism in Manhattan. Where is the nearest Church of Secular Humanism?

Call me a doubting Thomas if you like, but I don't think such an institution exists. Thus, we have only one alternative — invent one. That's right brothers and sisters, we are going to start a Church of Secular Humanism here on the editorial page of the Collegian.

But if I have anything to say about it (and I do), this church is going to be different from other churches. Unlike most churches, our first job will not be to concern ourselves with such theological questions as "How does one get to heaven?" or "Does God approve of homosexuality?" Instead, we will ask questions such as, "Does heaven exist?" and "Does God have any business prying into someone's sex life?"

As a guiding principal, we might try to establish what the proper relationship is between men and gods. Of course, all of this is subject to change because anyone who wants to address a philosophical/theological question has only to write a letter to the editor or submit a guest column.

And that is what really separates this church from others: We will have no priests, no bishops, no hypocritical Jerry Falwell types; in short, we will have no authority. After all, where law begins, freedom ends. With that thought in mind, perhaps we should move into our first sermon.

We will start with a parable. The Bible claims that human history began the moment mankind decided to disobey God. Prior to that, God had given mankind the freedom to choose, but then forbade mankind to eat from the tree of knowledge. Now, I ask you, is that freedom?

God then condemned humans by throwing Adam and Eve out of paradise, and all of this for exercising their freedom. Sounds to me like we are all just political prisoners of God. In fact, I would be willing to bet there are people all over the world who are literally dying to be condemned to freedom. At this point, a quote from psychologist Erich Fromm's book, "The Fear of Freedom," might be in order. Brother Fromm, take it away.

"From the standpoint of the church which represented authority, this is essentially sin. From the standpoint of man, however, this is the beginning of human freedom. Acting against God's orders means freeing himself from coercion, emerging from the unconscious existence of prehuman life to the level of man."

Hallelujah! Our souls have been enlightened. Brother Fromm seems to have arrived at one of the fundamental principals of human nature. Plainly stated, it is: If someone has the audacity to make a law, no matter how perfect and how rational it is, mankind, with all its imperfection and irrationality, will break it — if for no other reason than to prove it can be broken. Thank you, Brother Fromm.

What does this fundamental truth mean to the future of our congregation? It means we will have no laws, no papal bull, no rigid doctrine or authoritarian dogma. It means we will not attempt to arrive at truth until we are sure that we are on firm theological ground. It means we will not only tolerate dissent, but actually encourage it.

It means we will continually subject even such fundamental truths as Brother Fromm's to close scrutiny, lest they change, like human nature itself. That seems the only apropos way to conduct a church of secular humanism.

Before we part, I would like to invite all of the brothers and sisters to give a little of themselves to the church. No, I'm not asking you to fill the collection plate with money; fill it with theological tracts, philosophical arguments and other relevant data concerning the future of the Church of Secular Humanism. In this church, ideas are more important than money.

Well, that pretty well concludes the first gathering of the Church of Secular Humanism. Let us conclude with a quote from Brother Socrates: "If I know anything at all, it is that I know nothing." Amen to that, Brother Socrates.

Animation effective, but Spielberg's story has been told before

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

As the cost of animation has skyrocketed, animated films have virtually disappeared. Sure, there are Care Bears and Strawberry Shortcake movies, but these films use limited animation, like the Saturday morning cartoons. This means the characters move in jerks and the backgrounds are vague.

Film Review

The animation in these shows pales in comparison to the fluid movements in the old Warner Brothers and Walt Disney Cartoons. So, any time a feature-length animated film comes along which features first-rate animation, it's cause for celebration.

The newest animated film is Donald Bluth's "An American Tail" — Steven Spielberg's latest venture as producer. It's the story of a family of mice, the Mousekewitzes, who journey by ship to America. They leave their homeland to get away from the hordes of cats who ravage the countryside. "In America," Papa Mousekewitz whispers, "there are no cats."

So the family takes off with dreamy-eyed visions of the promised land, but they're in for a few disappointments. Even the trip to America doesn't go quite as planned when a storm sends wave after wave crashing against the ship, until Fievel Mousekewitz, a 7-year-old boy mouse is washed overboard.

Fievel floats to New York City harbor in a bottle, a bit waterlogged but still alive. Soon afterward, he begins his search for his family, meeting several shady characters along the way.

The animation is all of these episodes is minutely detailed. Bluth creates a world very different from the antiseptic-clean world of most animated films: his New York City is gritty, filled with trash heaps and deteriorating tenements. Particularly impressive is the storm episode, where the sea god Neptune rises and hurls waves.

There are times, though, when the movie's budget restrictions become obvious. In the street scenes, humans and mice both sometimes look as if they're frozen in motion. But for the most part, the animation in "An American Tail" is impressive.

The movie's main drawback is the storytelling itself, which often becomes too derivative. Fievel, for instance, is like a combination of Mickey Mouse and Dopey the dwarf. Neither is the movie's comedy very effective. When I saw the movie, the 200 or so children in attendance rarely laughed.

To the movie's credit, though, the children weren't fidgeting or begging mom for popcorn. Their attention was on the screen. Maybe that's enough to ask, but I wish the story had been more original, instead of retreading immigration tales. We're supposed to be impressed that "An American Tail" doesn't turn America into Utopia, but that says more about our own expectations, as formed by Disney films, than it does about Bluth's film.

Despite rumors, grades will be mailed

Budget cuts may alter future policy

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Fall semester grades will be mailed to students' permanent addresses as originally planned despite earlier indications the service would not be provided because of state-mandated budget cuts, said Registrar Don Foster.

"We feel that the effect of a student not knowing what they are getting before they come back is serious enough that we're doing all we can to assure that we can mail them," Foster said. "So for fall 1986, at least, we will continue to mail grades.

"There are a lot of students, a surprising number, whose plans for the spring semester depend on the grade they get in the fall semester, even to the extent, in some cases, of not returning to campus," he said. "So we felt it was extremely important for them to have the information to make those decisions."

In the wake of state-mandated budget rollbacks, the mailing process was put in jeopardy. In order to meet the required cuts and not affect salaries, the registrar's office had decided to hand out fall term grades at spring registration, Foster said. By not mailing grades, he said the office would save about $3,000.

"What we had been doing since our original decision (to not mail grades) is look for other places in which we could save money, because our first priority in this office, of course, is service to students," Foster said. "Not mailing fall grades certainly has a detrimental effect on the service aspect."

Alternative areas have been found which can be cut, allowing the continued mailing of grades, he said. These include deferment of equipment purchases for the office and the dropping of some service contracts, Foster said.

However, the registrar emphasized that these are temporary measures and further action will be required in the future. If budget levels continue to be tight, handing out grades may have to be reconsidered, he said.

The last time grades were handed out at registration was in January 1984. The handout policy for spring registration had been followed in 1982 and 1983 as well, Foster said.

Grades should be mailed out by Dec. 31, with students receiving their reports between Jan. 2-5, Foster said. Grades will be mailed to students' permanent addresses unless the registrar's office is notified of an address change by Dec. 19, he said.

Foster said an extra set of grades is kept in the registrar's office, so students taking intersession can check their semester scores at the office after Jan. 5.

Alumni remember early Bramlage Coliseum controversies

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

Editor's Note: With the groundbreaking of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, the persistence of four University alumni while they were students has resulted in the actualization of the $15.4 million project. This article, the second of two, focuses on the remaining two men who were instrumental in the beginning stages of the coliseum.

Sam Brownback was a senior in agricultural economics and student body president in 1979, when the controversy over building a new sports arena started. He graduated that May and went on to law school, but he never forgot that spring semester of 1979, Brownback said from his office in Topeka.

After graduation, Brownback practiced law in Manhattan with Stites, Hill, Wilson and Brownback until August when he accepted the appointment as Kansas Secretary of Agriculture.

When the student elections were over on the evening of February 14, 1979, the coliseum issue had passed by a three-to-one margin, with 60 percent of the students voting.

The four primary members of the committee that promoted the new arena were Brownback; Mitch Holthus, 1979 graduate in journalism and mass communications and 1980 graduate in finance; Bill Manning, 1980 graduate in accounting; and Brian Rassette, 1980 graduate in marketing.

"We were elated over our victory that night. We felt vindicated, not only by the win, but also by the wide margin of victory," Brownback said.

There had been "significant personal attacks," on himself and Rassette, both members of the committee called "Advocates for a New Arena," that had publicized their cause in the Collegian with an ad calling it the "Arena to see the Stars," Brownback said.

"The attacks on Brian were so strong and regular that we started calling him 'Lightning Rod Rassette.' Of course, Brian was the kind of guy who could really get people upset easily," Brownback added.

"Brian sure worked hard to get the arena issued passed. If it was to have any other name, I guess we would call it the 'Brian Rassette Coliseum,'" he said.

Brownback recalled Julie Doll, who was editor of the Collegian, ran a lot of letters to the editor on the topic in January and February of that year. One he remembered in particular was a "double editorial," with himself in favor of the new arena, and Doll opposed.

"In the editorial then-basketball coach Jack Hartman was quoted as calling Ahearn 'the old barn' and saying that the men's basketball program had deteriorated because of the difficulty in recruiting top athletes to play in it," he said.

Doll recognized the problems at Ahearn but stated that the need for newer and better buildings in which to conduct classes was more important. Doll said, "Seventeen buildings on campus are leaking and in need of repair," and also alluded to statements by members of the Kansas Legislature that there were "serious doubts" the state would fund a recreational facility then.

Brownback said much of the credit for the issue being passed should go to Julie Doll. Despite her opposition, articles in the Collegian gave the issue the campuswide attention necessary for it to pass, he said.

"When I ran for student body president, Brian Rassette campaigned for one of my opponents. After I took office, I got interested in the talk about a new coliseum. When I spoke to Brian about helping me build a case for it, he almost fell over," Brownback said.

"I guess you might say Brian and I stirred up a lot of emotions on the issue. Then Mitch came along and 'poured oil on the troubled waters.' In that sense, we were a lucky combination," Brownback said.

Rassette, was called "a sparkplug" by his friends and "a troublemaker" by his opponents. Either way, he was seldom referred to as a latecomer or a shirker.

Rassette and Brownback had been on opposite sides of the political process in the election for student body president. Now Brownback was asking him to join forces on the new coliseum issue. It was an unusual situation, Rassette said in a telephone interview from his home in Overland Park.

"Once I overcame my initial shock, I said 'sure' and I jumped right on the bandwagon. Sam wanted to make it (the coliseum) a campuswide issue and bring it before the student body as a referendum. To do that, we had to get the attention of the entire student body, and there was simply not enough time," Rassette said.

Brownback and Rassette were acquaintances, not friends. The two, along with Holthus and Manning were to become very close because of the arena issue, Rassette said.

Rassette said elections were only a few weeks away when the four planned their strategy. Taking ads in the Collegian would have some effect, they thought, but how to get the students fired up was quite a different matter.

They hit on the idea of setting up a speakers' bureau that would go anywhere in the Manhattan area to talk about the need for a new arena. The four agreed to build a speech around a comparison study about

Organization, common sense can make party successful

By LISA ALLSPACH
Collegian Reporter

For first-time party hosts or hostesses, the key word in making any party successful is organization. Careful planning and common sense can make any party one to remember.

"It's really important to plan your party," said Karen Penner, associate professor of foods and nutrition. "Plan a variety of things to serve, make sure you have enough food for the number of guests you've invited, and prepare as much of the food as possible ahead of time so you don't spend too much time away from your guests once they've arrived," Penner said.

She said good etiquette is based on "common sense as well as practicality." Organization is important, as well.

"Know the space you have to work with and the accommodations you want to provide for your guests. The end result is that you want everyone to be comfortable," Penner said.

Hosts or hostesses should not include guests who will not be familiar with the rest of the group.

"You don't want people to be uncomfortable," she said.

Invitations, which can be found in card stores to fit almost any occasion, are appropriate for most parties.

"Most people are not terribly formal these days," Penner said. Invitations are also helpful in terms of management so that an amount of food can be prepared appropriate to the number of guests.

Marian Spears, head of the Department of Dietetics, Restaurant and Institutional Management, had some other practical suggestions.

"When the people first arrive, take them to a room outside of the dining room. If you are going to serve them refreshments, make them very light. Too many people make their hors d'oeuvres too heavy, leaving guests too full after the main course," Spears said.

She encouraged the use of appetizers such as raw vegetables and perhaps a non-alcoholic drink.

"There are some wonderful non-alcoholic drinks that can be made," said Spears. This not only eliminates the worry of someone drinking and driving, but it also helps those guests who do not wish to drink feel more at ease.

"Know your guests," she said. This is especially important in terms of conversation and when seating them for dinner. Spears suggested letting the guests gather in a room separate from the dining room so that they can talk together for 30 to 45 minutes before dinner. Spears said she usually has some music playing very low in the background.

Spears stressed the importance of the guests' comfort also.

"Keep people comfortable," Spears said. "The whole point of entertaining is for people to enjoy themselves. They can't do that when they are not comfortable."

Spears said buffets might be best for serving.

"Having someone serve can be laboriously slow," she said. "With a buffet, the guests can move through the line easily and take as much or as little as they want." Having the ice water poured before the meal or having someone ice the drinks right before the meal starts is also a good idea.

Plates, tableware and dishes not to be used for dessert should be removed following the main course. Spears said the serving of guests is like being waited on in a restaurant.

"If you're having trouble with ideas for a gathering, there are some wonderful ideas in cookbooks. You'd be amazed," she said. Another good source is magazines.

Family Circle and Bon Appetit are some of the sources Spears consults, finding their variety of ideas "fascinating."

Hors d'oeuvres give holiday entertaining added touch of class

By JADA ALLERHEILIGEN
Collegian Reporter

No self-respecting party would be complete without hors d'oeuvres. Though their French name may be intimidating, hors d'oeuvres need not be overwhelming.

In fact, common year-round hors d'oeuvres — such as cheese balls, relish trays, chips and dip — are still included on the list of Christmas favorites.

"People are not asking for special Christmas hors d'oeuvres; they are sticking to items that are popular all year long," said Greg Nett, executive chef of the University Club at the University Inn, 17th Street and Anderson Avenue.

In order to make the food more festive looking, the restaurants are adding garnishes of holly, pine and Christmas figurines.

"One way we give the holiday touch is through our display mirrors," Nett said. "We place the food on the mirrors, and it gives a nice reflection."

Another example for getting the Christmas look is to use a simple cheeseball and add extra garnishes.

"We take a cheeseball and stick whole almonds into it, so it looks like a porcupine and then add pine to the top, making it a pine cone," Nett said.

Spiced shrimp, cold poached salmon with dill sauce and stuffed Chinese green pea pods are some of the more elegant hors d'oeuvres the University Club has been preparing.

"One of the quick and easy favorites is rumaki, which is chicken livers and water chestnuts wrapped in bacon," Nett said.

Two of the favorites at the Holiday Inn and Holidome, 530 Richards Drive, are finger sandwiches and liver pate.

"We cut out our finger sandwiches, and then decorate each one with colored cream cheese," said Jerry Reynard, food and beverage director.

During morning office parties, cinnamon rolls and danishes are among the favorites, and different teas and hot cider drinks are served.

At the Cotton Club, 418 Poyntz Ave., fried mushrooms, chicken nuggets and potato skins covered with a cheese sauce are popular items.

"We find the younger groups like the spicy items such as nachos with taco meat and sauce, while the older groups like milder items," said Wanita Boyle, Cotton Club assistant cook.

At the University Club, Nett said the younger groups like the cold items such as chips and dips, while the older groups like the hot items such as breaded mushrooms.

"Overall, the trend seems to be toward lighter foods," Nett said. "People aren't wanting the heavy fudge or Christmas candy."

"The best part of preparing all these holiday snacks and hors d'oeuvres," Reynard said, "is the fun you have at the parties with everyone dressed up and in good moods."

NABS give partygoers, hosts choice

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

During the holiday season, there is a lot of celebrating from Thanksgiving to New Year's Day.

And since most of the celebrating includes some consumption of liquor, careful party planning by the host or hostess can keep things under control, according to a pamphlet put out by the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

"One third of the adult population chooses not to drink at all. And many of those who drink socially sometimes would rather not," the pamphlet stated.

More non-alcoholic beverages — NABS — have been promoted and served by local restaurants and student organizations since the push for alcohol awareness and the change in the legal drinking age.

"We offer NABS at fraternity and sorority parties, and they go over really well," said Larry Limbocker, manager of the Cotton Club, 418 Poyntz Ave.

"Cranberry punches are big during the holidays, as well as the 'fuzzy navels' and drinks with apple cider," Limbocker said. Although they do contain alcohol, fuzzy navels — made with orange juice and peach Schnapp's — are light in alcoholic content.

Although the Holiday Inn and Holidome, 530 Richards Drive, does not sell many NABS, it still offers them because customers expect it.

"We have a real nice hot apple juice and cinnamon (drink) that's going well at the bar," said Jerry Reynard, food and drink director at the Holiday Inn and Holidome.

"I've been surprised at the number of students on campus that don't drink. It's just common courtesy to have NABS as an alternative," said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

NAB Eggnog

6 eggs, separated
2 cups heavy cream
3/4 cup sugar
2 cups milk

Beat yolks and whites separately. Add ½ cup sugar to whites after having been beaten very stiff. Carefully mix the yolks and whites together. Stir in milk. Beat 2 cups heavy cream. Fold mixture all altogether. Serve cold with grated nutmeg.

Hot Cranberry Cozy

16 oz. can jellied cranberry sauce
2 cups of water
2 cups unsweetened pineapple juice
1/4 tsp. allspice
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1/8 tsp. cloves
1/8 tsp. nutmeg
1/8 tsp. salt
⅓ cup light brown sugar

Put ingredients in food processor and mix. Heat and serve warm. Best if simmers two hours.

Alluring desserts receive rave reviews

By DON SCOTT
Collegian Reporter

Fat chance.

That about sums up the odds of success if you're planning to watch your food consumption over the holidays, especially with all the scrumptous holiday desserts, with their rich frostings and alluring textures, begging you to devour them.

These are desserts so tempting that even Jane Fonda would be on her aerobic knees begging for more.

But the calorie monster needn't prevent hosts or hostesses from serving the desserts they know will win them raves. Guests will be forever grateful.

"Our main pies during the holidays are pumpkin and pecan pies," said Gwen Dennis, a bakery clerk at Dillon's, 2700 Anderson Ave. "We also have a party danish about two inches across. They're like finger sandwiches, but they're sweet."

Another Dillon's holiday specialty is Christmas stolen. It is like a bread with raisins, maraschino cherries, nuts and icing.

"It's something like a fruit cake but more like a bread," Dennis said.

Dillon's also prepares assorted cookies and cakes, all decorated for the holidays.

Swanson's Bakery, 426 Houston St., also offers an assortment of baked delicacies that could remove any thoughts of calories from one's consciousness.

"We have cookie grams," said Mary Tharp, decorator at Swanson's.

Swanson's Christmas cookie grams come in chocolate and vanilla flavors. The cookies are cut into six inch to 12 inch sizes.

"We decorate those and write on them, too. People will phone or come in and tell us what they want written on them," said Tharp.

Another Swanson's specialty is their bubble bread, like a cinnamon loaf.

Swanson's taste-bud pleasures don't stop there. Their endless assortment of Christmas cookies only complement their acclaimed German sterllen bread.

"It's in the shape of Christmas trees with fruit filling. People can have different fruit varieties in them," said Tharp.

"We do a pumpkin cheese cake instead of regular pumpkin pie," said Greg Nett, executive chef of the University Club at the University Inn, 17th Street and Anderson Avenue.

Mincemeat pie is also one of the University Inn's holiday specialties. Some ingredients in mincemeat pie are raisins, dried fruits, candied fruits and brandy. It all bakes up to be a very popular dessert.

For some, however, that perfect holiday dessert is something more simple.

"I love peanut clusters," said Susie Griffin, junior in accounting. "My mom makes the best peanut clusters. But she never makes them except around Christmas."

"I like cherry cheesecake and pumpkin rolls," said Michelle Herl, junior in radio and television. "I don't make them myself because I hate to cook. My mom and grandmother make them and will send some up to me after the holidays, if there is an excess."

Cartoonists open fire against war toys

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Many of the nation's editorial cartoonists are using their newspaper and magazine spots between now and Christmas to protest the sale of war toys, again raising questions about whether such items are healthy.

But while the debate rages, sales of war toys continue to soar.

G.I. Joe, with his $130 aircraft carrier and other accoutrements, is the nation's biggest selling toy, and Rambo, Ninja Warrior and other war toys are especially popular during this holiday gift-giving season.

"I get 100 calls a day for Lazer Tag," said Sharon Cullity, a buyer for the Pennywhistle toy stores in New York City, referring to the futuristic gunplay toy. "All this Rambo. It's crazy. It's guns, guns, guns."

A growing number of stores like Pennywhistle ignore war toys and concentrate on educational toys and cuddly animals. The Enchanted Village chain, for example, grew from five stores last year to 15 scattered across the nation today.

But most stores report they do a booming business in such bellicose-sounding toys as Thundercats, Transformers and Blasterhawks.

"They see it on TV, they hear about it. It's life," said Donna Apostol of St. Johns, Mich., who was shopping recently in the toy gun aisle at Toys "R" Us in Lansing. "If you're going to let them watch it on TV, you have to let them play with it."

Some find that disturbing. Between Dec. 10 and Dec. 24, more than 40 editorial cartoonists, including nine Pulitzer Prize winners, will use their cartoons to urge parents to avoid toys with violent themes.

"At a time when we are supposed to be celebrating peace, it seems insane to turn war into a Christmas present," said Bob Staake, a St. Louis free-lance cartoonist who organized the effort.

Toy companies bristle at the term, "war toys."

"It is a name we don't recognize," said Douglas Thomson, president of the Toy Manufacturers of America. The industry group prefers the terms guns and action figures.

G.I. Joe, Lazer Tag, Transformers and M.A.S.K. action figures are among the top 10 toys in terms of dollar volume, based on a survey of 3,000 retailers by Toy and Hobby World magazine. Sales of action figures grew from 622 million in 1984 to $840 million in 1985 and Thomson said they make up about 10 percent of toy sales.

The manufacturers say their toys do not cause aggression, glorify war or hurt children in any way. Besides, they say, it is natural for little boys to play war, and these are the toys that people want.

Some psychologists also say that war toys are not harmful.

"Kids can differentiate between violence that is funny and violence that is sickening," said Brian Sutton-Smith, a professor of education and folklore at the University of Pennsylvania. "They can clearly tell the difference between Road Runner and the evening news, violence that hurts and violence that doesn't hurt."

"Culture is full of murder, Shakespeare is full of murder," he said. "Do you want to get rid of that?"

But others don't buy it.

"I think they're adult nightmares and I don't think they belong on children's TV and they don't belong in the toy boxes," said Elin McCoy, a children's book author and journalist.

The toys often involve detailed scenarios where there are no gradations of good and evil, where redemption is impossible, and where conflict is inevitable, said McCoy, who has studied the scripts that accompany such toys.

Career search network to organize on campus

By The Collegian Staff

In an effort to provide students with help and support while they look for jobs, a career search network will be established next semester.

The group will give students a chance to consult with peers about the problems of starting a career, said Peggy Null-Stevenson, group founder and speech instructor.

The group will also work with the Career Planning and Placement Center to bring in guest speakers, ideas and information about what it takes to find a profession.

"We need encouragers, not discouragers," Null-Stevenson said. "We need cheerleaders, someone who cares if you get the job."

She said the group will give support through the sharing of ideas about interviewing techniques and other aspects of the job search.

Discussion topics could include what to do when a spouse must relocate, sexual harrassment on the job and other issues "too delicate for class," Null-Stevenson said.

Null-Stevenson had 15 students last spring in a group she originally wanted to name "Feelings." The group met once a month in the Union.

A lack of interest prevented her from continuing the group through this semester, but she plans to try again in January. Next semester's meetings will be in Null-Stevenson's home on a monthly basis.

Null-Stevenson said the most important goal of the group is to establish a network of employment contacts for students.

"If I get people who strive for excellence in a pool, it will be a great contact for matching corporations and students," she said.

She has received many responses from alumni who will work with present-day students as contacts to broaden their network.

"I want to form a network so future graduates have a pool of students to contact," Null-Stevenson said.

Poll reveals bookstore pays best text buy-back prices

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State Union Bookstore pays more for used textbooks than the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Fort Hays State University.

These are the results after polling Steve Jewett, textbook coordinator of KU; Jack Gilette, textbook supervisor of WSU; and Steve Gonzales, bookstore manager of Fort Hays State campus bookstores. The bookstores were asked when professors have to turn in their book orders to the bookstore; when the bookstore turns in the book orders to the publishers; how much the bookstore marks up new books; how much they buy back used books for, and how much they sell used books for.

The four bookstores vary in the amount they pay for used books.

Fort Hays State pays 50 percent of what the student bought the book for, whether the book was new or used when the student bought it, Gonzales said.

KU and WSU pay 50 percent of the current new book price, even if the book was bought used.

K-State pays 60 percent of the publisher's list price (new book price) for books that professors will use again, said Jerry Fields, book department manager of K-State Union Bookstore.

Professors in all four universities are supposed to turn in their book orders to the bookstore in April for the fall semester and in October for the spring semester. Each bookstore gives the professors specific deadlines each semester. These dates give the publishers' representatives time to introduce new textbooks to the professors and allows the bookstores time to contact vendors to buy as many used textbooks as possible.

The bookstores turn in their book orders to the publishers in June for the fall semester and in November for the spring semester. When teachers turn in book orders late, change their order, or if the books are not available, students have a delay in getting their books at the semester start.

All four bookstores mark up new books 20 percent to 25 percent of wholesale. The increase is to pay for overhead and freight expenses.

The four bookstores do not buy back books the professors will not use again. Vendors buy these books to sell to other schools which will continue to use the book. The prices paid to the students for these books are determined by the vendor in accordance with the amount of books he has in inventory and the demand he or she foresees for the book.

KU, WSU and K-State, charge 75 percent of new book price for used books when selling them to the students. The mark-up varies from book to book at Fort Hays State.

K-State dismantles Creighton, 81-64

Staff/John Thelander

K-State guard Mark Dobbins (41) fights to hang on to a rebound before attempting a shot against Creighton University's forward Ted Stefaniak during Tuesday's game in Ahearn Field House. K-State defeated Creighton 81-64 and will face Abilene Christian Thursday.

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Not only did the Wildcats rack up an impressive 81-64 win Tuesday night at Ahearn Field House over previously undefeated Creighton, they also managed to save face for the Big Eight Conference.

Creighton had trounced Iowa State and Nebraska at home in its first two games of the season.

"We knew they had beaten two Big Eight teams, so we couldn't let it be three in a row," said center Charles Bledsoe, who had nine points on the night.

Coach Lon Kruger called Tuesday's game the best performance so far this season by his 5-0 squad.

"I'm real pleased by their effort and play," he said. "They did a very good job of sustaining that effort for the (time) they were in there. I can't hide the fact that I'm awfully proud of that.

"We said going into the game that we'd have to put out that kind of physical effort (in order to win). To do that we knew we had to take a step beyond where we have been, and we did."

K-State's play also drew rave reviews from Creighton's second-year head coach Tony Barone.

"I thought they were the most physical team we've played. They should win the Big Eight. They're going to be a very good team...when Norris (Coleman) is back," he said.

The Wildcats did not get on the scoreboard until William Scott's three-point attempt fell through with three minutes already gone in the game, giving K-State a 3-2 lead. The 'Cats never trailed again.

K-State widened its lead to 20-9 midway through the first half, with Scott, Bledsoe and Mitch Richmond providing the early scoring punch.

Creighton drew to within six points late in the half before the Wildcats, behind some hot outside shooting, extended the lead to 47-34 at the intermission.

Richmond led all scorers with 18 points at the end of the opening period, scoring from both outside and underneath the bucket. Kruger said Richmond's performance was his best to date.

"He just keeps stringing them up. He has one good one, and then he has one a little better, and then he has one like this...He's doing a heck of a job," Kruger said.

The first half was marked by hot outside shooting by both teams. Creighton was six-of-nine from beyond the three-point line while the Wildcats were five-of-eight.

After trading baskets to open the second half, the Wildcats raced to a 56-36 lead. The Bluejays were never able to draw any closer than 16 points the rest of the game.

Much of K-State's success was due to an aggressive man-to-man defense which effectively contained Creighton's potent outside attack.

"We really got on it and took them out of what they wanted to do. We took them away from their initial passes and forced them out on the court," said guard Steve Henson.

Henson, who normally spells senior Lynn Smith at point guard, played most of the game. Smith had arrived in Manhattan only a couple of hours before game time after attending his grandfather's funeral in Memphis and was drained from the ordeal, Kruger said.

K-State will host Abilene Christian Thursday night in Ahearn. Game time is 7:35 p.m.

'Cats' physical performance hopeful indication to Kruger

By DAVE WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

Much of K-State's victory Tuesday night in Ahearn Field House can be attributed to the extremely physical offensive and defensive play of the Wildcats.

Coach Lon Kruger was undoubtedly pleased with his team's play as K-State upped their record to 5-0 by defeating the Creighton Bluejays 81-64.

"They were much more physical and more active defensively and they played with more strength than in the games before this," Kruger said. "I'd say that this was our best performance so far."

Much of this physical strength, Kruger pointed out, came from big men Mitch Richmond, Charles Bledsoe, Lance Simmons and Ron Meyer. Kruger said this was the first game of the season K-State has exhibited the physical strength of which they are capable.

"It doesn't surprise me (the physical play) because I think they are capable of doing that," he said. "It surprises me because they haven't done that yet...and I think Creighton definitely drew the best out of us."

The strong play and defensive action which Kruger noted mostly came from Richmond and freshman Steve Henson. Henson saw more action in this game than in all of the previous four, scoring nine points in 27 minutes of play.

"I thought Steve played good, aggressive ball tonight. He especially played well defensively," Kruger said.

Creighton came into last night's match-up with an undefeated record of 2-0, both victories coming from Big Eight teams Iowa State and Nebraska. Creighton coach Tony Barone stated after the game that K-State was the best of the three Big Eight schools his team has seen this year.

"This is definitely the best of three we've played," he said. "They gave us a lot of problems because of their defense intensity."

Raiders have numerous reasons for wanting to whip Kansas City

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Los Angeles Raiders have any number of reasons for wanting to beat the stuffing out of the Kansas City Chiefs this week, as John Macovic knows.

The Raiders could draw motivation from the fact that both teams are 8-6 and battling for an AFC wildcard berth.

Or they may want to erase the 37-0 humiliation they endured Monday night in Seattle.

Or they might decide to answer Mackovic's accusations that the Raiders play dirty football.

"They might," Mackovic said Tuesday. "They very well might."

After the Raiders whipped the Chiefs Oct. 5 in a football game and a fight, Mackovic said the men in silver and black deliberately tried to injure his players.

In violation of NFL rules, the Chiefs coach even trotted out films of Raiders-Chiefs encounters and showed them to the media to underscore his point.

In connection with the brawl that accompanied the Raiders' come-from-behind 24-17 victory that day, Raider Greg Townsend was ordered suspended for one game. The Raiders indignantly pleaded innocent to all charges of misconduct.

Mackovic would just as soon forget about the accusations of October. But he knews the Raiders won't forget.

"I think it's important to know that I feel strongly that everyone connected with the Raiders and the Chiefs want the NFL to be good, to be respected, to prosper and have the games played as well as they can be played," he said.

"I think both teams will probably look at the tapes, decide what they have to do to win the game, prepare and go with it in that regard," Mackovic said.

Whatever happened to purple pride?

I have spent many a column writing of my memories of K-State's great days — days of pride in this school.

It only seems fitting that the "rah-rah sports editor" retire in style by leaving his readers with the hope he has so often tried to instill in them.

The thought is simple; having pride in your school and interacting with the activities of the institution are vital components to a complete college experience.

In spite of athletics being the most visible reflection of a student body's school pride, I'm not just speaking of athletics.

This school is represented by numerous clubs — both academic and athletic — which represent this University in competitions. This school is blessed with numerous scholars — both students and faculty — who have gained national recognition for their studies.

Too often, this University is somehow categorized as second to the University of Kansas. Too often, K-Staters place themselves in this position.

I have never regretted my decision to attend K-State rather than Kansas, and everytime I speak with a person from KU, I am reminded of why I chose to be a Wildcat. K-State is a friendly place which has been stereotyped with a false image.

K-State is a complete institution — not just a "country" school.

Not that a "country" image is bad, but it is an incomplete reflection on the makeup of this school. This false image will be perpetuated until the students and faculty of this school take the steps to attempt to stop it.

As I said, athletics is the most visible and most often used exhibition of school pride. It is time to use this method to help get this school rolling again.

Just five years ago, it was difficult to get a ticket into the door of Ahearn Field House to watch a men's basketball game. Granted, the fact that the Wildcat basketball team was in the top-20 of the national rankings had much to do with this.

In the years following, the team's talent level dropped drastically, and so did average attendance figures in Ahearn Field House. This was somewhat understandable since those teams were often less exciting than the average intramural squad.

Then came a man named Norris Coleman and the attendance figures rose slightly. Yet, Ahearn didn't rock like it once did.

No one man is a team, and not even Coleman's talents were enough to raise the lowly Wildcats much further than they had been in prior years.

This year's team under Lon Kruger is exciting. The talent Kruger has shipped in, combined with the returnees, are fun to watch. Wildcat basketball is once again entertaining.

Yet, the stands remain a third empty.

Let this school rise again and let it start with active support of K-State basketball team — a team of which everyone involved with this school can be proud.

College bowl games show marriage between sports, corporate sponsors

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the second of a three-part series titled "Corporate Sponsorships in College Athletics." The series will run through Thursday on the sports page.

Postseason college football bowls are the most perceptible example of the marriage between athletic events and corporate sponsors.

Some of these games now recognize titles such as the Sunkist/Fiesta Bowl, the John Hancock/Sun Bowl and the Sea World/Holiday Bowl.

"This is all relatively new because of the present dollar in the bowl business," said Bob Minnix, staff liaison of the National Collegiate Athletic Association's postseason football bowl committee.

"The advertising dollar is not what it used to be so consequently the bowls are going to have to make up for the lost dollars through other means," he said. "One of these is having corporate sponsors put up those dollars to fill the tremendous needs the bowls feel they have to fill."

After repeatedly losing the television ratings race to the Orange Bowl and losing advertising revenue in the process, the Sugar Bowl became the first major New Year's Day bowl game to accept a corporate sponsorship by signing a five-year agreement with the USF&G corporation.

The bowl picture took a strange twist this season when the Sunkist/Fiesta Bowl was able to outbid the Cotton, Sugar, Orange and Flordia Citrus bowls and lured No. 1-ranked Miami and No. 2 Penn State to Arizona for a national title clash Jan. 2.

Why?

— Additional revenues available because of ties with a corporate sponsor.

— Additional television monies received when the networks realized this was a possible national championship game.

— Miami and Penn State are both independents and the Fiesta doesn't have ties with any conference.

— The guaranteed $2.5 million to each team.

It's still quite a feat when one considers the Sugar, Cotton and Orange bowls pay in the neighborhood of $2 million to each team.

The Rose Bowl remains the "granddaddy" of all the postseason contests because it pays $4-million plus to each school, but it is committed to hosting representatives from the Pac-10 and Big-10 conferences.

Corporate $ponsorship$ in College Athletic$

According to the Nov. 17 issue of Sports Illustrated, the reaction from some of the major bowl committee members was pure disbelief:

— Bidding for teams is an "interesting form of prostitution," said the Sugar Bowl's Mickey Holmes.

— "The whole thing has gotten out of hand," said Jim Brock of the Cotton Bowl.

— And Stan Marks of the Orange Bowl said, "If you want to get rid of the bowls, this is a damn good start."

K-State's Athletic Director Larry Travis said he can understand why a bowl committee would seek a corporate sponsor.

"Those people have to have influx of dollars," K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis said. "They've got to pay (a guaranteed amount) to those teams, and they can only sell so many tickets and there's only so much television revenue. They're looking for national exposure and that's one way to get it."

Sponsoring a postseason contest is perfectly legal, but it has raised the ever-watchful eye of the NCAA, according to Minnix.

"This is all accelarated in the last year or so, and it's really gotten to the point where there's going to be a lot of discussion on our committee before next year's bowls," he said.

"At this point, there is nothing wrong or illegal about bowls being sponsored or...taking on the name of a corporate sponsor. All we ask is that anytime a bowl changes its name in any way, that they get approval of the name change through our committee."

Because top teams are now able to secure big bucks in postseason competition, the nation's perennial powerhouses are making it a habit of compiling easier schedules.

It also results in more wealth and exposure for college programs without visibility and credibility.

Cincinnati played and lost to both Miami (45-13) and Penn State (23-17) this season in addition to being shellacked by Auburn (52-7). But thanks to its murderous schedule, the Bearcats made a rare appearance on network TV when they played the Nittany Lions and drew a record crowd of 29,546 at Nippert Stadium when the Hurricanes came to town.

Guarantees for games against such juggernauts are great — about $100,000 — and playing top teams also aids in recruiting, said Cincinnati's athletic director Carl Meyer in the Nov. 24 Sports Illustrated.

Coaches and players at schools such as Cincinnati will admit they don't like getting beat up on Saturday afternoon by nationally ranked squads.

But the "have-nots" of the collegiate athletic world need the big one-time pay day from the "haves" to keep their respective athletic departments alive.

Big Eight basketball facilities that showed those schools with newly built or newly renovated arenas were pulling ahead in the "win column," presumably because schools with better facilities could recruit the better athletes, Rassette said.

"We said we would go out individually, so as to get the greatest coverage and with the least amount of strain on our individual schedules. This also gave us invaluable experience in addressing large groups alone," Rassette added.

The comparison study also addressed the options of building a new facility or fixing up the old one, Rassette said. This option might give the University a better basketball arena but it would not help the problem of attracting performers and groups who can draw huge crowds and also want good acoustics, he said.

The group talked to architects who had dealt with the question before. They asked, "What does it take to build a facility with good acoustics and will seat 25,000 to 30,000 people comfortably?"

"When Sam spoke to the Student Senate, it was a real 'fire-and-brimstone speech.' He told them the issue would go nowhere unless the students backed it all the way," Rassette said. "The rest is history."

"Sam and I really ruffled some feathers. Mitch came along later to 'smooth things out.' He was good at that," Rassette said.

At 29, Rassette is a district director for Automatic Data Processing, in Lenexa.

Hearings

sideshow" and said it was time for critics of Reagan to "get off his back." Nixon's comments were made during a closed-door meeting with Republican governors in Parisappany, N.J.

—Jimmy Carter said Reagan appears to be trying to hide the facts.

Reagan appears to want the Congress to have to dig for the facts, meaning they will come out piecemeal "and that could be more damaging," Carter said in an interview in Atlanta.

In another development, Rep. Charles Wilson, D-Texas, who strongly supports covert U.S. aid to Afghan guerillas said he had been assured by CIA Director William Casey that the mixing of money for Nicaragua's Contras with Afghan aid was a clerical error and did not divert any money intended for the Aghans.

Poindexter and North had previously declined to answer questions during private session of the Senate Intelligence Committee, and North later Tuesday cited the Fifth Amendment during an appearance before the House Intelligence Committee, said a committee source who declined to be named publicly.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said he was frustrated by the repeated refusals by Poindexter and North to testify.

"I wish the White House would stop talking about the tremendous cooperation they're showing, when the people they used throughout this (arms deal) keep coming up and taking the Fifth," Leahy said in a telephone interview from Puerto Rico, where he said he was on a "working vacation."

"The PR (public relations) folks at the White House might not like it, but it would be a lot more factual if they just said, 'We are not going to guarantee you cooperation,'" Leahy said. "From the people most closely involved, we are not getting cooperation."

Knowledgeable congressional sources said the intelligence investigations were pursuing, among other issues, the question of what happened to the money paid by Iran in the arms purchase and deposited in Swiss bank accounts. Much of the questioning is aimed at determining how much of the proceeds actually went for Contra aid and how much may have wound up with middlemen including arms merchants and brokers, said the sources, speaking on grounds of anonymity.

Poindexter and North, each accompanied to the witness table by their attorneys, repeatedly told the Foreign Affairs panel they wanted to be helpful and to assist the lawmakers in uncovering the facts.

He admitted drinking beer on that occasion.

Nov. 24, Torres was notified by Brian Wheeler, chancellor of the Tribunal and senior in animal sciences and industry, that the Tribunal had overturned the decision put down by the Marlatt Hall Judicial Board.

Wheeler said the Tribunal does not decide "guilt or innocence," but instead its function is to determine if a previous trial by a lower board was properly conducted or if the student's rights were violated.

The letter stated, "Although Tribunal felt that Mr. Torres was in fact guilty of several acts of misconduct, the Board agreed that removal from the residence hall system was too harsh a sanction."

Even though the Tribunal overturned the Marlatt Hall Judicial Board's decision, they did require Torres to move to a residence hall on the east side of campus (Haymaker, Moore or Putnam) immediately.

Meanwhile, Torres said he began taking posters off his dorm walls in anticipation of moving to another residence hall following the Tribunal's decision.

However, Torres said the action by the housing department halted any move from Marlatt Hall. He will continue to stay there until Wefald renders a decision.

When he returned from Thanksgiving break, Torres received a letter from the housing department, dated Nov. 25, informing him that they had appealed the decision made by the Tribunal.

It was signed by Robert Felde, assistant director of housing, stating, "The recent revision of judicial sanction by the Student Tribunal has been appealed to the University President."

Troubled by the housing department's appeal, Torres, a Hispanic, is concerned that it might be racially motivated.

"I think there might be prejudice because of my race," he said.

Frith discounted any allegations of discrimination within the department and cited the department's track record in minority employee relations.

After the housing department's appeal, Torres wrote to Wefald that he felt a SGA bylaw prevents the housing department from appealing any decision handed down in his case.

According to bylaw Article 5, Section 6.A.11., an appeal can be formed only if the defendant is found guilty.

Based on the clause, Torres said this should exclude the housing department from filing any type of appeal.

Frith said, "Any action that we would be involved with (in the Torres case) would be in accordance with the established SGA constitution."

Torres said the president's office has requested him to write a second letter specifically relating to the charges that were brought against him by the hall judicial board.

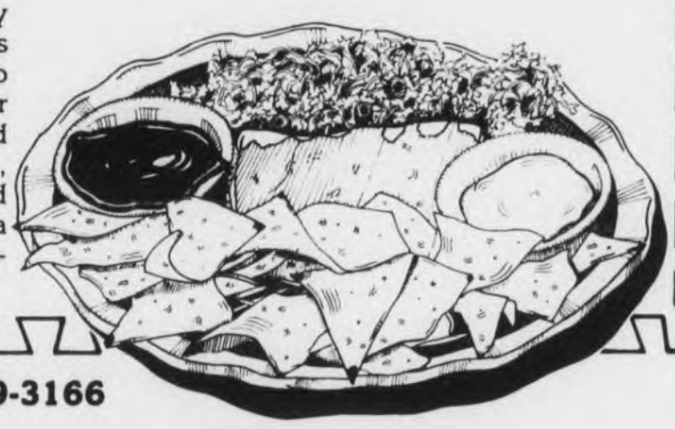
William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, said he has reviewed the case. He said he has no judicial power, but he can advise Wefald on what he feels should be done.

"The President has the case and my advice," Sutton said. "I don't know when he plans to make a decision."

Wefald said no decision has been made yet in the case.

Frith said any students removed from the residence halls for disciplinary reasons can be forced to pay for the duration of the contract, but in Torres' case there will be no financial penalty incurred.

However, Torres said that he would prefer staying in the residence halls.



"I might not have any choice but to move out," Torres said.

WE'RE PAYING CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS NOW!

10% off any Non Textbook Items at Varney's BOOK STORE IN AGGIEVILLE

SELL YOUR BOOKS AT VARNEY'S
(regardless of where you bought them)
AND GET YOUR YELLOW TOKEN

★Get your yellow token, which is good for 10% off any non-textbook items, when you sell your books during dead week or final week. You decide what the token is worth by the amount you purchase. THE MORE YOU BUY THE MORE YOU SAVE! You can use the token whenever you want. Use it for Christmas purchases or use it next semester.

★Bring all your books to Varney's (regardless of where you bought them) and our buyers will value them individually. You choose what you want to sell! WE BUY BOOKS EVERY DAY! However, you can usually get the most for your books by selling them to us at the end of the semester.

★The price we pay for books is determined mainly by two factors—if the books will be used again at K-State and if we need the books for our stock. If we cannot buy your books for our stock, we will offer you the best price we can, based on the national market.

★Remember, it's what you get for all your books that counts, and we think that the wholesaler we buy for pays the highest prices.

★We know you're busy and in a hurry so we have four buyers to take care of you. We try to keep the time you spend in line to a minimum. We also buy until 9 at night during dead week and until 10 at night during final week.

Senator says Casey testimony reveals errors

CIA director denies knowing profits sent

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — CIA Director William Casey, in five hours of secret, sworn congressional testimony, denied Wednesday that he knew the profits from U.S. arms sales to Iran were being transferred to Nicaraguan Contra rebels, lawmakers reported.

But Rep. Dante Fascell, D-Fla., chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said Casey did offer specifics "with regard to a lot of information which we did not have on the record before" concerning the unraveling scandal that has engulfed the Reagan administration.

Fascell added, "When all of the dots are eventually linked on this, it will be, I won't use the word incredible, but it certainly will be extraordinary." He added that he hopes the whole story will be uncovered soon.

Rep. William S. Broomfield of Michigan, the senior Republican on the committee, said, "The good news is that Mr. Casey was pretty candid with us and none of what he had to say in any way indicates that the president knew or should have known of any wrongdoing.

"The bad news is that what Mr. Casey told us indicates serious errors of judgment by senior CIA personnel," Broomfield said, adding, "That needs to be corrected."

Casey testified as Republicans and Democrats sparred over whether congressional committees investigating the Iran-Contra connection should grant immunity from prosecution to key witnesses who have refused to discuss what they know.

One of those witnesses, Vice Adm. John Poindexter, President Reagan's former national security adviser, met for only about 10 minutes behind closed doors with the House Intelligence Committee. Previously, Poindexter has cited his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination in refusing to testify before the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Rep. Robert Roe, D-N.J., said Poindexter again invoked the Fifth Amendment in his brief appearance before the House Intelligence Committee.

That panel also heard secret testimony from Robert M. Gates, the

Schultz tells allies scandal unlike Watergate

By The Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Wednesday that he told America's staunchest allies the Iranian arms sale scandal is nothing like Watergate because President Reagan wants the facts disclosed.

Shultz, in Brussels for a two-day meeting with NATO foreign ministers, acknowledged that the allies had some jitters about the impact of the Reagan administration's problems on U.S. foreign policy and their own. The secretary said he tried in London on Tuesday to allay their concerns.

"They want us to be strong and capable of leadership, and they are reassured to see how the president is dealing with it," he said in an account of his talks in the British capital with Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, French Foreign Minister Jean-Bernard Raimond and West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

"I am, the President is, and all of us are working very hard on the many opportunities and problems we have to work within the foreign policy area," Shultz said.

Shultz, who held three major posts in the administration of Richard Nixon, said he told them Reagan's approach was in "absolutely total contrast with Watergate, where the problem was a reluctance to let facts out."

Even so, Lord Carrington, NATO's secretary general, said shortly after Shultz's arrival the Reagan administration's difficulties were bound to have a bearing on U.S. foreign policy.

"I think what the Europeans will wish to hear is some words of reassurance that the administration will continue to pursue the policies that it has in those matters which affect the alliance," Carrington said in response to a question at a news conference.

Some West European leaders have expressed concern the administration might be so preoccupied with the controversy that it could either neglect nuclear weapons negotiations with the Soviet Union or leap into questionable agreements.

Shultz said Monday that the scandal provided the Kremlin nothing "to exploit." He said only agreements that were in the interest of the United States would be pursued.

Panel selects American for Nobel Prize

By The Associated Press

OSLO, Norway — Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, an American writer and human rights advocate, received the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize Wednesday and said the honor belonged to all survivors of the Nazi death camps and their children.

Norwegian Nobel Committee Chairman Egil Aarvik gave Wiesel the gold medal and diploma at ceremonies in Oslo University's Aula Festival Hall attended by 800 people, including King Olaf V and government leaders. The prize also includes $290,000.

The award was "in recognition of this particular human spirit's victory over the powers of death and degradation, and as a support to the rebellion against evil in the world, ...," Aarvik said.

The Nobel prizes for physics, chemistry, medicine, economics and literature were presented Wednesday in Stockholm, Sweden.

In a departure from tradition, Wiesel's teen-age son, Shlomo Elisha, was invited to join his father on the podium for the awarding of the prize.

Obviously moved, the 58-year-old Wiesel asked the king's permission to say a brief blessing. "Thank you oh Lord, for giving us this day," he said.

In an emotional acceptance speech, Wiesel said: "Do I have the right to represent the multitudes who have perished? Do I have the right to accept this great honor on their behalf? I do not. No one may speak for the dead, no one may interpret their mutilated dreams and visions....

"This honor belongs to all the survivors and their children, and through us, to the Jewish people with whose destiny I have always identified..."

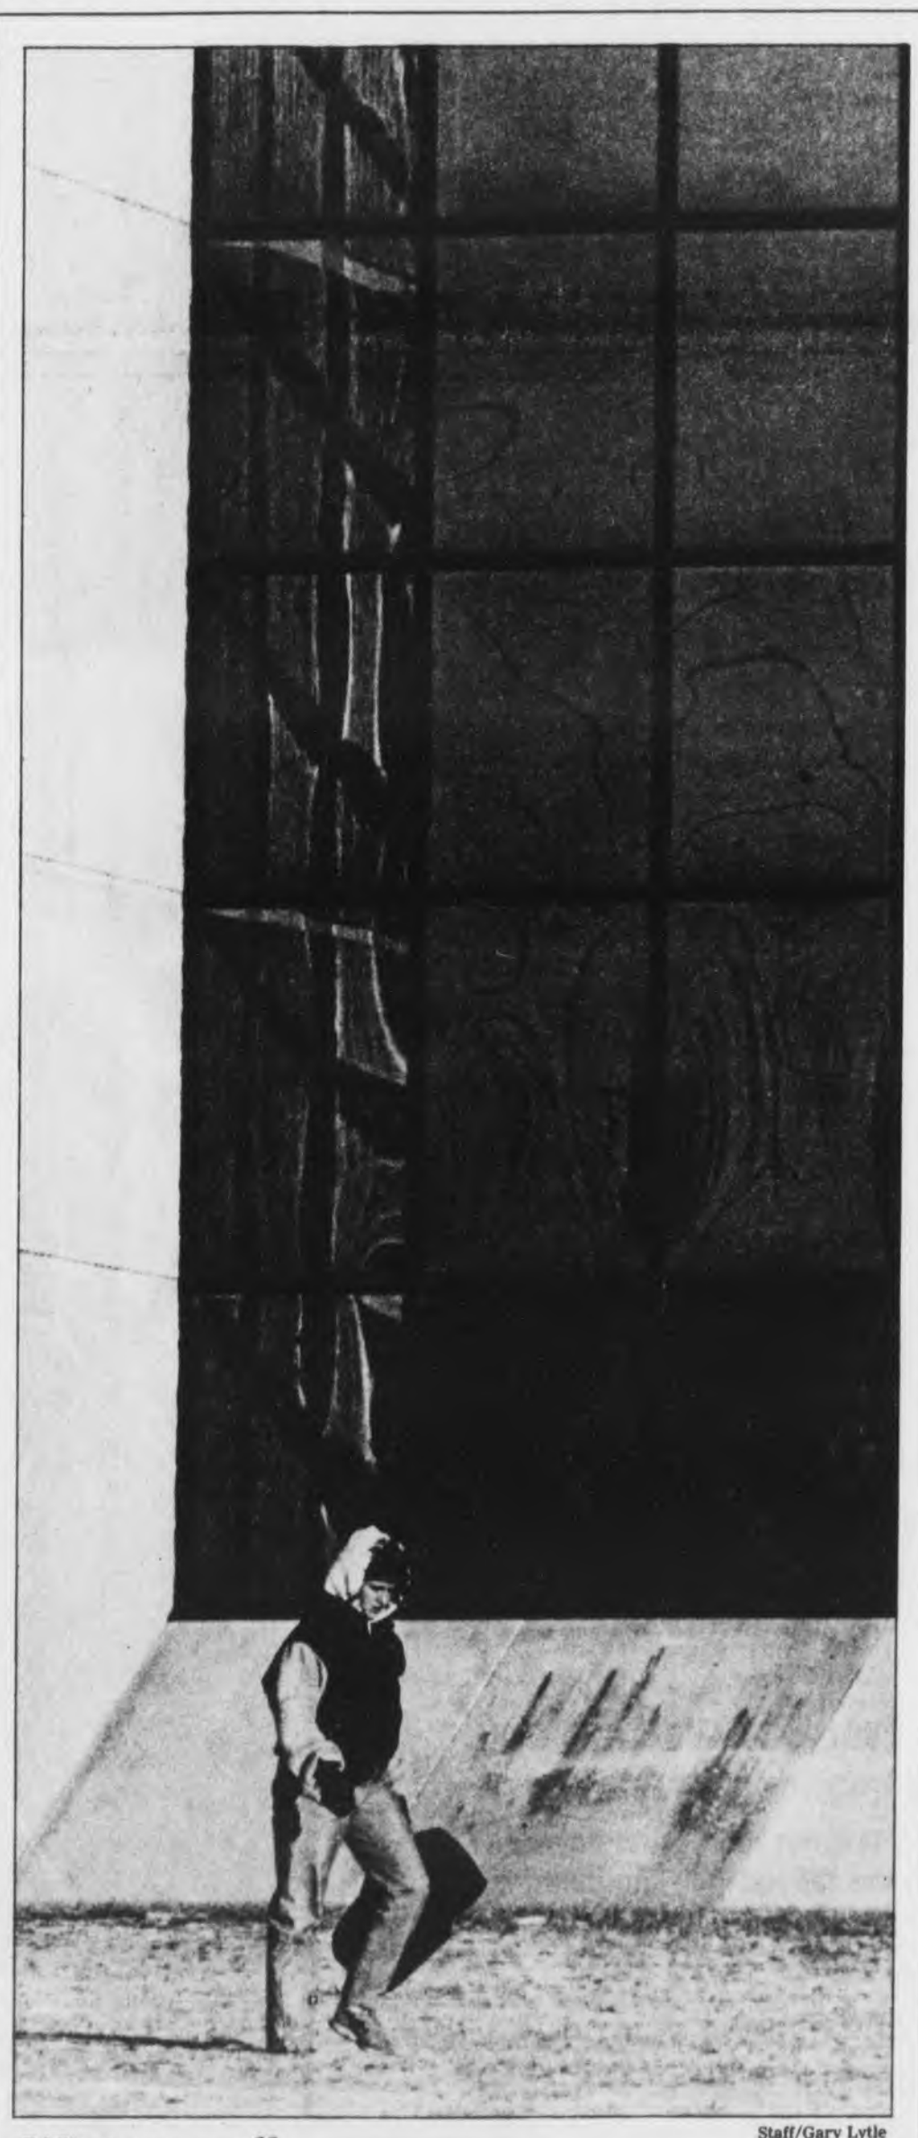
Wiesel said it "would be unnatural for me not to make Jewish priorities my own: Israel, Soviet Jewery, Jews in Arab lands ... but there are others as important to me."

He said Palestinians were a people "to whose plight I am sensitive but whose methods I deplore when they lead to violence."

"Both the Jewish people and the Palestinian people have lost too many sons and shed too much blood. This must stop, and all attempts to stop it must be encouraged," he said.

Aarvik noted it has been 50 years since the peace prize was awarded to Carl von Ossietzky, the German pacifist who prior to World War II warned of the Nazi threat to democracy.

"His testimony was, however, also his doom — Ossietzky did not survive his meeting with the terrible regime which had established itself in the heart of Europe. Today, 50 years later, the peace prize is to be presented to one who survived," Aarvik said.



"From the abyss of the death camps he has come as a messenger to mankind — not with a message of hate and revenge, but with one of brotherhood and atonement," he said. "Elie Wiesel is not only the man who survived — he is also the spirit which has conquered."

The other Nobel prizes and their winners were:

—For literature, Nigeria Wole Soyinka, a playwright, poet and novelist, and the first African ever to receive the prize.

—For medicine, American Stanley Cohen

Faculty, staff support energy-cutting actions, extension director says

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

Faculty and staff are taking University President Jon Wefald's energy cost-saving measures more seriously than they have similar measures in the past, said Richard Hayter, director of the Kansas Energy Extension Service.

"The attitude about conserving energy is much more positive this time," he said. "People are acknowledging the fact that the University is in a financial crunch, and are more willing to contribute to this effort."

Wefald's cost-saving measures include setting all daytime building temperatures at 70 degrees Fahrenheit, and night-time building temperatures at 55 degrees Fahrenheit. No air conditioning will be provided before May 4, 1987.

Also, Wefald has ordered that "all but extremely essential University activity be curtailed," and that building temperatures remain at 55 degrees Fahrenheit from 6 p.m., Dec. 24 to 8 a.m., Jan. 5. During this time, employees are "encouraged to take annual or compensatory leave."

For this measure to be successful, "Universitywide cooperation" is necessary, Hayter said.

Such cooperation includes allowing University Facilities to set the thermostats and leaving them alone, he said. The use of electric heaters is also a violation of Wefald's measure.

"Several of the older campus buildings don't have the ability for automatic temperature setback," Hayter said. "That is one investment the state could have made years back, but didn't."

Hayter explained that in several campus buildings, the temperature in certain areas, or zones, is controlled by the same thermostat. Because of this, every individual's cooperation in the measure is important, he said.

"One individual resetting of a thermostat that controls the temperature of an entire floor of a building could sizably increase the University's energy costs," Hayter said.

Funding is needed to make campus buildings more energy efficient, he said.

"The University has not received adequate funding to control energy costs," Hayter said. "The state doesn't recognize what a positive investment improving the energy.efficiency of these buildings would be."

Wefald's decision to halt all but extremely necessary University activity from Dec. 24 to Jan. 5 could contribute to the proposed cost-saving plan, but could be detrimental to the University in other ways, Hayter said.

"We have to recognize that whenever campus buildings are shut down it will have a negative effect on the University," he said.

Hayter said this period is an uninterrupted, productive time for faculty members because they can devote 100 percent of their attention to research.

Closing the University buildings during the month of August could prove to be a cost-saving measure, he said.

The University's electricity use peaks in either August or September, due to air conditioning use. If this peak would occur in August, and the University was closed, the total energy bill would be less, he said.

Hayter also recommends closing the University in August because it is a month many faculty members take their vacations.

Attorneys affirm, condemn teaching of creation-science in Supreme Court litigation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Teaching creationism alongside evolution in public schools was attacked as an attempt to "give God equal time" and defended as true academic freedom in a lively Supreme Court debate Wednesday.

The court is to decide by July whether lower courts were right in striking down a Louisiana l[illegible] that required the teaching of evolution to be "balanced" by teaching creation-science.

The lower courts said the law violates the constitutionally required separation of church and state by disguising religion as science.

But Atlanta lawyer Wendell Bird defended the law, telling the justices, "Creation-science is scientific material, non-religious material."

He said the law mainly promotes "basic concepts of fairness and academic freedom...and gives students all the scientific evidence."

Bird's portrayal of the law and its purpose was attacked by Jay Topkis, a New York City lawyer.

"Oh sure, academic freedom — 'We've got to give God equal time.' That's their idea of academic freedom," Topkis argued.

The Louisiana Legislature enacted the Balanced Treatment for Creation-Science and Evolution-Science Act in 1981 but it was struck down before ever being enforced.

Creation-science parallels a literal translation of the biblical version in Genesis, stating that Earth and most life forms came into existence suddenly about 6,000 years ago.

Evolution, first propounded by Charles Darwin, teaches that Earth is billions of years old and that life forms developed gradually several million years ago.

Bird urged the justices to give Louisiana officials the chance to explain fully what creation-science is at a trial. He noted that the law was struck down without any such trial.

"Creation-science is educationally worthwhile," he said.

But Topkis called it "pseudo-science," and called creationism "a basically fundamen-

Hayden, Docking spend $3 million

TOPEKA — Mike Hayden and Tom Docking spent a combined $3.02 million in the race for governor of Kansas, or slightly less than the two major-party candidates spent in 1982, according to campaign finance reports filed Wednesday in the secretary of state's office.

Hayden, an Atwood Republican who won the Nov. 4 general election, ended up spending $1.3 million to win the state's highest elected office. Docking, Kansas' Democratic lieutenant governor the past four years, ran up bills of $1.72 million, or about $419,000 more than Hayden.

Attorney General Robert T. Stephan, a Wichita Republican, collected $649,745 and spent $725,150 in winning re-election to an unprecedented third four-year term as the state's chief law enforcement office.

Dennis Moore, the Democratic Johnson County prosecutor who unsuccessfully challenged the incumbent, raised $465,610 in his losing effort and spent $466,885.

Kansas primaries may restructure

TOPEKA — Spokesmen for the Democratic and Republican Parties of Kansas were sharply divided Wednesday over whether this state should open up its primary elections to independent voters.

Jim Parrish of Topeka, chairman of the state Democratic Party, hailed the decision and said he hopes his party takes advantage of it to expand participation in its primaries.

Eric Rucker, executive director of the state Republican Party, said the GOP likes Kansas' present closed primary. He said he doubted his party would want to open up its primaries to allow independents to vote in them.

What raised the issue was a U.S. Supreme Court decision made public Wednesday in Washington, D.C.

Deciding a case which originated in Connecticut, the Supreme Court ruled 5-4 that states cannot bar independents from voting in primary elections if the political parties want to open their primaries to them.

OSHA says glycol ethers pose risk

WASHINGTON — The Occupational Safety and Health Administration on Wednesday agreed with another agency that on-the-job exposure to four chemcials, known as glycol ethers, pose "significant" birth defect risks to potentially hundreds of thousands of workers.

But OSHA said it first wants to spend some time "examining options" before drafting new regulations that it agreed could greatly reduce or prevent those risks posed by the widely used industrial chemicals.

The official "preliminary determination" by OSHA that the risks exist and can be reduced through government regulation is the latest step in seven years of sometimes-bitter wrangling among various agencies over glycol ethers.

The Environmental Protection Agency, which essentially forced the action Wednesday by OSHA, estimates that between 206,000 and 350,000 workers are at a "high risk" of suffering damage to their testicles, reduced fertility, fetus abnormalities or nerve and bone marrow damage at currently allowable exposures.

Officials confirm Honduran attacks

WASHINGTON — Reagan administration officials confirmed Wednesday that Honduran jets struck targets inside Nicaraguan territory last weekend.

But they denied charges by Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega that Honduras carried out the raids at the request of the United States.

The Los Angeles Times quoted sources in Honduras on Wednesday as saying U.S. officials were not told the Hondurans planned to attack positions inside Nicaragua and that the Americans were distressed to learn of the bombing runs.

But U.S. officials, who asked not to be identified, said the administration had not taken a position on the propriety of the Honduran action.

The Honduran government denied again Wednesday that it had undertaken any raids inside Nicaragua, but Sandinista military officials showed reporters craters and shrapnel in the town of Wiwili that they attributed to Honduran bombing runs.

The Sandinistas said that the air strikes left seven soldiers killed and 12 wounded. The town is located about 16 miles from the border. Nicaragua said an army post at Murra, 11 miles northwest of Wiwili, also was attacked.

Iranian hardliner confesses murder

NICOSIA, Cyprus — The former head of Iran's revolution-for-export office and an opponent of overtures to Washington has confessed to murder and collaboration with the Shah's secret police, official Iranian media reported Wednesday.

The accusations against him, which reportedly included sowing discord in the government, usually bring the death penalty.

Mehdi Hashemi is the brother of the son-in-law of Ayatollah Hussein Ali Montazeri, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's designated successor. Hashemi is a hardliner who sought to torpedo efforts to open channels between Iran and the United States.

Tehran radio and the Islamic Republic News Agency, monitored in Nicosia, said Hashemi confessed Tuesday night on Iranian television. The radio and IRNA quoted him as saying he used Montazeri's office to cover his crimes and "gross deviations."

The arrest of Hashemi and his supporters in October was seen as part of a power struggle between factions led by Parliament Speaker Hashemi Rafsanjani, who reportedly masterminded arms purchases from the United States, and Montazeri, who opposed links with Washington.

N.Y. theater critic discusses experiences from London trip

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Exciting differences in the structure of musicals and the strength of humanity in stage plays have continued to make English theater strong, Norman Nadel, president emeritus of the New York Critics association and former visiting professor at K-State, said Wednesday.

Nadel will be on campus through Saturday when he will receive an honorary doctorate of fine arts degree from the College of Arts and Sciences.

Nadel described two musical productions and three plays he saw while on a recent trip to London as he spoke to about 60 people in Nichols Theater. Nadel saw eight shows during a November visit to London.

Of the three musicals he saw, Nadel said all were constructed like operas, a change which he viewed with excitement.

"The old idea of a musical was a little theater, a little bit of a play, a scene or comedy and a dance act, talk and another song. In the musicals I saw, there was barely a total of minutes of spoken dialogue, the total of them," he said.

Nadel specifically described two musicals which struck him as the most exciting — "Les Miserables" and "The Phantom of the Opera."

The stage adaptation of Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables" is immense, Nadel said. The production is 3½ hours long and is performed on a rotating stage.

"If anyone had said to any one of us a few years ago that they are going to make this into a musical, you know we would have just fell through the floor because "Les Miserables" is a big book," he said.

Hugo began working on "Les Miserables" in 1845 and completed the work in 1861. The book is more than 1,000 pages long.

The musical follows the life of Jean Valjean in the early 1800s in France after he is convicted of stealing a loaf of bread and sent to prison for 19 years. After prison he struggles to rise from the stigma of being a prisoner, but is rejected. In desperation, he steals from a bishop who has taken him in for the night. When arrested and taken back to him, the bishop is compassionate, even though he has the power to send him back to prison. Valjean turns his life around and eventually becomes mayor of his village and the adventures continue until his death.

Nadel had an inner concern that the play might end low-key but believed the length of the production and the depth of the performances would require a final "big number."

The final piece begins as Jean Valjean dies. He steps back into what is perceived as the afterlife and the other members of the cast move forward with him to form the chorus and perform "one hell of a number at the end," Nadel said.

He said the performance of the musical is an immense accomplishment in itself.

"There is such an abundance of drama that you have in some of these very large, great novels that to me the wonder of it is that they could get so much of it into one single stage performance," Nadel said.

"The Phantom of the Opera" was perhaps the most spectacular musical Nadel saw on his London theater swing.

"It is a musical tour de force," he said.

The musical score for the production was written by Andrew Lloyd Weber, perhaps one of the finest composers in the theater today, Nadel said. Weber also wrote "Evita," "Cats" and "Jesus Christ Superstar" as well as several other pieces.

"What he is writing is changing the sound of musical theater," Nadel said.

The "Phantom of the Opera" is the story of a man, the phantom, who inhabits the Paris Opera House and knows it thoroughly. He controls the lives of people in the opera house with his knowledge.

The Paris Opera House was a 17-story building which also descended seven stories underground. Under the seventh story, below ground, was a lake.

From his front-row seat Nadel had the opportunity to view this surprising musical.

At one point in the show, a huge chandelier rises six stories to the ceiling of Her Majesty's Theatre barely sweeping by Nadel. He said the chandelier cleared the conductors head by about 2 feet and his head by 5 feet.

"It is a tremendous thing," Nadel said. "It swings out over the audience and I ducked and I turned and I saw everybody duck in that same way. It was really hair-raising.

"It was the first of two times in that performanmce that I found myself in an unusual situation for me. I had been surprised to realize that my jaw was dropped and my mouth was open," he said.

Just as shocking is when the chandelier falls, Nadel said.

"It comes roaring down and you have inside that building a six story ceiling so it has a little time so they had it fall fast and it flattened the audience," he said. The audience screamed wildly and this was the second time Nadel noticed his jaw had dropped.

Nadel said this is one of the finest productions he has seen and apparently others like it as well, the musical is sold out until September 1987.

"There is such an abundance of plot, the content of the music and the intense theatricality that you come out with the thought that if you didn't get back to the theater in three years you would have this to think about," he said.

Nadel also discussed three plays.

"The Petition" is a small play which explores the life of two old, married people who begin to discover intricacies in their relationship after years of marriage.

The play is a two-character piece featuring Sir John Mills and Rosemary Harris.

"It was such an absolute delight to see utterly exquisite acting by two of the best people that you can encounter on the stage today," he said.

Nadel found this to be a play that evoked a wide range of emotion, but particularly understanding.

Mills plays a retired general in his 80s and Harris plays his wife, in her 70s. The two begin discussing their lives after he discovers her name in a newspaper story about banning the use of the nuclear bomb. Mills finds out she is dying of cancer in the course of the play and is terribly upset.

"It's not 'socko' kind of stuff but it's the sort of stuff that keeps peeling back and peeling back about these people," Nadel said.

He found this play so vital in life; the fact the characters are old is unimportant.

"There is this joy of watching two stunning actors performing in a deftly written play," he said. "At times, I get the attitude that young people think there is not passion, violence, erotic imaging, desire and fulfillment in old people and there is. And there is in this play."

"Woman in Mind" by Alan Ayckbourn is an unusual play for this author, Nadel said. Known for his comedies, he said Ayckbourn wanted to write more than comedy.

"I think this is the play that reveals him as a man with far deeper dimension than just that of comedy," he said.

The play focuses on the life of a woman who lives in a fantasy world in which her life is perfect. She uses this fantasy to escape her horrible marriage to a boring Episcopal priest.

"I'm Not Rappaport," by Herb Gardner was recognized last year as one of the best plays on the stage and is gaining similar accolades across the Atlantic Ocean, Nadel said.

Set in New York City's Central Park, it is a play about two old men who try to understand each other through their conversations on a park bench.

Nat, played by Paul Schofield, is a compulsive liar who claims to have been a Hollywood mogul, among other things.

Nick, played by Howard Rollins, who was in the movie "A Soldier's Story," was a former Golden Gloves champion in 1925.

There are many subplots thrown in as well, with a beautiful young sketch artist who is apparently on drugs and resorts to prostitution to pay for her habits. Nick is escorted home every day by a young mugger whom he pays $3 so he won't get mugged and eventually this leads to problems.

Nadel found this to be a play for everyone to enjoy because of the fine acting and the humanity.

"You laugh at them and you laugh with them and you go out of the theater with a very special kind of warmth," he said.

He will present another speech, "Photography as Art" at 2:30 p.m. Friday in Kedzie Hall 210.

College recognizes student for contributions

By The Collegian Staff

The "Student of the Semester" was recognized by the College of Arts and Sciences Wednesday for the outstanding quality of his work and his contributions to the college, said Jack Taylor, chairman of the selection committee and sophomore in microbiology.

Martin Monto, senior in sociology and life science, was selected "Student of the Semester" by the committee based on his application, a 500-word essay and a 15-minute interview. The essay required applicants to describe how their arts and sciences education will help in the future, he said.

Monto said his essay focused on how the many different ideas presented in an arts and sciences curriculum can be applied to all parts of life.

He said he has always wanted to apply for the award but this was the first semester he considered himself to be a "potential candidate."

The award is designed to "recognize an outstanding student in the college and to reward him for his work," said Shelly Wakeman, member of the selection committee and junior in radio and television.

A student is selected each semester for the honor which is sponsored by the Arts and Sciences Council and the college. Monto will receive a plaque and a $100 award as "Student of the Semester."

The selection committee, in addition to Taylor and Wakeman, was made up of Arts and Sciences council members, Shannon Fuller, junior in psychology, and Michael Morris, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, and faculty members Terry Heyns, professor of aerospace studies, and Jerry Weis, associate professor of biology.

Pre-break postal notification can help avert future delays

By The Collegian Staff

Students living off-campus need to make arrangements for mail delivered during the holidays before leaving for Christmas break, said Susan Johnson, superintendent of postal operations for Manhattan.

If no arrangements are made to discontinue mail delivery, letters not collected after 10 days will be returned to their senders, Johnson said.

Students who will be returning to the same address within 30 days of departure can have mail held at the post office, and delivery will resume upon their return.

This can be accomplished by filling out a hold form available from mail carriers and local post offices, including the campus post office in Dykstra Hall, she said.

Students who will be out of town more than 30 days can continue delivery by making arrangements for someone to pick up their mail. Another alternative is to file a temporary forwarding address by filling out cards available at post offices. Mail will then be forwarded to the temporary address, and upon return, mail service will resume.

Students who will not be returning to the same address should fill out a change-of-address form at the post office.

Union to add menu of frozen goodies

Collegian Reporter

New serving area to feature ice cream

Hand-dipped ice cream, homemade waffle cones and Flurries — ice cream blended with candy, cookies or fruit — will be coming to the Union over Christmas break, said Mallie Sisson, Union Food Service director.

As part of improvements planned for the Union Stateroom, a cone construction area will be installed as soon as all of the equipment purchased has arrived, she said.

Ice cream sundaes, soft-serve ice cream, ice cream cakes, frozen chocolate-covered bananas and ice cream sandwiches made with 6-inch Union cookies are all part of the treats planned to be provided in the Stateroom.

Sisson said she hopes construction will begin late in December and be completed in mid-January when the spring semester starts.

The building of the cone construction area is Phase Three in a five phase series, she said.

Phase One, completed this summer, included the addition of a pizza-by-the-slice counter, chicken and Mexican food areas and illuminated boards behind the food counters. Phase One cost the Union $26,000 in equipment alone, Sisson said.

During Phase Two, improvements were made on the central beverage area at a cost of $32,000, she said.

Sisson said equipment for the cone construction area will cost $42,000. She said the initial cost for the three phases is misleading because it does not take into account the Union maintenance crew labor cost to install the new systems or the cost to stock new food items.

Sisson said funding for improvements is provided by a reserve fund the Union has built through managing its investments during the past 10 years.

Although the Union is a corporation independent of the University, she said she was glad all of the improvements were approved by the Union board of directors before the 3.8 percent budget cut was handed down.

"We probably couldn't do all this neat stuff if we hadn't started it before the budget cut mandated by (University) President (Jon) Wefald, which in turn was mandated by (Gov.-elect Mike) Hayden," she said.

Hot dogs, shakes, soda-fountain sodas, nachos, cold sandwiches, fresh fruit juices and "healthy-for-you" beverages will also be available at the cone construction area, Sisson said.

The cone construction area will open at 7 a.m. along with the Stateroom, and may stay open as late as 11:30 p.m. if only one Union employee can run the area, she said.

Sisson said the Stateroom is not open later than 9 p.m. during the semester to cut the cost of labor.

The new construction will take place in the entrance to the Stateroom and along the south wall in front of the cash registers.

Sisson said new food items were chosen to appeal to more students and encourage them to come to the Stateroom more often.

A date has not been set for the beginning of Phase Four construction, which would include the installation of new cash registers with computer software to improve the handling of meal accounts held by students and several fraternities, she said.

Phase Five would constitute redecoration of the dining areas in the Stateroom. The addition of several booths and photographs of past University events is tentatively planned for the tile area near the cash registers.

Sisson said she thought the back dining area will be more contemporarily decorated, with neon lights and new graphics on the walls.

Campus budget cuts mean fewer teachers

Speculation about the severity of University budget cuts has been replaced by the hard reality of their impact. While nearly everyone expected precious little fat to remain in the budget, few predicted the cuts would go as far into the marrow as they have.

The most significant parings will affect non-tenured professors. A number of colleges have prepared their part-time instructors and graduate teaching assistants for the possibility they will not return next semester.

Furthermore, at least one college dean said positions vacated or left open last semester will not be filled in the spring. As a result of these non-renewals, there is a strong possibility some spring classes or sections will be cut.

When the ramifications of the cuts were originally discussed, no mention was made of possible class cancellations. There should have been. At least then, the University would have been better prepared.

Basically, officials indicated that belt-tightening alone would tide the University over. It won't, and it's apparent considerable sacrifices will have to be made.

Unfortunately, President Jon Wefald's trademark optimism may have had an adverse effect in this case. These are times that require straightforward honesty, and although Wefald did not lie, he was not completely candid either.

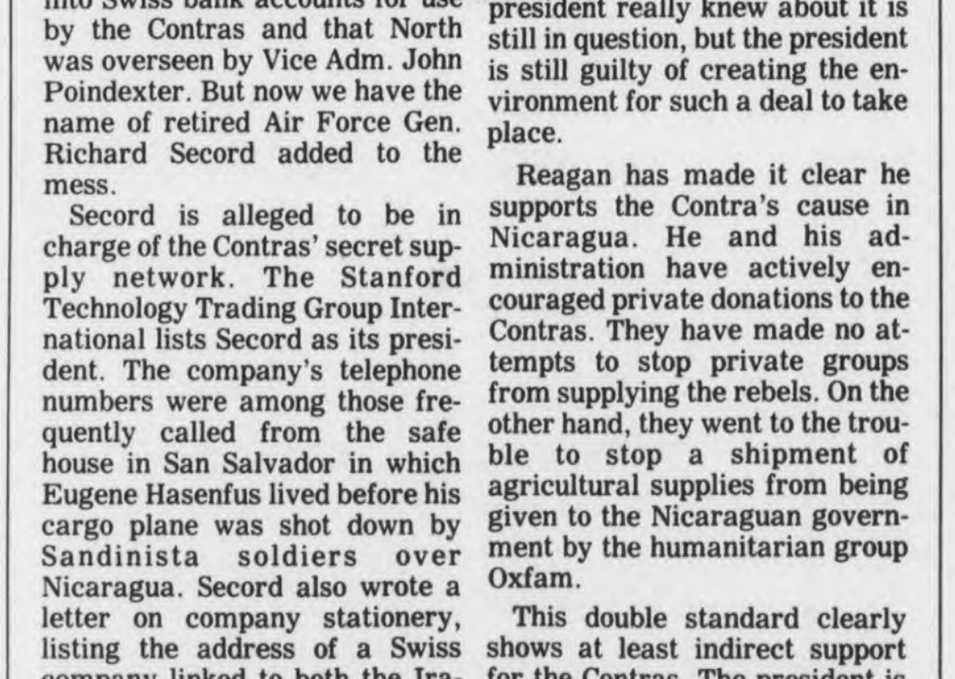
For instance, the definition of "personnel" — meaning tenured professors only — is technically correct as he used it, but Wefald should have given some indication that part-time instructors may not be asked to return, especially when that possibility could result in class cuts.

Nonetheless, cancelled classes are a definite possibility, and students can do little more than hope the classes in which they've enrolled will still exist Jan. 14.

More names join list in arms sales uproar

While the disclosure of the Iranian arms sale caused quite a stir, it is the Nicaraguan connection that has really caused the situation to burn out of control. The news that $10 million to $30 million in profits from the Iranian arms deal was illegally funneled to the anti-government Contra rebels has the nation in an uproar.

New names and connections keep popping up in the controversy. It has been alleged that Lt. Col. Oliver North funneled money into Swiss bank accounts for use by the Contras and that North was overseen by Vice Adm. John Poindexter. But now we have the name of retired Air Force Gen. Richard Secord added to the mess.



Secord is alleged to be in charge of the Contras' secret supply network. The Stanford Technology Trading Group International lists Secord as its president. The company's telephone numbers were among those frequently called from the safe house in San Salvador in which Eugene Hasenfus lived before his cargo plane was shot down by Sandinista soldiers over Nicaragua. Secord also wrote a letter on company stationery, listing the address of a Swiss company linked to both the Iranian arms deal and the Contra supply missions.

Other strange reports are also coming out about the money itself. There is much speculation that some money may have been pocketed by Contra officials and others involved with the operation. This is nothing new. Congress is still trying to account for the $27 million in humanitarian aid given them in 1984.

The real problem with the Contra connection is that it is against the law. The Boland amendment forbids the administration from aiding the Contras "directly or indirectly." President Reagan claims he knew nothing of the Nicaraguan connection with the Iran arms deal. Whether the president really knew about it is still in question, but the president is still guilty of creating the environment for such a deal to take place.

Reagan has made it clear he supports the Contra's cause in Nicaragua. He and his administration have actively encouraged private donations to the Contras. They have made no attempts to stop private groups from supplying the rebels. On the other hand, they went to the trouble to stop a shipment of agricultural supplies from being given to the Nicaraguan government by the humanitarian group Oxfam.

This double standard clearly shows at least indirect support for the Contras. The president is supposed to uphold all the laws of Congress, not just the ones he favors. For Reagan to state a policy objective and then close his eyes so he can't see any illegal activities is still complicity.

Market should rule medical system

DAVE HERMANNS
Guest Columnist

Re: Kirk Caraway's column, "Medical system needs socialization," in Tuesday's Collegian.

After reading Caraway's column on the need for socialized medicine, I was moved to write on this most delicate subject. While the points he has made deserve our serious consideration, I am convinced from my experience with the matter that Caraway's easy solution contains much that we would do well to avoid.

One receives the impression in reading his article that the root of all evil in our medical system is attached to greed and the profit motive. This may be in part true, but other factors are as much if not more to blame for this health care cost escalation. The typical patient in the United States is not satisfied with just the "mediocre" health care he has received in the past. No, we have a society that places an utmost importance on its health care. One pays for what one gets. Cited were figures of infant mortality, in which the United States lamentably scores poorly. But this is not the whole picture. Such embarrassing deficiencies are not the result of a totally inadequate system, but of bad areas within it.

We lead the world in the development of new (and often expensive) techniques. This is reflected in the general availability of specialized health services not on hand in many of those wondrous socialized utopias. They provide the basics, but their cost competitiveness stems not only from removal of the market incentive, but equally from their lack of key services.

While there may be arguments against providing health services to patients who are too old, or already too sick, we have traditionally avoided such compromises in the United States. The question whether to maintain life at all costs will not be solved by socialization. The removal of the market incentive will not turn those greedy doctors into smiling saints; they will respond by supplying sporadic and corrupt service at best. Eventually, we will see gifted individuals avoiding the field because of this.

We do not live in a society that lends itself practically or ideologically to socialism. By no means does this translate to the right to maintain our current capitalistic "if-I'm-OK-who-cares-about-you" ignorance of those in need. A full-blown socialistic medical system might work if those involved were the truly dedicated comrades Caraway imagines, but we unfortunately live in a society filled more with greed than with camaraderie. To change this will take action in other areas, not in the medical field.

When studying in West Germany, I personally experienced health care in a socialized system. Atrocities that we long ago removed from general practice in our system are still in force there. Yes, everyone receives care, but so do all the animals in the Veterinary Medicine Complex. We do not want the initiation of waiting lists for needed surgery, nor will the 66-year-old person appreciate hearing that a heart bypass is out of the question because he or she is too old.

Caraway fails to inform the reader that, while the Soviet Union and East Germany maintain an official stance of equality in health care, people with influence, power and money still receive the best care. Yes, it is correct that our system has developed glaring inadequacies that must be solved. But the buzzword "socialized" does not magically solve problems; it takes concerted constructive action.

Instead of ranting about a total socialization, why not concentrate on those areas which are now deficient? We need a broadened social medical system for the ever-growing masses of poverty stricken in the United States. The system for helping these people who need our attention is already in place. We need only to recognize its strengths and inadequacies, and give it the funding and broad coverage it needs.

We need to establish, through rational discussion, guidelines in the questioned area of maintaining life, i.e., the right to die. Doctors and family members alike are kept from exercising logical behavior regarding the patient and loved one by archaic laws written before the development of modern "wonder medicine." This is an ethical and theological question our doctors must be educated to handle. Our lawmakers also must inform themselves to act practically and efficiently.

What about the effects of rising malpractice suits? It is one of the major causes of the high cost of medicine, and again it can be handled by the concerted efforts of all parties involved — the patient, insurer, doctor, and if need be, the legislator. The patient must realize that medicine is still an art. It is the body that does the work; the doctor only guides and helps. He is human and undoubtedly fallible as are all humans.

Are doctors earning too much money? I agree that $250,000 is grossly out of line. Why not lobby for the education of more doctors? I know from experience how hard it is currently to study medicine and go to medical school. Disruption of the dictatorial methods of selection to study medicine, and increasing the number of doctors in our country will achieve the desired reduction in doctors' earnings without socialization. A market economy can be used to provide those needed services competitively.

To Caraway and the reader I suggest practical action — let our leaders know that we want to see changes, but that we are not looking for a utopian dream. We all must sacrifice to make our system the best it can be.

On secular humanism

Editor,

Re: Scott Miller's column, "Secular humanist to invent church," in Wednesday's Collegian.

Best wishes for your new church. Don't be discouraged if new membership lags. While your message lacked some of the substance of earlier prophecies, perhaps that deficiency will seem less important after it has survived 2,000 years or so.

In the meantime, you may want to spend some time codifying your "guiding principles." You know, Principle No. 1: "Thou shalt not have any authority." Principle No. 2: "Regardless of how perfect and how rational (a law) is, mankind will break it." Principle No. 3: "Total freedom is our ultimate God." How American. Principle No. 4: "Acting against God's orders means (freedom from coercion)." Let's see if I have that last one right; if we are to be free we must choose to disobey God.

I'd say we should limit our principles to 10. If we have more than 10, children and converts will be discouraged from memorizing them. I realize that all of this codifying might seem somewhat inconsistent with your dictum that we will have "...no priests, no bishops...no authority." But compromise is right up your alley. And, after all, you do want your church to survive, don't you?

Just in case you missed the purpose of my letter, Scott, I should probably be more explicit. The most offensive part of your fuzzy satire was the journalistic tactic of using the behavior of a fringe group to assault all of Christianity.

Editor,

Re: Kirk Caraway's column, "Medical system needs socialization," in Tuesday's Collegian.

Once again, Kirk Caraway has turned out an example of shoddy, amateur journalism. The best research he managed was "talking to students from Canada and Great Britain" and looking up GNP percentages from an almanac.

I have two major problems with his article. First, he tries to make us believe that doctors raise their fees simply to make more money. This is a plain untruth. Medical fees are climbing because malpractice suits are becoming outrageously common and expensive. The doctors are forced to pay higher and higher malpractice insurance premiums even if they are never sued.

As for the students who extol the virtues of socialization, one must realize that, as students, they are not yet paying the extremely high taxes to support their "free" medical care.

Second, how much of the 12 percent GNP of the United States spends on "medical care" is going toward medical schools and research, not to mention liability suits? Perhaps if the 12 percent is broken down thusly, the difference between it and Canada's 8 percent (also broken down this way) becomes perfectly reasonable.

If Caraway is to continue subjecting students to his writing, he should at least present facts, not assumptions.

Athletic fee bad idea

Editor,

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics does not need an athletic fee to increase its funds. First, if the proposed athletic fee is passed, it will increase the cost of tuition for everyone attending the University. This includes those who are here only for an education. I came here to get my education — not to pay for someone else's fun.

Secondly, the athletic department does not need more money to "draw in more students." If the education programs at the University are boosted and given the credit they deserve, those programs will draw in more students, and that is what the University is for. In fact, the higher tuition caused by the proposed athletic fee might be too high for some students to afford. It may, in effect, cause students to turn away from K-State.

Opinion

Referendum good

Editor,

I strongly believe the Student Senate Representation Enhancement issue should be brought to referendum. Also, I am in favor of splitting the representation between college and living groups.

First, the issue should be brought before the students because students should decide how they want to be represented. Splitting the representation is not the only way and it may not be the best way. No matter which way is chosen it should reflect the students' wishes. Who is better able to decide what the students want than the students themselves?

Student Sen. Wally Brockoff was quoted in the Dec. 5 Collegian: "This is a very complex issue and I think it would be very difficult to communicate all the information to the students." I attended the Student Senate meeting Dec. 4 and noticed it was very difficult to communicate all the information to the senators. I watched as some admitted they didn't understand what they had voted for at the previous Student Senate meeting. The senators are not privy to any information or reasoning facilities that are not also available to any student who is interested. Anyone who puts forth the effort can form an opinion with minimal time. Unfortunately, some of our senators could not form one even in four weeks' time.

I echo the sentiment of Sen. John Bullock when at the Student Senate meeting he stated that senators represent and decide matters for the entire student body regardless of the living groups. Now, as in the past, the Student Senate is operating without bias. However, the potential for a controlling living group to take over is there.

Second, the living groups do have different attitudes. That's why they choose one living group over the others.

Third, the strongest reason for representation enhancement is one of accessibility. I live in a residence hall. It is easiest for me to get in touch with people who also live in the residence halls. I eat with them. My daily schedule resembles theirs. It is more difficult to get in touch with someone in the greek system.

I was talking to a friend from a sorority. She said she was informed on the issue because some women of the sorority were in Student Senate, and because Steven Johnson, student body president, had visited the sorority and discussed the issue. This doesn't happen in the residence halls or the private residences.

It is easier to come into contact with a senator if he or she is a member of your living group. The change in representation would improve the lines of communication between Student Senate and the students, which everyone wants. Ideally, constituents should seek out their senators, and senators should stay in touch. But realistically, it is not this way. Out of sight, out of mind.

This matter should not become a greek vs. residence hall vs. independent struggle. Somewhere along the line, communication between students and Student Senate broke down. I believe these changes will help restore them.

Date rape danger

Editor,

She's 21 years old and still living a personal fable. "It won't happen to me," she said, but it did.

Many K-State women are still believing this fable. How many more women will have to be devastated by this living reality? Across the nation more than 50 percent of rapes are committed by acquaintances. Unlike K-State, other universities are fighting back by educating their incoming students during a freshmen orientation program. This program involves a short film about the misconceptions of date rape and what to do if one finds herself in this situation.

Other universities are learning the hard way as litigation is brought against them for failing to inform students of the possible risk of date rape. Isn't it time K-State takes responsibility for educating its students before more victims have to suffer?

Cabinet's beliefs

Editor,

In regard to Student Body President Steven Johnson's veto of the Student Senate Representation Enhancement Referendum, I strongly believe that some statements concerning the cabinet's view on the issue must be made clear.

First of all, those who believe Johnson acted on his own behalf are sadly mistaken. Johnson deliberated with his cabinet and other student leaders for hours before reaching his decision. His main concern was that no other alternatives were researched before the introduction of the bill to the Senate floor.

Furthermore, Johnson is concerned about the entire student population. To him it is essential that the students be presented with the best proposal, one that is effective and mandated to perform successfully.

Since there was a considerable amount of dissention on both sides of the issue, it seemed ludicrous to send to the students a proposal with which student leaders were not confident. Obviously, senators were not convinced that this bill was necessarily the most effective, nor did it guarantee a "new and improved" system. These doubts are witnessed by Senate's initial vote of 22-19-1 on the bill and its subsequent vote of 18-21-2 on the motion to override Johnson's veto.

For these reasons, Johnson and his cabinet believe that research done by an ad-hoc committee would best serve student needs before any proposal goes to referendum. This ad-hoc committee would be composed of four off-campus, two residence hall and two greek-affiliated students in addition to three student senators. This composition is designed to eliminate biases toward any specific faction of the student community.

This group would be responsible for attaining certain proposed results in a specific length of time. Its main duties would include looking into all alternatives of the representation issue, weighing the pros and cons of each, and deciding which would be most effective. It would then submit to Senate its recommendation. Senate Communications Committee would then be responsible for informing students of the current recommendation along with its advantages and disadvantages so that each voter could make an educated decision.

In response to Dan Owens' column, "Referendum is best answer for students," in Monday's Collegian, I would like to point out an area in which I am forced to disagree with Owens. He said, "No task force is going to be able to say, 'This is the best proposal.'" The exact opposite is true. An ad-hoc committee looks at all alternatives in an objective manner and examines all sides of an issue. Therefore, no one is more informed and more capable of determining the best alternative or proposal.

If we look at this issue responsible, objectively, and above all, democratically, then and only then, will students be able to make the best, most informed dcision.

I. Students enrolled in classes that meet Wednesday (MTWUF, MTWF, MW, TWUF, WF, W, MWF) and all classes at the various hours on MU, MT, will be examined during the period designated by W and the hours of the regular class session. (See Item IV below and the chart above for special examination periods for certain courses.) For example, a class that regularly meets MWF at 11:30 will be examined on Monday, December 15, 11:50 a.m. to 1:40 p.m.

II. Students enrolled in classes that meet on a schedule which includes Tuesday, but does not include Wednesday, (T, TU, U, F, TUF, MT) and classes meeting at the various hours on TF and UF, will be examined during the period designated by T and the hour of the regular class session.

III. Day classes meeting only once a week on Monday, Thursday, Friday, or Saturday will be examined as follows:
Monday, Dec. 8 Thursday, Dec. 11 Friday, Dec. 12

IV. Evening classes will be examined during final exam week at a time following the last regularly scheduled class meeting and prior to the end of final examination week to be arranged by the instructor in consultation with class members.

V. No classes shall meet after Friday, Dec. 12, and all examinations shall be given as scheduled.

VI. Students scheduled to take more than two final examinations on any given day may see their instructors, and then Department Heads or Deans to resolve conflicts to relieve heavy examination loads.

VII. Students scheduled to take two or more special exams at the same time should take the one occurring first in the list at the scheduled time and arrange through the instructor, department head, or Dean to take the others at other times.

Company's sales remain constant despite decline in area steel needs

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

While competition from imports in the American steel market presents a burden for domestic producers, one local distributor has kept sales at a relatively constant level.

Steel and Pipe Supply Co., Inc., Second and Osage streets, has reduced its imports from about 20 percent to less than 10 percent of total inventory, said Bob Pulford, the company's vice president of sales.

In the late 1970s and early 1980s, imported steel was used to a greater extent on a nationwide basis, Pulford said. Before the Voluntary Restraining Act of 1984 was implemented, the percentage of imports in total U.S. consumption was about 23 to 25 percent. The legislation called for a reduction of imports to about 18 percent of total consumption.

"There was at one time a higher risk-reward relationship in the foreign steel market," he said. "When that relationship began to disappear four or five years ago, we began looking for other ways to get steel."

Pulford said with the advent of the Voluntary Restraining Act, import steel has declined as a percentage of consumption, but falling demand and increased domestic capacity have more than offset the decline, leaving an abundance of domestic steel available for consumption.

"Our sales have remained relatively static because of our ability to combine the key elements of a transaction — availability, scheduled delivery and a competitive price," he said.

The local distributor receives carbon steel products from steel producing mills, he said. The distributor, in turn, supplies the unfabricated material to companies in Kansas and the four contiguous states of Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma and Colorado.

Steel and Pipe Supply Co., Inc. receives its steel products primarily from the Chicago area and Ohio River valley region.

"Mini-mills," special mills that produce a narrow range of items, are becoming more prominent in producing steel items for distributors as well as larger mills with a wider range of products, Pulford said.

These smaller, more specialized mills, may become a competitor for distributors, he said. Because supply far exceeds demand in today's market, some "mini-mills" are aggressively developing marketing plans to solicit the end user directly. The distributor could be bypassed in the normal channel from producer to consumer.

"We buy steel in large quantities then break it down into smaller quantities to ship to our customers," he said.

Pulford said the distributor's customers fall into three primary categories: farm equipment manufacturers, steel fabricators and welding or other specialty-job shops.

The demand for steel products is "way off" compared to the "good years," Pulford said. The basic reason for this situation is the decline in demand for farm equipment.

Although the distributor's sales have remained about the same, the decrease in demand has caused inventory levels to be reduced. He said about two months' supply of steel products are currently kept on hand, compared to the normal inventory of three or four months' supply.

"We keep as much as is necessary," he said, "but the key is to have material on hand when the customer wants it, both in terms of the number of items and the number of tons.

"We use what we call 'just in time' delivery — we hold products for customers until they need it, then we deliver."

Although the local distributor has been able to use domestic supplies, Pulford agrees that steel imports do have an impact on the national market.

"Foreign steel in our frame of reference — that of a distributor — has very little significance," Pulford said, "but it is still a major problem for the U.S. steel industry, which in turn affects our health.

"As a company, we buffer ourselves toward the dilemma (of import competition) by finding alternative sources and catering to the Midwestern region that probably sees the effects of imports last but not least.

"The steel business (as a whole) has seen the effects, and will continue to see the effects, (of competitive imports)," Pulford said.

"If we can bring the level of imports down to 18 percent (the target of the Voluntary Restraining Act), the industry can hope to regain some economic health."

State Board of Education delays action on criminal record checks

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Board of Education Wednesday delayed action on a proposal that would require running criminal record background checks on people who apply for teaching certificates in Kansas.

The board sent the proposal back to the Department of Education staff for more study and a determination of more precise costs of methods which might be used for conducting such checks.

The department presently makes no criminal background checks on applicants before issuing them teaching certificates unless they admit to having a criminal record when seeking certification. In that event, a background check is made.

Five states have implemented background checks for school personnel, and six others are considering it. In addition, several national school administrators organizations are working to set up a computerized network to supply information on teachers and other school employees denied certification because of criminal records.

Some states run fingerprint record checks, while others permit local school districts to request a check by law enforcement agencies using the applicant's name, Social Security number and birthdate.

The department's study indicated two options are available to the state board.

One is to require a name-Social Security number-birthdate check through state records prior to certification. A report presented to the board indicated this would cost about $3 per applicant.

The other is to require a fingerprint check, which would cost $10 if done by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, or $14 if done by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

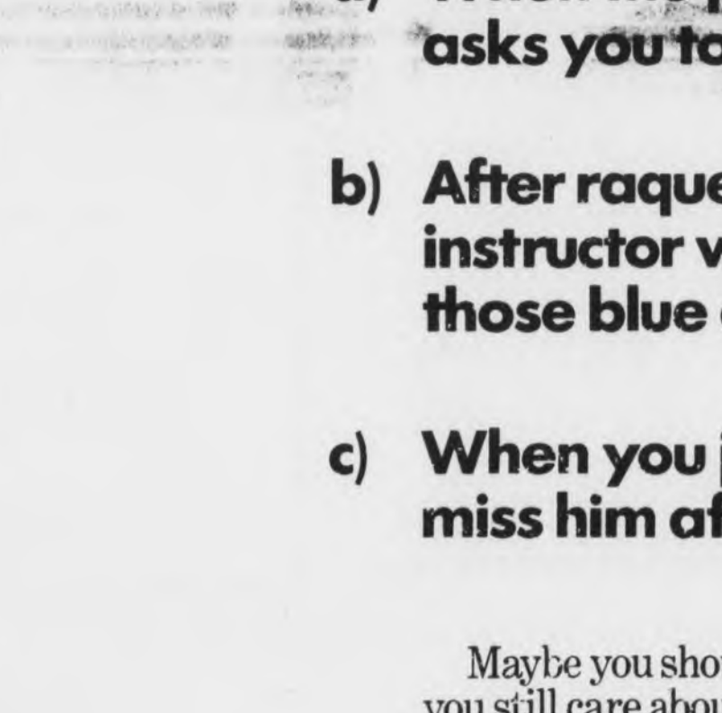
WHEN IS THE RIGHT TIME TO CALL YOUR BOYFRIEND?

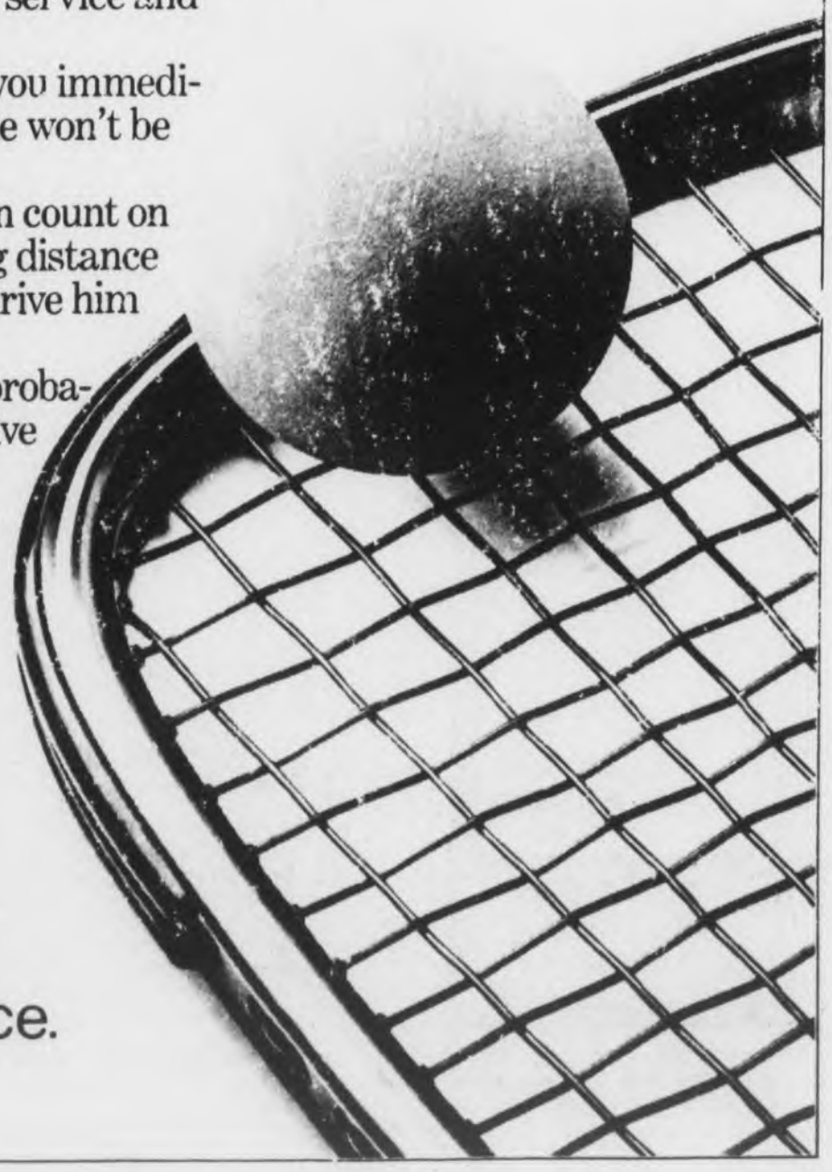
a) When the president of Phi Gamma Delta asks you to Saturday night's Fiji Formal.

b) After raquetball class, to tell him that the instructor with the Australian accent and those blue eyes did wonders for your serve.

c) When you just feel like telling him you miss him after all.



Maybe you shouldn't tell him everything that's going on. But if you still care about him, why not call and whisper some sweet things he'll never forget?



Like why you call using AT&T Long Distance Service, and why you trust AT&T's high quality service and exceptional value.

When you tell him that AT&T gives you immediate credit if you dial a wrong number, he won't be able to get you out of his mind.

And telling him you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections will drive him crazy.

All of which will probably inspire him to drive out for the weekend, giving you an excuse to blow off that silly frat party after all.

Students live in to help out animals

After Hours

Dr. David Schoneweis, Erik Torring, Randy McCallum, Connie Ferguson and Carol Hagen meet in the clinic for a weekly conference. Schoneweis helps the students coordinate their weekly schedule.

The K-State Veterinary Medicine Building not only houses sick and wounded animals at night, but it also is the home for seven live-in veterinary students.

These students are available for any night emergencies the clinic might receive, said Dave Schoneweis, professor of surgery and medicine. They are also responsible for helping with pharmacy and laboratory work.

"The clinic has had live-ins for many years," Schoneweis said. "It gives the students an opportunity for additional experience to develop professionally, as well as being beneficial to the faculty. The live-ins are a vital part of the hospital."

"Dr. Schoneweis is our mentor," said Scott Shell, senior in veterinary medicine. "He makes sure the communication between the live-ins and the faculty and staff is good. He sees that we're trained properly and that the staff has access to our use.

"He's also great about getting things done," Shell said. "Earlier in the fall, there were about two weeks that it got really cold in the building at night. I think they forgot about us having to live here at night, so when the faculty and the rest of the students go home, they turned down the heat. We called Dr. Schoneweis about it and he got it taken care of right away.

"You really appreciate efficiency when you're cold," Shell said.

The Veterinary Medicine Building has live-ins year round, including the holiday seasons.

"They try to work it out so only two people must stay for each holiday," Shell said. "I drew one of the short straws, so I will be staying here over Christmas."

When an emergency case comes in, a doctor is contacted immediately. A live-in is then called, who is expected to be dressed and downstairs within five minutes, Shell said.

"Our duty until the doctor arrives is to admit the patient, do a physical exam and try to get a complete history from the owner. We try to determine the problem and stop any bleeding," he said.

"When the doctor arrives, we inform the doctor of what we have learned. He mostly takes over from there.

"The best procedure is for the owner to call the emergency desk before bringing the animal in," Shell said. "It gives us and the doctor time to be prepared."

The live-ins get free room in exchange for the services they perform. The live-ins' rooms are similar to dorm rooms, except they contain two phones instead of one. One phone is for the clinic and the other is for personal use, Shell said.

"I have known they guy in the next room, Jeff Isaacson, since I was little," he said. "He grew up in Lincoln, Neb., and I grew up right outside of Lincoln. We went to different colleges right out of high school, but both of us ended up at K-State our junior year.

"Now we're both live-ins," Shell said.

Terry Gorch (right) and Scott Shell examine a dog brought in while they were on call. The students on call take care of all animals that come in after 5 p.m.

"I believe the greatest advantage we get as live-ins is the personal contact we have with the clinicians and doctors," he said.

When an emergency case comes in, it's often just the student and the doctor, he said. Students get to do a lot more than in the classroom when there are seven or eight other students as well.

"In addition to the personal contact, being a live-in is also very convenient and gives me experience working in a pharmacy," Shell said.

"Working in the pharmacy gives us a better chance to learn all of the drugs and the drug names. It's very difficult to learn about every drug unless you work with them.

"Sometimes it can be a very demanding job," he said. "There's a lot of pressure being on call. When you're called and awakened in the middle of the night, you must be ready to go down and get started.

"It's very similar to a human hospital," Shell said. "We're serious about practicing good medicine.

"It can be hard work at times, but it also can be a lot of fun," he said.

"The live-in program is working out very well," Schoneweis said. "The veterinary student does not need to be a senior to apply. It can provide the individual with valuable additional learning experience."

Connie Ferguson moves the horse she is taking care of in its stall after putting new bandages on him. Each student is responsible for taking care of certain animals.

TOP: Randy McCallum does laundry in the laundry room provided by the clinic. BOTTOM: Scott Shell takes time to study in his room during a slow night. Two students are on call every night in case of emergency, sometimes leaving them with nothing to do but study.

Students record holiday-season single

By MAUREEN MURPHY
Collegian Reporter

Fond memories of family, friends and good tidings of the Christmas season always make college students long to go home after the fall semester's end.

Four students from Clay Center have formed a country and western group called The Republican Valley Boys and have recorded their first single, "Kansas Christmas" which conveys how students feel about the Christmas season, said Mike Alderson, junior in journalism and mass communications and bass singer for the group.

Ed Raines, sophomore in music, wrote the song, and Curt Parry, junior in industrial engineering, wrote the lyrics. Alderson said Raines came up with the idea of a Christmas song about Kansas.

"It just seemed to fit with the idea of home and being in Kansas," Alderson said.

The group recorded two songs Sept. 13 in a studio in Newton. The flip side of the single is a love song titled "Such a Part of Me." Alderson said the group doesn't have a label yet.

'One of the things that really helped us along was singing in churches in Clay Center.'
— Mike Alderson

Alderson said they had 1,000 singles pressed and have sold about 600 of them around the Clay Center area since the record was released in November.

They are trying to get a manager for the group and have sent a demo of "Kansas Christmas" to Nashville. Alderson said nothing will develop this year since the record was released too late, but he hopes next year someone will record it.

"We try to make ourselves a lot like the Oak Ridge Boys, so we'd like to see them do it; they have a lot of prestige," he said. "They are kind of our idols."

Wichita television station KSNW sent a cameraman and reporter to K-State Dec. 4 to tape a music video of The Republican Valley Boys and their Christmas song, Alderson said. Pictures were shot of the four members throughout campus and Manhattan. He said the video is 2½ minutes long and will air Dec. 23 at 10 p.m. in Wichita and KSNW's translator stations. The video is part of a special program on how Kansas is representing Christmas. Alderson said the video cost them nothing since it is a promotion for KSNW.

The group was formed 2½ years ago. The original members are Alderson, Raines and Brian Wohler, sophomore in business administration. Alderson said their career began when they sang in a high school talent show. From there, they were asked to perform at local 4th of July celebrations and in local churches.

"One of the things that really helped us along was singing in churches in Clay Center," Alderson said.

Recently, The Republican Valley Boys have been performing at company Christmas parties and organizational meetings around Clay Center.

Alderson said they don't consider their music to be dance music and really don't have any interest in performing at dances. The group's main plan is to cut an album in mid-February or March. Wohler will be replaced next semester by Kent Bohling, freshman in music.

"We are really happy to have Kent. He has a good voice and hopefully we won't have any hard feelings about losing an original member," Alderson said.

The group performs seven original songs, but most of what they sing is a takeoff from other bands.

They perform about twice a month, but the number of performances depends on the time of the year. Last year, they performed 18 times in two weeks, he said.

Alderson said their first single hasn't affected their number of performances. He said they've done a few extra things, but it really hasn't changed much.

UFM personnel cut causes spring catalog reductions

By The Collegian Staff

Due to recent personnel reductions, University for Man will be distributing fewer class catalogs this spring semester.

"We will be putting out two small class catalogs instead of three," said Eunice Dorst, campus/community coordinator for UFM. "The new catalogs will be available in mid-spring and mid-fall."

UFM hopes to increase publicity of its classes by mailing the new catalogs, beginning next year. All residents of Manhattan will be on the mailing list in addition to the residence halls, sororities and fraternities. UFM also plans to arrange monthly class registration sites on the main floor of the K-State Union and the Manhattan Public Library. This arrangement will hopefully generate more participation in the classes by students and residents alike, she said.

"We are offering many new classes now. These classes are taught on a volunteer basis by a lot of professors, graduate students and people in the community who want to share their talents with others," Dorst said.

Some of UFM's new classes are directed toward teen-agers and the problems they are faced with in today's society. Classes in this area include: Dealing with Divorce, Suicide, Peer Pressure, Stress Management and Dealing with Shyness.

"We will also offer classes in areas concerning helping to make changes within yourself," Dorst said.

UFM will also offer classes concerning sexual harassment and social issues such as AIDS and issues in Central America, she said.

Basketball providing deAlmeida with chance at English education

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

If Fabio deAlmeida can speak to opponents with his shooting as well as he speaks English, K-State will have added another weapon to its developing basketball machine.

DeAlmeida, a 6-foot-6-inch guard from Sao Paulo, Brazil, transferred to K-State from Pan American University in Edinburgh, Texas, where he played for K-State coach Lon Kruger. DeAlmeida, who said shooting is his biggest strength, is a redshirt this season and he is already looking forward to next season.

"I feel that after playing one year at Pan Am, and being redshirted this year, next year I can help the team work toward a Big Eight championship," deAlmeida said.

DeAlmeida went to Pan American primarily because of his friendship with former Wildcat basketball player Eduardo Galvao, who played when Kruger was a K-State assistant.

DeAlmeida was recruited by Providence College in Rhode Island in 1984, but did not sign. Galvao, who played with deAlmeida on the same club team in Sao Paulo, put Kruger in touch with deAlmeida, and the two have been together ever since.

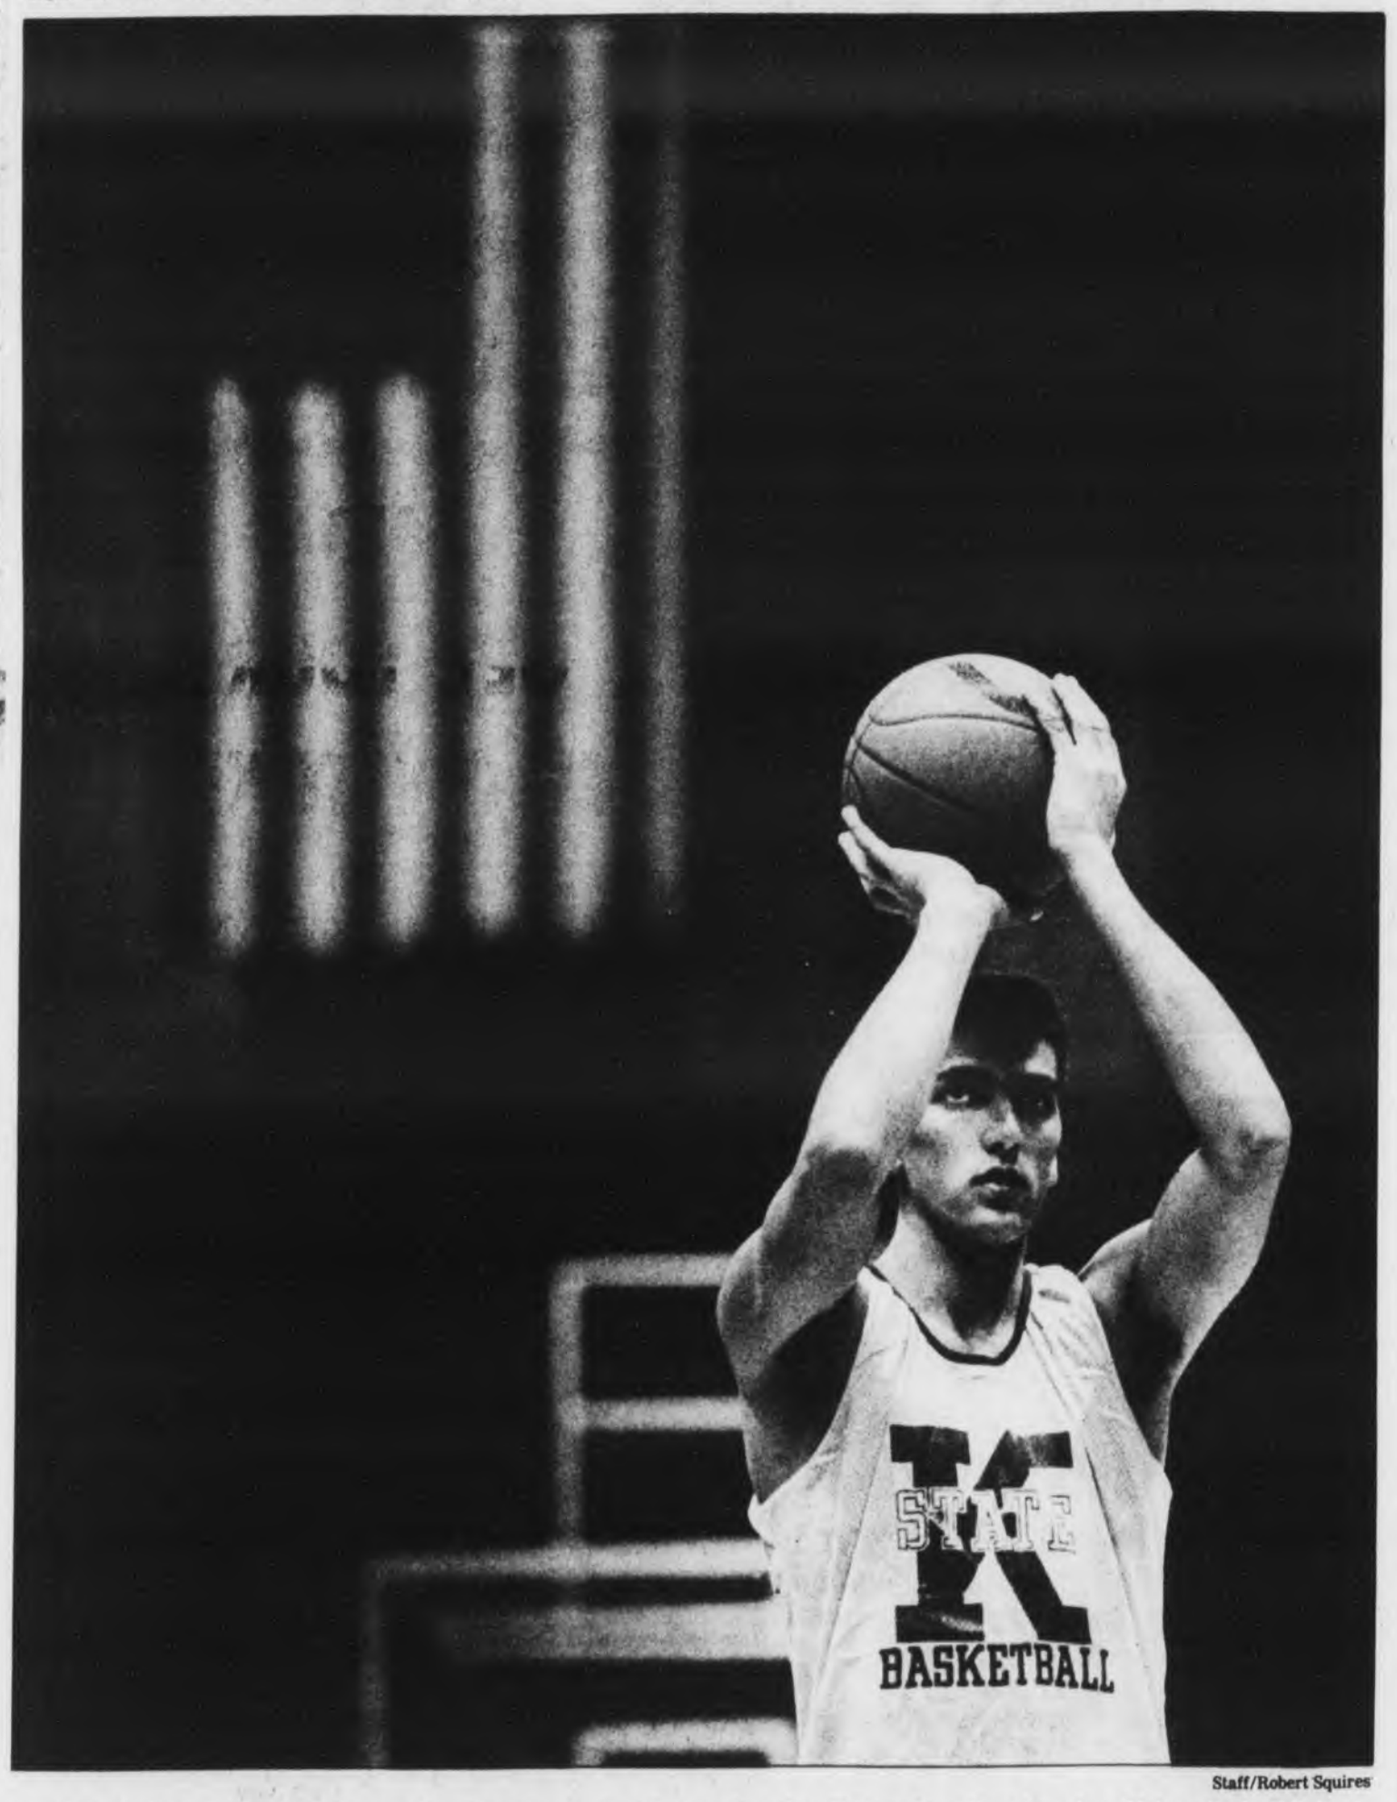
"My goal at Pan Am was to adjust to American life and basketball," deAlmeida said. "Coach Kruger wanted me to go to Pan Am in the summer (of 1985.) I knew no English, so I went to summer school seven hours a day to learn it. In basketball, defense was harder to play. Players here are stronger and they play harder than they do in Brazil."

DeAlmeida seems to be adjusting well at K-State, as he said he enjoys Manhattan and school.

"I'm very quiet and it is usually hard for me to make friends," deAlmeida said. "Eduardo (Galvao) told me that people here were sometimes cold, but I've found it to be totally different. I've made a lot of friends easily.

"Even though I've only been in Manhattan a few months, I can see that this is a basketball place," deAlmeida said. "We are working hard in practice and we know that when we have games, there will be a lot of people there. They are excited about us."

DeAlmeida said watching his teammates race out to a 5-0 start from the bench is sometimes frustrating.



"I don't like being redshirted," deAlmeida said, "but I know it's going to be good for me, both in basketball and school. It is very hard to practice and work all the time when I know I am not going to play."

DeAlmeida, a business major, hopes to return to Brazil when he graduates and work for his father — who manufactures computer chips. Leaving his family to come to the United States to play basketball was deAlmeida's hardest adjustment.

"When I told them about my coming to K-State, I had to take Eduardo (Galvao) home to help explain how important it was for me to come here to get a degree and to play basketball," deAlmeida said.

"Fabio is very dedicated to the game of basketball," Kruger said.

"The primary reason he is in the United States is to get an education. Very close behind that reason is to play basketball. He works very hard and we're looking forward to having him in our program."

Fabio deAlmeida, a 6-foot-6-inch guard from Sao Paulo, Brazil, transferred to K-State from Pan American University in Edinburg, Texas, where he played for Coach Lon Kruger. DeAlmeida, who is redshirted this season, will join the 'Cats' attacks next year.

Undefeated 'Cats to face sixth test

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State's next opponent, Division II power Abilene Christian, will probably wish the three-point line in college basketball was never invented after Thursday night's contest in Ahearn Field House.

Abilene Christian is shooting zero percent from beyond the line, having failed on its only two attempts of the season. K-State, on the other hand, has launched an average of more than 12 attempts per game in the early going, connecting on almost 47 percent of those.

The 'Cats are expected to take full advantage of the line once again in light of the fact that Abilene Christian relies heavily on a zone defense.

The Wildcats, 5-0 on the season, are off to their best start since the 1984-85 season, when they won their first six games of the year. The squad is coming off a decisive 81-64 victory over previously undefeated Creighton Tuesday night, leaving itself the only unbeaten team in the Big Eight Conference.

First-year head coach Lon Kruger pointed to the squad's victory over Creighton as a turning point for the 'Cats.

"I think we took a step (against Creighton) that was extremely satisfying to see. Up until that point, I didn't feel like we had executed on the level at both ends of the floor that we need to. I thought we took a step to improve that level; now we've got to sustain that and continue to improve in each area," he said.

Abilene Christian, also nicknamed the Wildcats, is 3-1 on the year. ACU was rated 20th among all Division II teams in the national pre-season poll, but returns only one starter from last season's squad which finished 12th in the final balloting.

"I know they've got some good athletes," Kruger said, "and they like to play an up-tempo game. They've got a good basketball tradition. We've got to get ready to play just like we have for our previous ballgames and take them one at a time."

Freshman forward Vincent Patton has led the way for the squad thus far, averaging 20 points a contest. Senior forward Roderick Johnson adds 14 to the attack.

Head coach Mike Martin, who enters his seventh year at the helm for ACU, expressed a concern about the Wildcats quickness.

Martin's concern is well-founded. K-State has been rolling up an average of 88 points a game in the first five contests while limiting opponents to just 64.

Junior Mitch Richmond leads the team in both rebounding and scoring, with seven and 21 respectively. Junior William Scott chips in 17 points per game for the 'Cats.

Kruger counts the play of Scott, who leads the conference in three-point shooting percentage, as one of the pleasant surprises on the team.

"(Before practice began), I wouldn't have anticipated Will Scott stepping up and taking the role that he has, or Lance Simmons or Lynn Smith doing the same thing. But after watching them since October 15 (the first day of practice), what they've done in the first five ballgames hasn't surprised me, because I saw their work habits and the (type of) people they were," he said.

Lady Cats to meet Drake, seek return to win column

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER
Sports Writer

Looking to get back on a winning track, K-State's Lady Cats will be in Des Moines, Iowa, tonight to tackle Drake's Bulldogs.

K-State will attempt to initiate another winning streak after losing its first game of the year Saturday in the championship game of the Louisiana Tech Dial Classic. K-State, 4-1, lost 67-45 to national power Louisiana Tech in the finals.

Tonight's game against Drake will mark the beginning of what could be the toughest portion of the Lady Cats' schedule. K-State plays six of its next seven games on the road, including three games on the West Coast and the Big Eight Conference opener against Oklahoma in Norman.

Lady Cat coach Matilda Mossman said her team suffered a downfall in scoring output at Louisiana Tech — especially bench scoring — and that must change in order for K-State to get back into the win column.

"We need to have a bigger contribution from our bench in order to stay competitive," Mossman said. "In Louisiana, we only got 17 points and 22 rebounds in the two games from our reserves."

Drake, 0-5, is still looking for its first win of the 1986-87 campaign after a tough early season schedule against the likes of Iowa and Kansas. But Mossman doesn't take the Bulldogs' record for granted.

"They are a real scrappy and aggressive team, and I feel like they are ready to explode," Mossman said.

K-State will finally play a team it compares well with in height. In most of their preceding games, the Lady Cats have had to use team speed to overcome distinct height disadvantages.

Drake is led by sophomore Missy Slockett and senior Kelly Sudenga. Slockett, a 5-foot-7 center, averages 15.5 points a game. while Sudenga averages 15 points and a team-high seven rebounds per game. Sudenga, however, has been hampered by an injury of late, and is listed as possible for tonight's contest.

Center Sue Leiding continues to lead the Lady Cats in scoring with an average of 15.2 points per game through the first five contests. No one else is scoring in double figures for K-State, but the Lady Cats are using a balanced attack to average more than 67 points per game. Meanwhile, K-State's defense is only allowing 56 points per contest.

Pair of linemen sign with 'Cats

By The Collegian Staff

Two junior college athletes signed letters-of-intent with K-State's football program on first day of the early signing period, Wildcat coach Stan Parrish announced Wednesday.

"Obviously, we are very excited to have two athletes sign the first day of the signing period," Parrish said. "Their signings are part of a movement to increase our size on the team — both offensively and defensively. Both are outstanding players."

Available for the 1987 'Cat campaign are Alan Schwartz, a 6-foot-5, 245-pound offensive guard from Garden City Community College and Brandon Wackerly, a 6-4, 255-pound defensive tackle from Northeastern Oklahoma A&M in Miami.

Wackerly, a two-year letterman, was injured during the early part of this season .

Royals acquire Seattle player

By The Associated Press

The Kansas City Royals and Seattle Mariners completed a trade Wednesday at baseball's winter meetings which brings the former World Champions the power-hitting outfielder for whom they have been searching.

The Mariners sent Kansas City Danny Tartabull in trade for four players. The Royals sent Seattle pitchers Scott Bankhead, Steve Shields, Rick Luecken and outfielder Mike Kingery.

Tartabull, 24, was one of the American League's top rookies in 1986, batting .270 with 25 home runs and 96 RBI.

Corporate sponsors offer financial relief for smaller sports

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the last of a three-part series titled "Corporate Sponsorships in College Athletics."

Corporate sponsors definitely mean financial relief for a university's athletic budget.

When the McCall Pattern Co. hosted a women's basketball tournament Nov. 28-29 in Ahearn Field House, the local corporation picked up the tab for appearance money to visiting teams, trophies, a banquet and gifts for each player and coach.

All K-State had to assume was costs for officials and set-up which automatically is deducted from the women's basketball budget.

Besides financial support, there's another reason why coaches are enthusiastic about sponsorships.

"It's great for us because a local corporation is getting involved with our program, and then there's the chance their people could become involved and interested in our program," Lady Cat coach Matilda Mossman said.

Everyone, it seems, is playing the "attract a sponsor" game. Some football bowl games now feature a corporate title and the Big Eight Conference is searching for a sponsor for its men's basketball program.

Basketball and football are traditionally self-supporting sports, but could corporate sponsors be the financial salvation for non-revenue athletics?

"On a widespread basis, no, I don't think we'll ever get there," said Kenny Mossman, administrative assistant in the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"The reason for that is most of the corporate sponsors come in wanting to do something with us...are looking for a high-profile sport — football or basketball."

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis said corporate sponsors providing smaller sports with financial relief is a possibility.

"I think it's another avenue. It's just another entity that we may have to look into to, but then again you can't advertise...there are so many things you would have to be careful of. It would have to be done without any kind of commercial advertising...as it relates to an individual," Travis said.

Corporate $ponsorship$ in College Athletic$

"We're talking about promotional ideas rather than exclusive identification with one of our major programs," Kansas Athletic Director Monte Johnson added. "I'm not even sure that professional leagues are looking at total sponsorships."

Johnson said it would be difficult for a sponsor to adopt an entire program.

"It's harder to do something like that with a sport that encompasses such a long period of time," Johnson said. "We're really talking about marketing and promotional assistance more than we are ownership of rights to any sport."

Coaches such as K-State track and cross country coach John Capriotti realize this and have adopted a "take what you can get" attitude.

"We're exhausting as many sponsors as possible because we got quite a cutback in funding this year," Capriotti said.

K-State's track and cross country teams are largely aided by Nike corporation which provided 80 track uniforms at a cost of about $10,000 and absorbed the cost for the first $9,000 worth of shoes purchased. Additional shoes can be purchased at cost, Capriotti said.

"The deal with Nike is about as good a deal as the school can get," he said.

Capriotti agreed with Travis and Johnson and said he didn't believe corporate sponsors would assume total control of collegiate athletic programs.

"I don't think you will see corporate sponsors support whole programs," he said. "(As for track, corporations) are more into sponsoring the Carl Lewises and Mary Decker-Slaneys — those type of people. Sponsors will get more wear and exposure from those people."

In some cases, even though the National Collegiate Athletic Association says it is legal for athletes to receive equipment as long as personal advertising isn't involved, other governing bodies say no.

Corporate sponsors can assist with tournaments, K-State golf coach Rob Sedorcek said, but the United States Golf Association frowns on amateur players receiving equipment.

"If your team places in the top 10 of the NCAA tournament, then Titleist usually donates golf balls to your program," Sedorcek said.

K-State, with the lowest athletic budget in the Big Eight, must rely heavily on corporate sponsors to compete with the Oklahomas and Nebraskas which have seemingly unlimited funding.

Some sports fans believe a school's image is ruined with the addition of sponsorships, but Kenny Mossman says one has to consider which is the more economical way to fund an athletic program — image or corporate funding.

"I know there are some people who think that corporate sponsorship can get to a point where it really cheapens an athletic event, but I think we've handled it, and I think most of the universities have handled it, in a real class manner," Mossman said.

Students journey to Greece enabling study of architecture

By LISA SHEIKH
Collegian Reporter

A trip to Greece to study the architecture and planning of Classical, Roman, Byzantine and Venetian sites and monuments will provide three credit hours for 14 students during this year's winter intersession.

Currently enrolled in this new course, The Architecture and Planning of Greece, are architecuture, art history and interior design majors from K-State, Iowa State University, Ames and the University of Kansas.

The group is scheduled to depart Dec. 26 and return Jan. 13. During their 18-day trip, students will spend 14 days in Athens, where they will meet with contemporary architects who will present their work. In addition, they will hear professors of architecture from the University of Athens who will address the issue of how one designs in such a visually and culturally rich context, said Lefteri Pavlides, instructor in the Department of Environmental Design and organizer of the course.

While in Athens, the students will stay at a hotel within walking distance of the Acropolis, the city's citadel and also the greatest monument man has ever built, Pavlides said. To complement the sites visited in Athens, the group will take a three-day excursion to Corinth, Mycene, Tyrins, Epidaurus and Nafplion.

Pavlides, who grew up in Athens, has led architectural field trips before. He has taken groups to Philadelphia, Santa Fe, N.M., and Marysville, Kan., but never to Greece. He said the intent here is similar to the others, though — to study the buildings and their histories as well as the communities in which they are located.

"The place is different but the spirit is the same," he said.

While in Greece, Pavlides will make preparations for another class he will teach this summer in the village of Epidaurus, a classical site and the most famous healing center in ancient Greece. This will be a six-week, six-credit course in intercultural design, he said.

Pavlides said both courses should prove extremely beneficial to the students.

"In addition to acquiring knowledge of the the monuments of early western civilization," he said, "they'll have the experience of being in another country."

Curtis Cassell, senior in architecture and one of the students enrolled in the course, looks upon it as a great opportunity.

"It's the roots of architecture," he said of Greece. "The basis of architecture is all there."

David Hess, senior in architecture, said that to study the ancient architecture of Greece will be "a great learning opportunity."

Cost for the winter intersession course is still being negotiated, Pavlides said. Tentative cost for transportation and accommodations is $950.

"It could get better, but it couldn't get worse," he said. Tuition for the course is $126. The cost for the summer course is $1,450 for transportation and accommodations and $540 for tuition.

Study links 'mysterious' hormone with capability to extend lifespan

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — High levels of a mysterious hormone have been linked for the first time with longevity, and finding ways to increase this natural chemical might someday be a key to helping people live longer, researchers say.

The hormone, produced by the adrenal gland, is called dehydroepiandrosterone sulfate, or DHEAS. No one knows precisely what it does, although it's the most abundant steroid hormone in humans.

Researchers at the University of California at San Diego found that older men who had high levels of the hormone were far less likely to die, especially of heart disease, than were people with low levels of the substance.

"There is no way to either raise or lower DHEAS levels with medicine or behavior, although it is conceivable that we could develop a therapy to alter levels of the hormone," said Dr. Elizabeth Barrett-Connor, who directed the study.

In their report in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, the researchers cautioned that DHEAS could merely be a marker for some other attribute that truly helps people survive longer. But they added, "It is also plausible that DHEAS confers protection against death in general and against death from cardiovascular disease in particular."

In the early 1970s, the researchers drew blood samples from 242 San Diego men who ranged in age from 50 to 79. After 12 years, the doctors compared the levels of DHEAS in the men's blood with their survival. The initial DHEAS levels among the 76 who had died were lower than those of the men who were still alive.

The differences were most significant among the younger men. Of those between 50 and 54, the DHEAS levels of the men who died were only about one-third those of the people who lived. DHEAS levels fall steadily as people get older. But in each age group, the levels of those who survived were higher than those who did not.

Although no one knows how DHEAS works, the researchers speculated that it might prevent obesity and hardening of the arteries.

Chattanooga segregation dispute ends after 26 years of litigation

By The Associated Press

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. — An often-stormy public school desegregation case filed 26 years ago was dismissed Wednesday by a judge who ruled that the Board of Education had finally met an order to racially integrate students and faculty.

"As a product of this lengthy litigation, this court is satisfied that unlawful segregation in the Chattanooga public schools no longer exists," said U.S. District Judge R. Alllan Edgar.

The case, filed in 1960 by black real estate agent James Mapp, was the longest to linger in federal court here, said school board attorney Raymond Witt.

"Now we can really move forward," Witt said. "It's a tremendous relief...It's been in court far too long."

Edgar said the school board's reassignment of faculty and staff earlier this year eliminated the last obstacle to the dismissal.

"Based upon their conduct for many years, there is no indication that the defendants will take any steps to reinstitute vestiges of segregation," he said.

But Mapp maintains that segregation still exists in the school system, citing several schools that have a student body of nearly all one race.

"I think the past effects of state-imposed racial discrimination and segregation have not been completely done away with," he said. "Take Howard or Lookout Valley. Those schools are almost 100 percent black or white. It's never changed throughout the whole litigation."

The Chattanooga school system has nearly 23,700 students, 51.26 percent of them black.

Edgar said, "the courts remain open" if Mapp or anyone else can show any future signs of unconstitutional segregation in the system.

Low-cost medical treatment saving millions of children

By The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Simple, low-cost medical care has saved the lives of 4 million poor children in the last five years and could save almost twice that many each year if used more widely, UNICEF said Wednesday.

More than 14 million children under the age of 5 die every year, but improvements in communications and transportation make it possible for even the poorest countries the capability of reaching half of them with life-saving treatment, the U.N. Children's Fund said in a report.

"The time has come for governments and peoples to decide that it is just as unacceptable for so many millions of children to die every year of needless malnutrition and infection as it is for them to die in sudden droughts or famines," it said.

"It should frankly be a matter of national shame" if a country does not begin campaigns for immunization against six killer diseases or fails to encourage the use of oral rehydration therapy to combat often fatal dehydration due to diarrhea, the report said.

Oral rehydration therapy is the use of a simple solution of water and salts. It costs only pennies.

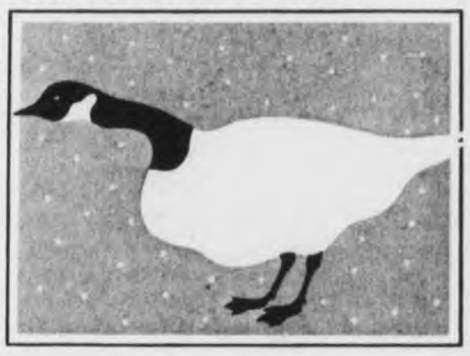
Children can be immunized against measles, tetanus, whooping cough, polio, diphtheria and tuberculosis, and many others can be saved through the spread of basic health education on weaning, Vitamin A and respiratory diseases.

The UNICEF report, entitled "State of the World's Children," said use of such simple techniques saved 4 million children in the past five years, including 1.5 million in the past 12 months.

It said poverty will always be a factor in meeting the health needs of children, "But even within those limits a new era in child health can now begin."

UNICEF supplied 377 million doses of vaccines to more than 100 developing countries in 1985 and is expected to distribute 1 billion a year by 1990, the report said.

The report said 77 developing countries, with 90 percent of the third world's children, have pledged to immunize at least 80 percent of their children by 1990.



"If the 1990 target is met, then the lives of over 3 million children will be saved each year," it said.

Poll reveals bookstore pays best text buy-back prices

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State Union Bookstore pays more for used textbooks than the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Fort Hays State University.

These are the results after polling Steve Jewett, textbook coordinator of KU; Jack Gilette, textbook supervisor of WSU; and Steve Gonzales, bookstore manager of Fort Hays State campus bookstores. The bookstores were asked when professors have to turn in their book orders to the bookstore; when the bookstore turns in the book orders to the publishers; how much the bookstore marks up new books; how much they buy back used books for, and how much they sell used books for.

The four bookstores vary in the amount they pay for used books.

Fort Hays State pays 50 percent of what the student bought the book for, whether the book was new or used when the student bought it, Gonzales said.

KU and WSU pay 50 percent of the current new book price, even if the book was bought used.

K-State pays 60 percent of the publisher's list price (new book price) for books that professors will use again, said Jerry Fields, book department manager of K-State Union Bookstore.

Professors in all four universities are supposed to turn in their book orders to the bookstore in April for the fall semester and in October for the spring semester. Each bookstore gives the professors specific deadlines each semester. These dates give the publishers' representatives time to introduce new textbooks to the professors and allows the bookstores time to contact vendors to buy as many used textbooks as possible.

The bookstores turn in their book orders to the publishers in June for the fall semester and in November for the spring semester. When teachers turn in book orders late, change their order, or if the books are not available, students have a delay in getting their books at the semester start.

All four bookstores mark up new books 20 percent to 25 percent of wholesale. The increase is to pay for overhead and freight expenses.

The four bookstores do not buy back books the professors will not use again. Vendors buy these books to sell to other schools which will continue to use the book. The prices paid to the students for these books are determined by the vendor in accordance with the amount of books he has in inventory and the demand he or she foresees for the book.

KU, WSU and K-State, charge 75 percent of new book price for used books when selling them to the students. The mark-up varies from book to book at Fort Hays State.

Inhabitants of Christmas Island celebrate holiday amidst poverty

By The Associated Press

In the tiny settlements of London, Paris and Poland on Christmas Island in the central Pacific, the few who can afford the luxury will feast this Christmas on roast pig.

Most will celebrate with fresh fish, local vegetables like breadfruit and a powerful alcoholic drink made from coconut milk.

For the 1,700 people of Christmas Island, Dec. 25 is a day of religious significance and the anniversary of European discovery.

On that day in 1777, as the British warship Resolution rode at anchor in the turquoise blue lagoon, explorer James Cook named the world's largest coral atoll.

"As we kept our Christmas here," he recorded in the ship's log, "we called it Christmas Island."

"This day," he went on, "the people (his crew) were served fresh pork, fish and double allowances of liquor which enabled them to spend the evening with mirth and jollity."

Today, Christmas — now spelled Kiritimati — Island is part of the remote and poverty-stricken Republic of Kiribati, formally the British Gilbert Group.

In 1983, the U.S. Senate formally ended a long running dispute with Britain over ownership of the atoll and recognized the sovereignty granted by London to Kiribati (pronounced Kiribass) upon its independence in 1979.

Nearly 2,000 miles — more than two weeks by copra boat — from the national capital of Tarawa, Christmas Island is often described as nothing more than a flat, dry sand heap.

The only accommodation on the island is the 24-room Captain Cook Hotel, and those who need urgent hospitalization must wait for a United States Coast Guard ship to arrive from Hawaii.

In the 209 years since Cook's visit, the atoll, just 145 miles north of the Equator, has been ravaged by waves of Europeans. First there were the whalers. Then phosphate miners.

With World War II came American and New Zealand troops and with the nuclear age, scientists and technicians, and a series of British and American experiments during the 1950s and 1960s.

Locally-produced materials are nonexistent and imported goods are prohibitively expensive.

The average per capita income of the Micronesians who have migrated to Christmas Island during the past two centuries is less than $250 a year. There is a small fishing industry but the Kiribati government is the only large, full-time employer and life generally is described as "precarious."

Despite the hardships, Christmas Day will be marked again this year by all but a few followers of the Bahai faith.

"Thanks to the British and American missionaries most of the people are a deeply Christian lot," the Australian diplomat said. "They do like to celebrate Christmas the way we do in the West."

Although the general stores don't stock expensive, artificial Christmas trees, he said the people will decorate their homes with tinsel, lights and pieces of silver paper.

"They will go to church, they will sing hymns in the street, and they will probably pool their resources to buy a fat, roasting pig," he said.

There is another Christmas Island, off northwest Australia, but that's another story.

Stephan admits back-dating letter, denies knowing settlement details

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan, who dropped out of the race for governor amid controversy over settlement of a sexual harassment lawsuit, says that at his attorney's request, he back-dated a letter hiring him as his representative in the case last year.

Stephan's comments, reported in Wednesday's Wichita Eagle-Beacon, came in a deposition given at Topeka last month, after his re-election in a race where the lawsuit was a key issue. The suit was filed in 1982 by Marcia Tomson, who accused Stephan of firing her as a secretary in the attorney general's office because she refused his sexual advances.

Stephan has denied her allegations, but the suit was settled out of court in March 1985. However, a second suit was filed eight months later after Tomson complained that terms of the agreement were violated when portions of it were made public.

In connection with the second suit, Stephan gave testimony under oath to a lawyer for the plaintiff on Nov. 17. In it, he said he does not know details of the earlier settlement and has never asked about them, and that he back-dated the letter hiring Vern Miller, a former Kansas attorney general, as his lawyer.

Stephan also said he repeatedly urged Miller, who helped arrange the settlement, to make its details public.

Stephan is claiming that lawyer-client privilege existed between him and Miller effective Feb. 1, 1985. In his deposition, he has refused to answer questions about conversations with Miller after that date and said he would not allow Miller to discuss them either.

Miller, in a separate deposition, was not asked about the back-dated letter or about the secrecy agreement. But he told the Eagle-Beacon Tuesday that he did not ask Stephan to falsify the date.

Miller declined any other comment. A spokesman in Stephan's office, Neil Woerman, said Wednesday that the attorney general would have no comment.

Miller did testify that he put up the $24,000 cash payment to settle the suit, using some of his own money and borrowing the rest from his mother.

He said he was reimbured in part by money raised by Bob Storey, a Topeka lawyer who announced the settlement at a news conference with Stephan in October 1985.

Storey, who is also a defendant in Tomson's second lawsuit, named seven businessmen who he said contributed $12,000 toward the settlement.

In his deposition, Miller said he contacted two other people besides Storey to obtain money but refused to identify them or say how much they contributed.

Miller also refused to say whether he personally contributed to the settlement.

Miller offered to answer questions about the case during his deposition, but Stephan's lawyer refused to let him do it.

During the attorney general's race, Democrat Dennis Moore pressed for full information on the lawsuit settlement, and Stephan said he had repeatedly asked Miller to disclose terms but that the attorney refused.

In his deposition, Stephan said he himself had no legal obligation not to discuss the settlement.

"I knew I was told not to say anything...But I really presumed that that was because there was a concern that it might be detrimental to me politically," Stephan testified.

However, he said he never asked Miller to tell him terms of the settlement because he didn't care about it.

Stephan said in his deposition that it was not until after the settlement was reached that he met with Marge Phelps, a Topeka attorney representing Tomson.

But Miller and Phelps said in their own depositions that Stephan met with them a week and a half before the case was settled.

Hearings

deputy CIA director, whom Roe described as "very open."

Robert McFarlane, Poindexter's predecessor as Reagan's national security adviser, also testified.

Roe agreed with other legislators on various committees that as the amount of testimony being collected grows, new questions arise.

"I think a lot of the issues...are beginning to be cleared up," he said. "But other issues are being exacerbated and beginning to unfold."

On the other side of Capitol Hill, the Senate Intelligence Committee met briefly as yet another witness declined to testify.

Sen. David Durenberger, R-Minn., the committee chairman, said Robert Dutton, an associate of retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard Secord, invoked his Fifth Amendment rights. Secord, now a private businessman, has been identified as a key contact in the arms deal and with the Nicaraguan rebels.

Durenberger said his panel still cannot determine what happened to all the profits from the Iranian arms sales. Asked if he was sure any of the money actually went to the Contras, he said, "I couldn't prove it."

Sen. William Cohen, R-Maine, said the Intelligence Committee has "a pretty clear picture of the Iranian side — what went there, how much money, who knew. But we're much less clear on the Contra end."

While the congressional probes continued, a government official who insisted on anonymity said a federal grand jury in Miami is examining evidence of gunrunning and Neutrality Act violations allegedly committed by Contras and some American backers.

The official said the grand jury investigation started last month, but was not connected to other probes into the transfer of money from the Iranian arms sales to the Contras.

But the official added that the grand jury investigation might ultimately be tied into a larger Contra probe that an independent counsel is expected to conduct into the allegations stemming from the Iranian arms sales.

Court

talist view" of man's origin.

He accused Bird of trying to fool the court "like Tweedledum tried to fool Alice," and voiced confidence that the court would not be fooled.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist elicted roars of laughter from the packed courtroom when he shot back, "Don't overestimate us."

Under past Supreme Court decisions, a law violates the Constitution's prohibition against governmental "establishment" of religion if the law's primary purpose is not secular or non-religious, if its primary effect is to advance or inhibit religion and if it unduly entangles government in religion.

Many of the justices' questions Wednesday zeroed in on whether the Louisiana law has a primarily non-religious purpose.

"It all comes back to whether this statute requires the teaching of religion," Justice Antonin Scalia said after Topkis asserted that balancing evolution with creationism is not a secular purpose.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor asked whether it would be constitutionally permissible to teach "a purely religious concept in order to balance other concepts perceived to be anti-religious."

Bird said no, but added, "That's not even applicable to this case."

Justice John Paul Stevens asked Bird whether Louisiana would be promoting students' academic freedom if it passed a law requiring that no student could study German without also studying French.

Bird served as the lead lawyer for Arkansas in that state's unsuccessful defense of a similar law. Arkansas decided not to appeal a federal trial judge's invalidation of the law.

On the heels of that major setback, the creationism movement's future vitality could be at stake in the Supreme Court case.

Video cameras help race officials catch cheating marathon runners

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The 24 people who took shortcuts in last month's New York City marathon probably didn't think about the video cameras recording the race.

They were caught, and officials from the three biggest marathons said Wednesday that cameras and vigilance are increasingly needed to combat the cheaters.

It was the disqualification of John Bell, winner of the Master Division for runners over 40, that led New York race officials to review their videotape from the race and disqualify 23 other runners. Officials estimate that the 44-year-old Bell, of Marion, Ind., took a 10-mile shortcut for his time of 2:25:15.

Three of the 24 runners were among the top 100 finishers. Bell was the 69th runner to cross the finish line out of 19,689 people who finished the 26.2-mile race on Nov. 2.

The Master Division winner gets $3,000 and a trophy. The check was never issued, and marathon officials want the trophy back.

Bell, president of his own company, was not returning calls from reporters, said Bettie Hurt, a secretary at the company.

"It appears that the people who cheat most are the masters runners," said Bob Bright, executive director of the America's Marathon-Chicago. "The people over 40 and 50 are very competitive, it's a dog-eat-dog area. You find a lot of these people get into running and it becomes an obsession."

It was Bob Glover, a fitness coach and author of "The Runner's Handbook," who originally raised questions about Bell's time. He had been giving Bell training advice for seven years, he said.

"I ran into him a couple of days before the race and he said he had just done the Ironman Triathlon and was confident of breaking 2:30 in New York," Glover said. "I said, 'no way.' He said, 'Oh, yeah.' That definitely registered."

The triathlon includes a 100-mile bike ride, a two-mile swim and a marathon.

When Glover heard Bell won the Master Division, he asked marathon officials to check their videotapes, which were recorded by cameras along the route. Bell and the others hadn't passed some checkpoints, and race director Fred Lebow announced the disqualifications Tuesday.

"Bell probably did pretty much what Rosie Ruiz did," Lebow said. "We don't know — subway or car, or he may have run all the way into Manhattan and cut across 59th street."

Ruiz was the apparent winner of the women's division of the 1980 Boston Marathon but was disqualified for cheating.

Group releases women's rights comparison

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Washington ranks best and South Carolina worst when it comes to legal rights for women, the National Organization for Women said Wednesday in releasing a state-by-state comparison of laws affecting women.

A "chronicle of sweeping legal revolution" is the way NOW describes its 523-page "State-By-State Guide to Women's Legal Rights," written by the NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund and Renee Cherow-O'Leary.

The book reviews laws on marriage, divorce, domestic violence, inheritance rights, reproductive rights, unmarried couples, equal pay, fair employment, credit, housing, insurance and public accomodations for each state, and gives the state code citation for each law.

"We want women to be informed consumers of their legal rights and remedies — especially when they come face to face with writing a will, buying a house, starting school, getting married or divorced," said Roxanne Conlin, president of NOW-LDEF.

Until the mid-1960s, the book says, it was illegal to prescribe, sell or use contraceptives in many states. In 1970 "there was no such thing as a shelter for battered women," it says.

It wasn't until 1972 that "Congress officially recognized that sex discrimination existed in the schools and passed laws designed to remedy these deep-seated practices," NOW says. A year later the Supreme Court legalized abortion.

Other changes over the past 20 years include the availability of no-fault divorce in all states, the emergence of joint custody arrangements and the increasing consideration of children's rights, the book says.

In addition, it says, some states now consider marital rape a crime and many have passed laws guaranteeing women fair treatment in the marketplace.

Chamber to lobby for economic development

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Chamber of Commerce and Industry will concentrate its lobbying effort in the 1987 legislative session on economic development issues "to move the state forward again," according to Edward Seaton, new KCCI board chairman.

"It is our hope that KCCI can play a major role in actively participating with the state, labor community and our universities to develop an entire series of actions that can positively affect the Kansas economy in 1987," said Seaton, publisher of the Manhattan Mercury.

An example of KCCI's commitment to directly involve itself in marketing Kansas products, Seaton said, is a new marketing strategy which will be used at the 1987 Kansas State Fair. It is aimed at encouraging Kansas firms to buy Kansas products.

The KCCI has adopted nine main objectives for the 1987 session. They are:

— Support of tort reform, focusing on the liability insurance problem including limiting damages for pain and suffering, restricting punitive damages and limiting attorney contingent fees.

— Exempting all manufacturing machinery and equipment from the state sales tax as an incentive for businesses to expand and to make Kansas tax policy more competitive with other state.

— Reimburse retailers 3 percent of monthly collections for the administrative costs involved in gathering and remitting sales taxes to the state.

— Adjust corporation and personal income tax brackets "to remain competitive with other states."

— Refine workers' compensation laws "by emphasizing and bolstering vocational rehabilitation, eliminating the backlog of cases and other changes to narrow application and slow the increase in costs to employers."

— Restrict use of unemployment compensation tax revenues to insure they are used exclusively for unemployment compensation benefits.

— Increase penalties for shoplifting.

— Oppose any kind of binding arbitration in labor-management negotiations.

— Oppose adopting an initiative system in Kansas which would give voters direct access to proposing constitutional changes.

Child care co-op reorganizes under Housing

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

In an attempt to strengthen its organization, the KSU Child Care Cooperative has delegated its financial and managerial responsibilities to the University after approving recommendations from a task group.

Members of the cooperative voted last Wednesday night to accept recommendations put forth by the President's Task Group that will help the financially troubled organization.

Some recommendations by the task group included a decrease in salaries for some cooperative employees, the elimination of the bookkeeper's position, renegotiation of food contracts and employee meals and the suspension of current cooperative bylaws, said Thomas Frith, director of the housing department and member of the task group.

Nancy Bolsen, director of the cooperative, will now report to Frith, and the Board of Directors for the Cooperative will act only in an advisory capacity. The board approved the task group's recommendations on Monday.

"I am absolutely thrilled with the changes," Bolsen said, "particularly at a time when the University is facing financial difficulties.

"The University is making a long-term commitment to use the child care cooperative as a recruiting tool and sees the genuine need (for a cooperative) on the campus."

Bolsen also cited the importance of support from the entire student body. Student Senate allocated more than $86,000 to the cooperative last semester to pay for facility renovations, additional child care programs within the cooperative and educational material, Bolsen said.

"The type of guidelines that we were to use the money for were very strict," she said.

Without University support the debt-ridden cooperative might have been forced to eliminate some child care programs or discontinue the cooperative altogether, Bolsen said.

The University will provide bookkeeping services and other University-related support to strengthen the cooperative, but it will not directly allocate any funds, Frith said.

Frith said the University will try to "hit a medium" to balance the cooperative.

"We want to provide excellent child care while keeping reasonable finances," he said.

Of the financial problems incurred by the cooperative, Frith said, "The cooperative was more concerned with the quality of its programs than it was about finances."

Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement and chairman of the President's Task Group, was not available for comment on the amount of debt the cooperative accumulated.

In a statement released Thursday, Krause said, "Our population of older students continues to grow, and the number of those students with children continues to grow. Even if we don't experience the magnitude of growth we have seen in the last couple years, there is no evidence to suggest that the current level of this population will decline — in short, these needs are long-term and permanent rather than transitory."

The program started serving students with children in the fall semester of 1985 with a licensed capacity for 50 children.

Bolsen said the facility, which was donated by the University, now has a licensed capacity for 223 children. The cooperative has seen dramatic increases in child care for each of the semesters and it has room to grow.

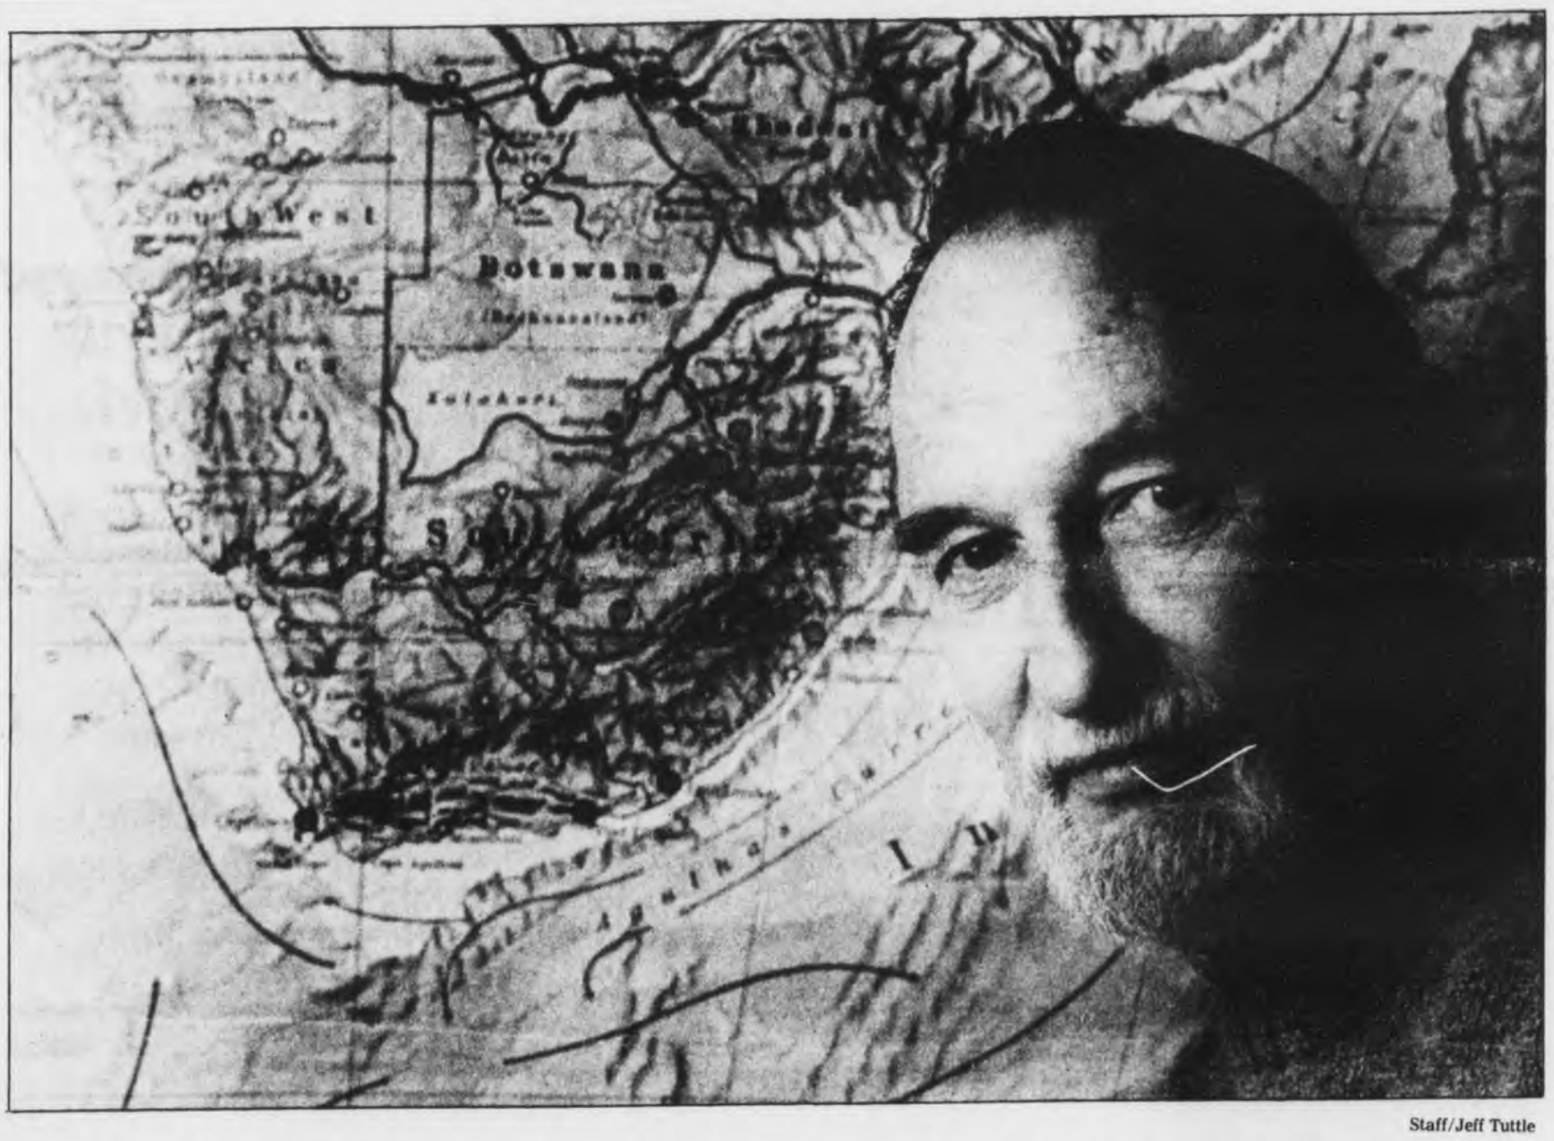
Ecologist to study in Africa

By LISA ALLSPACH
Collegian Reporter

Research to improve the use of natural resources will take Charles Bussing, associate professor of geography, to Botswana.

Bussing will leave around the first of the year for a six-month stay in Africa to work as an employee for the U.S. Agency for International Development, specifically in the Ministry of Lands.

He will be working as part of Botswana's National Conservation Strategy Coordination Group and will be involved in the research and development leading to the implementation of policies concerning resource preservation, he said.



"I'll be taking part in the decisions that go into their conservation policies," Bussing said. "These policies are of fundamental importance environmentally and socially in the development of land use."

He said he hoped the study will result in the development of rational strategies for resource preservation.

Bussing has been to Botswana before and has seen some, but not all, of the country he will be studying.

"They have a pretty well-educated group of leaders there,"

CIA head reveals tip of transfer

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — CIA Director William J. Casey said Thursday he did not learn of possible diversions of Iranian arms sales profits to Nicaraguan rebels until he was tipped by a New York businessman in early October.

Casey spoke to reporters after he testified for more than three hours before a heavily guarded, closed-door session of the House Intelligence Committee. A few minutes later, Casey's purported tipster, Roy M. Furmark, went before the Senate Intelligence Committee to tell his version of the story.

Furmark, a former legal client of Casey's, refused to talk to reporters as he entered the closed Senate hearing. But Casey said it was Furmark who first raised questions in his mind about transfers of funds from then-secret arms sales to Iran.

While Furmark testified, Sen. William Cohen, R-Maine, emerged to report that "he is being as candid as he can, he is answering all our questions." Another source said Furmark apparently was an intermediary between Casey and Middle East arms dealers.

Congressional sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the Senate Intelligence Committee had learned before Wednesday of Casey's conversation with Furmark, leading at least some panel members to question the CIA director's claim of Wednesday that he was unaware of the diversion of funds.

Casey denied a report in The Wall Street Journal that he knew as early as last spring that profits from the Iranian arms sales were being funneled to Nicaraguan insurgents, or Contras.

"No, that's wrong," Casey told reporters who pursued him down a corridor in the Capitol after his appearance before the House committee.

Asked when he learned about the arrangement, Casey responded, "I first learned about this when Meese told everybody." It was on Nov. 25 that Attorney General Edwin Meese III disclosed that between $10 million and $30 million in arms sales profits were diverted to the Contras.

"Before Meese informed you, did you start asking questions?" Casey was asked.

"Oh, I had questions about it, yeah," he replied.

"When you had questions, was that because of your conversations with Mr. Furmark?"

"That did precipitate the questions, sure."

Government sources, who spoke only on condition that they remain anonymous, said Casey told the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Wednesday that Furmark had telephoned him Oct. 7 with word that unidentified Canadian businessmen who had put up the money for the Iranian arms were complaining that they had not been repaid adequately.

The Canadians were threatening a lawsuit because they had received only $10 million when they had expected payment of $20 million, the sources quoted Casey as saying.

The sources said that the next day,

Department denies claim of liability

Two seniors' projects stolen from design display

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

Sometime between 2:30 and 8 a.m. Dec. 3, two interior design projects were taken from the bulletin board where they were being displayed in Justin Hall.

When Kim Forslund and Laura Tuttle, both seniors in interior design, were told their projects were missing, they were angry and upset. They were also told that the department and University are not liable for stolen work.

"I think that it's our property (student projects) and when we turn projects over to the department, it's their liability," Tuttle said. "We're trusting them with our property."

Mary D. Peterson, associate professor of clothing, textiles and interior design, said all student work submitted for a grade may be retained by the department and therefore the department is not liable.

"The question has never come up," she said.

It is common practice for studio classes to display projects, in Justin Hall or in Seaton Hall with architecture classes, said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

"There is a room in Seaton where we archive materials and projects," Lapping said.

Judy Roland, secretary to Jack Durgan, head of the interior architecture department, said the room is cleaned out every few years. Students have the option to return and pick up projects when they are being disposed of.

"Usually, the projects are pretty shabby when we clean the room out," Roland said.

"It's not unusual to put up work," Peterson said. "Students feel honored to have work displayed. It shows what the department is about, without saying a single word."

But the interior design student handbook reads, "The department of CTID (clothing, textiles, interior design) reserves the right to retain any student work completed by students in departmental classes. Interior design instructors shall determine which projects, if any, will be retained by the department. The instructors shall provide the student with a slide reproduction of his/her project."

Tuttle felt that the students were not made aware that any student work handed in is the department's property.

"In my interpretation of the paragraph, the department is liable when we hand in projects. If I had been aware of that, I would not have allowed my project to be displayed," she said. "It's too much of a risk to take with a portfolio project."

Project liability differs from department to department. Roland said projects completed in the interior architecture department are the property of the department.

"There is considerable more money involved than say typing a paper," she said. "But it's the department's ownership. We have to keep projects so we have something to show the accreditation team and others. It's just bad luck if projects are misplaced or taken."

Lapping said neither the college nor University is legally liable for misplaced projects unless there was negligence by the teacher or staff.

"Now, in terms of how we feel, we

Budget cuts halt Anderson Hall renovation plan

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

As a result of the budget cuts mandated by Gov.-elect Mike Hayden, renovations planned for Anderson Hall are on hold.

A design utilizing vacated post office space was scheduled to be completed by next June, Facilities Planning Director William Garvin said.

University President Jon Wefald said students and faculty would not want plans implemented while the rest of the University is making monetary sacrifices.

"Certainly, I can see why people would be outraged," he said.

The project included expanding admissions office space, "to make admissions more hospitable and efficient," Garvin said.

He said two interview rooms were to be added for use by the eight recruiters. The area would be arranged so visitors' facilities would be in front of the main office.

An office for Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, was to be constructed in the space where the Attorneys and New Student Programs offices are located. Attorneys and New Student Programs staff members would move to the northwest wing of the building, and other offices would be repositioned as necessary.

Krause's temporary office is located between the offices of the provost and the president. His assistant, secretary and other staff members are not in close proximity, Garvin said. The move would position him across the hall from Wefald.

Helen Cooper, management analyst for facilities planning, said rationale for moving Krause's office across from the president's is that the area is large enough to house his staff.

Previously estimated cost for the renovation was $159,000, which would be taken from the University Operating Budget, Garvin said. He said if the plan is implemented, ways to reduce the amount will be considered after final cost estimates are obtained.

Wefald said Garvin's design plans are "what we ultimately want to do when we get the money."

For now, any rearrangement of staff will be done in the existing structure, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"We might decide to move a couple of people around to different areas," he said. "We're not making any structural changes; we're basically using the offices just the way they are."

Wefald said if the base budget for the fiscal year is reinstated, structural renovations may begin.

"That's when we'd be talking about renovation," he said.

Current construction in Anderson Hall is on a handicap-accessible elevator.

The elevator is being funded by $150,000 allocated by Student Senate from the $700,000 freed by refinanc-

Arabs link North to Swiss account

WASHINGTON — The key Iranian and Saudi Arabian middlemen in the sale of U.S. arms to Iran said in television interviews Thursday that ousted White House aide Lt. Col. Oliver North controlled the Swiss accounts into which as much as $35 million was deposited to pay for U.S. weapons sent to Iran.

The Iranian, Manucher Ghorbanifar, and the Saudi, Adnan Khashoggi, said in an interview on the ABC-TV program "20-20" that Iran initiated the contacts and that then-White House national security adviser Robert McFarlane responded by asking for Iranian help in releasing hostages held in Lebanon.

Ghorbanifar said that the Tehran government, in turn, said Washington should send arms to Iran to help it in its war with Iraq. Ghorbanifar is an Iranian businessman who ABC described as head of European intelligence for the prime minister of Iran, Mir Hossein Mousavi.

Ghorbanifar and Khashoggi said that they did not know that up to $30 million in proceeds from the sale had gone to help Nicaraguan Contra rebels. And they left unclear how much President Reagan and Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini knew about the deal and when they learned of it.

However, Khashoggi said he believed that Reagan approved the arrangement before the first shipment to Iran, which he said was in August 1985. An American hostage, the Rev. Benjamin Weir was released on Sept. 14, 1985.

Khashoggi said money for the weapons was deposited in a Swiss bank account in the name of "Lake Resources," but he did not know where it went after that.

"We think it was controlled by North (because) he is the coordinator," said Khashoggi, a Saudi arms dealer and businessman with ties to the royal family. Ghorbanifar said that North and retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard V. Secord controlled the account.

Secord has been named by investigators as a key associate to North in the Iran arms sale and the diversion of funds to the Contras.

CIA Director Willam J. Casey, in congressional testimony this week, identified Lake Resources as one of the firms involved in the complicated transactions.

Arms sale linked to obscure office

WASHINGTON — Richard V. Secord's last full-time Defense Department job was in a little-known division that supervises arms sales to many foreign countries. It employed several people whose names have surfaced in the Iran-Contra affair.

Secord, a retired Air Force major general who reportedly played a key role in the diversion of profits from the sale of U.S. arms to Iran to the Nicaraguan rebels, retired in May 1983 as a deputy assistant defense secretary at the department's International Security Affairs section.

Secord oversaw Near Eastern and South Asian affairs at ISA, according to the Congressional Directory.

Between July 11, 1983 and Nov. 11, 1984, after his retirement, Secord was authorized to serve a consultant to ISA for a total of 220 days at $242 a day. But Pentagon records show that he "did not serve any days in pay status," a spokesman said. Secord, however, was a member of a special operations advisory group until his term expired last August.

Federal investigators have said privately that Secord, 54, is under investigation in connection with the transfer of money — through Swiss bank accounts and international arms merchants — from Iran to the Contras, the guerrillas fighting against Managua's Sandinista government.

Hayden addresses business school

LAWRENCE — Gov.-elect Mike Hayden said leaders in higher education, business and government must "forge a partnership to turn the state economy around" and, in a speech Thursday, called for education reform so taxpayers can see exactly where their money is being spent.

"The long-term welfare of higher education is directly related to a strong and healthy state economy," Hayden told the University of Kansas' School of Business advisory board.

"It's incumbent on me to restore fiscal integrity to state government and I'm going to need your help to forge a partnership between higher education, the business community and state government so we can forge ahead and build a healthy economy in Kansas."

Hayden said his immeditate priorities as governor will be to provide relief to the ailing oil and natural gas industry by expanding exemptions to the mineral severance tax for low-production oil wells. A similar proposal passed the 1986 Legislature but was vetoed by Gov. John Carlin due to its $5 million pricetag.

Ag businesses face greater decline

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City predicted Thursday more stable farm credit conditions, but said the high number of farm-related business failures proved that a serious problem remained.

Bankers in the 10th Fed District reported 4.4 percent of farm-related businesses went out of business in the last two quarters, a rate they considered four times greater than normal.

In the last year, bankers estimated 7 percent of farms liquidated, a rate considered 3.5 percent greater more than normal. Bankers reported 4.6 percent of the farms sold off part of their assets, four times the normal rate.

The Fed surveyed 160 bankers in the 10th District, which includes Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Wyoming.

Land values fell 2 percent in the second quarter, the same fall as the first quarter, according to the Fed report.

Overall land values were 14 percent less than the same period a year ago and were about 50 percent less than the market high reached in 1981.

The sharpest drop in land value was 8 percent in Oklahoma, which the Fed blamed on the slump in the oil and gas industry.

Man charged with shooting mayor

MOUNT PLEASANT, Iowa — Flags were lowered to half-staff Thursday, as a man who fought City Hall over a sewer flooding his home faced charges he opened fire on a City Council meeting, killing the mayor and wounding two councilors.

Ralph Orin Davis, 69, was ordered held on $700,000 bond Thursday on charges of murder and attempted murder.

Davis had complained twice previously to the council and sought reimbursement for water damage to his basement, city officials said. On Wednesday night he walked into the council chamber, muttered "You sons of bitches," and began shooting a pistol, authorities said.

Edward King, mayor of this southeastern Iowa city of 7,300 people for a decade, was shot once in the head. He was pronounced dead at 12:30 a.m. at University Hospitals in Iowa City, about 60 miles away.

Councilors JoAnn E. Sankey, 39, and Ronald Lee Dupree, 44, were flown by helicopter to the hospital. Mrs. Sankey was in critical condition with a head wound and two chest wounds; Dupree was in serious but stable condition with wounds to the head, neck and arm, said hospital spokesman Dean Borg.

Regular Union hours will resume on Jan. 5.

Correction

Due to a reporter's error, the story in Thursday's paper, "UFM personnel cut causes spring catalog reductions," was incorrect. Three large class catalogs will be published for the spring, summer and fall semesters. Two catalogs, one in mid-spring and one in mid-fall, will not be published.

Also, the increased publicity for University for Man classes was not expected from the new mailing process of the catalogs. This publicity was expected from having monthy registration sites in the Union and at the Manhattan Public Library.

Scholarship applications available at financial aid office, due Jan. 15

By The Collegian Staff

Scholarship applications for the 1987-88 school year must be submitted to the Office of Financial Aid by Jan. 15, said Larry Viterna, director of financial assistance.

Students applying for scholarships must fill out a Kansas Student Data Form, available at the office in Fairchild Hall, and indicate what type of scholarship is desired.

About 2,500 scholarships are offered at the University, Viterna said.

He said students should indicate which scholarship they are applying for on the KSDF because some scholarships are "restricted" — some of the scholarships are donated by people who specified their use for specific reasons. For example, some scholarships are given to students from a certain town.

Presentations of scholarships begin in late January, Viterna said, but some of the awards for high school seniors aren't given until later in the spring. Students transferring to K-State should apply for admissions before requesting financial aid.

Many departments on campus also give scholarships to students already enrolled in their department.

"Students should check with department heads to find out about these scholarships," Viterna said.

Special degrees to be given; fall graduates number 1,083

By The Collegian Staff

Four separate ceremonies will be conducted Saturday to honor 1,083 graduates at the 1986 Fall Commencement.

The ceremony for the College of Business Administration and the College of Agriculture will begin at 9 a.m., followed by Arts and Sciences, and Architecture and Design at 11 a.m., Education and the Graduate School at 1 p.m. and Engineering and Human Ecology at 3 p.m. All ceremonies will be in McCain Auditorium.

Several awards will also be given at the ceremonies. They include honorary doctorates to be awarded to Norman S. Nadel, New York drama critic and contributing editor of Horizon magazine at the 11 a.m. ceremony, and to LeRoy C. Paslay, retired president of Marine Seismic Surveys Inc. and Marine Geophysical Co. at the 3 p.m. ceremony.

In addition, a Distinguished Service Award will be given to Robert Tointon, president of Phelps Inc., Greeley, Colo., and 1955 K-State civil engineering graduate.

Hakim Salahu-Din, K-State assistant director of admissions, will receive the $1,000 Presidential Award for Distinguished Service to Minority Education.

University President Jon Wefald will deliver a commencement address to the graduating class and Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, will also speak.

Pat Bosco, commencement committee chair, said plans for the ceremonies were going well and, weather permitting, he expects a good crowd for the event.

A reception in Nichols Hall will follow each of the ceremonies. Hosted by Golden Key, it will offer free refreshments to parents and graduates, Bosco said.

Courses give practical experience in beginning business enterprises

By LAURA HACKLEY
Collegian Reporter

Students who are interested in starting their own businesses can get practical experience in courses taught at K-State. Two courses which require students to go through the steps involved when opening a new business are Retailing and Entrepreneurship, offered by the Department of Marketing.

The Department of Journalism and Mass Communications also offers Principles of Advertising, which has assigned students an extra credit project of inventing a business and creating advertising for it.

The retailing course is taught by Jodi Thierer, who requires students to go through steps involved in opening a business. Students develop marketing strategies, financing strategies, a location, pricing policies and a merchandise budget as a group project.

Thierer requires these steps of her students for two reasons. One is for a learning experience and to give students a chance to not only hear and read about the organization, but to also participate.

The second reason is because the business failure rate is high, partially due to poor management planning. Theirer wants her students to know what is involved.

"If they open a business in the future, I want them to know what they are getting into and prepare them," Thierer said.

Pam Lutz, senior in marketing, took retailing and enjoyed creating a business. Lutz's group created a new lingerie store called "It's Only Fitting."

"We found there was a need for an undergarment store that featured sizes for everyone," Lutz said.

Theirer said there have been all sorts of ideas for businesses, but nothing really out of the ordinary. Ideas include grocery stores, floral shops, liquor stores, bars and clothing stores. This semester, one of the groups in her class is creating a clothing store called "O'Domanni's Fashion Risk."

The students don't have to give an oral presentation, but they are required to turn in a 10-page term paper on their project.

Another class offered by the marketing department is Entrepreneurship taught by Bob Brockhaus. This class requires students to prepare a complete business plan for a new business. The plan includes the qualifications of the founders, market anaylsis, facility, location, tax and insurance considerations and financial statements.

All these aspects have to center around the careful planning of future objectives. The students have to give their final presentation before a local bank president.

This year, Phil Brockenicky, president of First Savings Bank, and William Edison, president of Union National Bank, listened to the presentations. Brockhaus requires his students to give their presentation to a bank president so they will feel comfortable dealing with bankers.

"I want my students to find out that bankers aren't the meanest animals in the world," Brockhaus said.

Brockhaus usually has 20 to 25 people in his class, and it does require instructor permission. The class has students from every major of study.

Principles of Advertising has in the past allowed the students to make up a business for extra credit. Amber Ray, senior in journalism and mass communications, created a clothing store.

"It was fun to make up the ultimate business," Ray said.

Students find reasons to cheer for Wildcats

What a way to go! Rising above recent budget cuts and acting without the help of a student athletic fee, the Wildcat men's basketball team has given students a reason to return to K-State for the spring semester.

Off to a rousing 6-0 start, their best since the 1979-80 season, the Wildcats are showing sparks of the old "glory days" when the rafters rang in Ahearn Field House. Like a sign held up by a student at Tuesday's victory over Creighton University stated, "Ahearn Rocks Again."

Only four years ago — a few fifth-year seniors can still remember this — lines formed early outside Ahearn before every game, even those in mid-week, and every seat in the student section was filled. Those were the days of the overnight camp outs in front of the ticket office to purchase season tickets.

At that time, support for a new coliseum was overwhelming. A larger, better-equipped arena seemed necessary. Now, that coliseum is being constructed, although the necessity of it is in doubt.

Regardless of the need for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, the 'Cats are back. New Coach Lon Kruger seems to be doing inspirational things to the team, and they are responding with aggressive, action-packed basketball. They remain the only undefeated team in the Big Eight. And fans still await the return of Norris Coleman.

For those who haven't yet attended a game, they're missing not only what promises to be a Big Eight basketball powerhouse; they're missing a part of K-State tradition.

People bury holiday below commercialism

As the cute Santa Claus faces peeked from between the jack o'lanterns and the cheerful red and green colors of Christmas mixed with the harvest golds of Thanksgiving, the commercialization of this yearly religious holiday is rather blatant.

The true meaning of good will toward men and the giving of gifts for the pure sake of giving is still there somewhere under the non-flammable tinsel and wrapping paper. We hope the people frantically shoving and pushing to get the last toy on the shelf are at the same time thinking of getting peace on earth as their favorite Christmas present.

If the true meaning of the holiday is not lost in the midst of the three month holiday season, then the extravagant decorations and the hubbub surrounding the one day of celebration is acceptable.

With the last day of classes almost behind, and graduation and those dreaded finals ahead, the Christmas spirit may not be top on list of things to think about, but don't allow it to become buried completely.

One thing to remember is have a safe trip home and enjoy the holiday season.

Contra rebels spread terror to Hondurans

On Monday, Gen. Humberto Regalado Hernandez, the Honduran armed forces chief, "ordered the air force to attack groups of Sandinista troops that have entered (Honduran) territory," and added that, "these actions will not cease until the invading forces abandon Honduran territory for good."

The general was obviously speaking of the 1,000 Sandinista troops that have crossed the Honduran border in pursuit of Contra rebel forces and the resulting airlift provided by the U.S. government. But he might also pause to reflect on the other "invading forces (that should) abandon Honduran territory for good" — the Contras.

Even now, two months after the Honduran government refused to allow the Contras to train on Honduran soil, Honduras continues to provide a sanctuary for "the invading forces." Even now, 6½ years after the Contras began terrorizing northern Nicaragua, the Honduran government continues to deny that Contra troops are allowed on its soil. Who does the Honduran government think it is fooling?

Now might be an apropos time for the people of this country to reflect on what the Contras have achieved. They have killed more than 17,000 Nicaraguans — the overwhelming majority of which have been civilians. The various efforts to fund them have resulted in who knows how many violated laws (including the World Court's decision that the United States was illegally mining Nicaraguan harbors), and after all this not one inch of Nicaraguan soil has been surrendered.

Furthermore, the attacks on remote villages have led the Sandinistas to seek even more weapons and equipment from the various East-bloc nations — a situation that everyone agreed from the outset was to be avoided.

The U.S. government has completely given up any pretense of concern it might have once feigned for the people of Nicaragua, but what of the Hondurans who are supposedly our allies in this exercise in democracy? How many Hondurans have died as a result of the Sandinistas' attempts to protect their border from terrorist attacks?

When all is said and done, will Americans look back at this Central American adventure as a great moment in history, or will they instead ponder what it was about the tiny nation of Nicaragua that was so important as to require them to send their own sons to battle?

Friends are high points of semester

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

It's here — the last day of classes, the last paper and my last column of the semester. It's not a semester I would repeat, but I wouldn't have missed it for the world.

My classes were all good ones that I enjoyed (most of the time). Sometimes, it seemed as if I was moving all the time trying to get things done and I didn't have any time to spend just for me. Then, other times I did have the chance to relax, to spend time doing things I enjoy and to spend time with friends.

It's been a good semester for friends. I've gained several whom I wouldn't trade for anything. My circle of acquaintances has expanded to include some really neat and wonderful people. So for the most part, the people in my life are something else.

It's a good thing, too. I've reached my maximum stress point. And when I do that, I get a little strange. I have been nothing but weird the past two weeks. I just hope I haven't shocked too many people or at least I shocked them just a little.

When I reach my breaking point, I tend to get more sentimental, the tears flow more easily and I become even more introverted than usual. I've spent more time the last couple of weeks crying over television shows than I have in a long time. Last week, it was the made-for-TV movie, "Love Is Never Silent." I taped it earlier and finally had time to watch. But then I cried during last week's episode of "MacGyver," too. So I know it's just that time of year when everything hits a little too close to home. I trust you all are reacting better to the stress.

It's strange where my ideas for this column come from. Sometimes, it's something a friend said, or an event has happened to raise questions, or it's something I've been feeling or thinking about.

For instance, this week I've been thinking about the end of the semester and how things change, about this column and about the holidays.

With the end of classes and graduation, people move and friendships change. It's not easy to accept, but it is something we have to live with. I've lost touch with some very important (at least at one time they were important) people through distance, time and growth.

It's not something I'm proud of, but I have trouble keeping in touch with people when my life, and their's, is so hectic and full of other things. Besides, I'm a terrible letter writer. So they might get a letter once a year or at least the Christmas card with a note but that's about all. I'd much rather call or see them in person, which isn't easy to do when the friends are all over the country, from Miami to Texas to North Dakota.

Other friends may be in the same town but through circumstances which seem to be beyond our control, we lose touch. That's happened at least once this semester, much to my regret. It may have been we weren't really friends or that a choice was made through outside circumstances, so we lost touch. It's not something I chose to happen, but happen it did.

I've been thinking about this column, too — not only what I would write about this week and next semester but the reactions and comments I've received as a result of it.

It's a new and often strange experience to have people recognize me through the picture printed with this column. I don't know that I really like it, but it's been interesting. I do want to thank the people who have commented on my writing — your feedback and comments have been appreciated, please continue to do so. And to those who have recognized me and said hello, keep that up, too. It's fun.

Unfortunately, I have had some not so fun experiences with it.

Last week, a group of somewhat intoxicated "boys" walked by me on campus. They waited until they were several yards past me and then they began the loud, obnoxious, rude and nasty comments usually associated with inebriation.

They were referring, at least I think they were, to one of my past columns when I talked about not being able to understand such behavior. I still don't understand it and I definitely don't appreciate it.

My other thoughts for this week have centered around the holidays, shopping for family and friends. So if you will allow me to indulge a whim, here's my Christmas list.

For my family, all the things I can't yet afford to give you but most of all my love.

To LDE, thanks for the talks and the friendship. I hope you gain the confidence in yourself the rest of us already have in you.

To DWW, TJS, RGH, MAU, TEB, etc., (the jiffing crew) thanks for the laughter. It's a precious gift and I wish I could return it as well as you present it. I hope you know the friendships are appreciated and needed. To all of you, I hope what you wish for most comes true.

To AM, the shoulder is always there. You know I enjoy your company for the theater performances. I hope the future is brighter than this semester has been.

To TL, thanks for the time and talks. Hope the jobs and the future work out for you and yours.

To the RP staff, here's to a wonderful book and a great second semester. It's been fun so far — hope it stays that way.

To the Collegian staff, it's been interesting. I'm looking forward to the fun next semester.

To my instructors this semester, thank you. It was a long one but we all made it through. May your break be restful and calming because it soon starts all over again.

To K-Staters everywhere, a very "purple" Christmas! Let's see and hear the spirit.

To all of you, I hope your holidays are wonderful. I wish everyone a place to call home, a friend to talk with, a dream to live by. Keep warm and merry!

Decisions on budget

Editor,

Re: The editorial, "Campus budget cuts mean fewer teachers," in Thursday's Collegian.

Your editorial concerning budget cuts strongly suggests that we have not been straightforward with our analysis of the impacts of the cuts.

Indeed, you state, "basically, officials indicated that belt tightening alone would tide the University over. It won't and it's apparent considerable sacrifices will have to be made."

In our announcement on Nov. 24, President Wefald indicated that this is not business-as-usual. I quote from that release, "We're asking every element of the University to make real sacrifices in this emergency. But we are determined at all costs, for as long as possible, and in so far as we are able, to preserve the essential heart of this institution — its educational ability and the students it serves." That simple belt tightening would accomplish this budget cut has never been implied. I fail to make the distinctions you apparently have made between "apparent considerable sacrifices" and "real sacrifices in this emergency."

We have been completely candid in stating our primary objective of doing everything possible to insulate the University's educational programs from the full impact of this cut. The deans, their department heads and faculty are doing everything possible to minimize the impacts of the budget cuts on the instructional programs — including trying to find every possible way to continue part-time appointments. In reality, many vacant positions will be held open, others will be filled, but these are decisions to be made at the college or departmental level.

In the short period of time we have had to consider these cuts, I believe we have been straightforward about both the severity of the cuts and our priorities.

Campus Christmas

Editor,

It's possible speculation may have generated some confusion about the operation of the University over the holiday period.

Plans remain unchanged from those announced Dec. 1 in a letter from President Wefald to deans, directors and department heads: "...for the period from 6 p.m. Wednesday, December 24, to 8 a.m., Monday, January 5, all but strictly essential university activity be curtailed and that building temperatures be held at 55 degrees.... During this curtailed holiday schedule, employees are encouraged to take annual or compensatory leave."

The letter also states, "Any requests for temperature exceptions that are thought to be essential must be endorsed by the appropriate dean or vice president who should then forward them to me for consideration by the Central Administrative Staff." These requests must be in by Dec. 12.

Following a review of the requests for exceptions, the administration will be able to make a determination of which University units will be excepted from the holiday curtailment.

While the University will be open during the Christmas holidays, we anticipate the temperature restrictions in all but areas that provide essential service will result in many employees taking leave and we will be able to realize an energy savings.

Service commemorates victims of alcohol-related accidents

Dan Pharis, Manhattan, prepares candles to be handed out at Thursday night's vigil in front of the Riley County Courthouse. Pharis's father, David, was killed by a drunk driver in an October 1984 accident.

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

About 25 people gathered on the steps of the Riley County Courthouse last night to remember and honor those who lost their lives in alcohol- and drug-related accidents during the past year.

The second annual candlelight vigil was led by Donna Bolek, president of the Riley County Chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Driving. The participants lighted candles Thursday evening to represent the 186 people killed in Riley County in 1985 due to alcohol-related accidents.

National Drunk Drivers Awareness Week begins Dec. 14 and candlelight vigils will be held across the nation in association with the week.

"This is held close to the holidays because the loss of loved ones is on individuals' minds so much," Bolek said. "The number of people here aren't as important as just creating awareness of the problem."

The Rev. Dave Stewart, campus minister of the First Baptist Church, 2121 Blue Hills Road, led the opening prayer saying, "We are brought together in pain. May we help others avoid the same tragedy."

Last year, 23,000 lives were lost in alcohol/vehicle accidents, Manhattan Mayor Rick Mann said.

"One out of two people will be involved in a traffic accident in which someone's response was impaired by alcohol or drugs," he said.

He went on to say that alcohol-related deaths are the leading cause of death for people between 15 and 24 years of age.

"But 23,000 is just a sobering statistic," Mann said. "To find the real loss, you have to look further. Look at one number at a time. Each number was a person. Many things can be replaced, but not a life. That person lost a dream and we lost a hug forever."

A scroll containing the names of people killed in Riley County within the last year was dedicated by Stewart. The names were read by Bolek as the gathered people held their candles.

"This has been happening too much. The only way it's going to stop is to have guts enough to stand up and put a stop to it," Bolek said.

Red ribbons were distributed to people to tie on the handle of their left car door. The ribbons were dedicated to the memory of those lost and to remind people throughout the holidays not to drink and drive.

The closing prayer was lead by Stephen Carlson, assistant pastor at the Living Word Church.

Campus lab diagnoses plant diseases

By LORI LUGINBILL
Collegian Reporter

An important link between Cooperative Extension agents and individuals with plants suffering from diseases is the plant pathology lab at K-State.

The Plant Disease Diagnostic Lab, located on the fourth floor of Throckmorton Hall, diagnoses about 2,000 diseases each year found in crops, trees, pasture grasses and horticultural plants, said Jane Christensen, instructor of plant pathology and lab specialist.

"The lab primarily answers questions about any type of plant disease problem," she said.

Christensen said the lab usually receives plants to analyze from the Extension agents. The agent submits the diseased plant, along with a list that gives the lab specialists some background information such as the plant type, where it grows and when it was planted.

Disease diagnoses are made by four state specialists who are in charge of analyzing specific plant types such as horticultural crops, wheat and small grains and row crops like corn and sunflowers, Christensen said.

The checklist used has a place at the bottom to place the diagnosis after it has been analyzed. It is then returned to the county agent. The agent then returns the plant to the owner, along with recommendations to the grower, she said.

Only in the case of an emergency will the diagnostic lab contact the grower directly, Christensen said.

"Anyone in the state can use the lab's services, but we mostly get crops from farmers and tree ornamentals from home owners," Christensen said. She also said businesses and agricultural consulting firms, such as nurseries and greenhouses, may submit plants for diagnosis.

Christensen said the most often diagnosed plants are trees, with wheat placing second. She said this may be due to the fact that Extension agents get a strong background in diagnosing crops in the field during their training. Therefore, she said, there is not a need to send crops to the lab for diagnosis in some cases.

Since there is not a great number of horticultural county extension agents in the state, trees and other woody ornamentals like roses must be analyzed at the lab, she said.

Christensen said that a diagnosis can be made the same day the plant is submitted if the symptoms are visual. Diagnosis is usually made within the week if a culture has to be taken.

Services performed at the plant diagnostic lab are free except for two tests.

The fescue endothyte test, conducted on pasture grass, is not a test for a disease within a plant, but the presence of it can be harmful to the cattle that feed on the afflicted grass. It does require a fee, Christensen said.

The second test requiring a fee is that for nematodes, small worms. This test involves taking plant samples and soil samples, she said.

Center contacts alumni to recruit in Thailand

By MARTA MONTGOMERY
Collegian Reporter

With recruitment being a hot issue on campus recently, the International Student Center has also been recruiting prospective students. The difference is that the students they have contacted are overseas — in Thailand.

The recruiting was done at a United States University Fair in Thailand, sponsored by the Institute of International Education, said Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center. Alumni currently living in Thailand collected a list of hundreds of names of Thai students interested in studying at K-State, she said.

The idea was brought up last spring when Davis received information from the Institute of International Education about a United States University Fair planned for the fall.

Davis said the Institute wanted to have representatives from as many different universities as possible. It was planning to have the representatives meet with Thai students who were interested in studying in the United States.

The information suggested sending either University employees or K-State alumni to the Fair.

Since no University employee was available for an overseas trip, she gave the information to Burachai Sonthayanontha, president of the Thai Students Association, and graduate student in biochemistry. He began looking for alumni who might be available to attend the Fair.

He contacted Bondee Atikij, a former Thai student who received her doctorate from K-State in 1985. Atikij returned to Thailand after her graduation. When she was contacted by Sonthayanontha, she said she would be glad to represent K-State at the Fair.

The Institute also suggested each representative bring handouts, videotapes, films and any other information that would help advertise his or her respective university.

Davis said the University started working on the project a little late. In spite of this, Pat Bosco, assistant vice president of institutional advancement, was able to prepare some information which Atikij could take with her to the Fair.

Atikij attended the Fair Oct. 4 in Thailand and reported to Sonthayanontha that it was a great success. She said more than 3,000 students attended the Fair and more than 100 universities were represented.

Atikij sent a list of hundreds of names of Thai students who signed up because they are interested in K-State and want more information about the University.

Davis said there was a great interest in the business administration program.

She said she will study the list of students interested in K-State and break it down into the various colleges in order to send information across campus. The colleges will then be able to respond to the interest generated by the Fair, she said.

South Africa tightens censorship of journalists

By The Associated Press

PRETORIA, South Africa — The government imposed severe censorship Thursday, requiring journalists to get official approval before reporting on most peaceful actions against apartheid as well as violent unrest.

An independent Johannesburg daily, the Star, said in a front-page editorial: "This is just possibly the last edition of any relatively free newspaper you will read in South Africa."

New rules issued by President P.W. Botha go beyond press censorship. They also bar anti-apartheid activists from making "subversive statements" that urge resistance to the white government through many forms of non-violent civil disobedience.

Among those are rent, consumer and school boycotts; strikes; protest meetings; complaints about compulsory military service, and establishment of civic associations and people's courts.

Previous curbs on journalists under the emergency restricted coverage of violence and actions by security forces, but not peaceful protest.

The United Democratic Front, a multiracial alliance that has organized peaceful protests for two years, said it would challenge the regulations in court.

Azhar Cachalia, the national treasurer, said: "The UDF fears that any possibility of a relatively non-violent or negotiated transition to democracy will now disappear. It is clear that the Nationalist government has not only lost control but has gone completely mad."

His statement was issued directly to foreign news organizations and the independent South African Press Association. SAPA distributed the item, but it asked subscribers 90 minutes later to kill it because of a ban by government censors.

By then, the statement had been used in some foreign news broadcasts and relayed in print form by several foreign journalists. In response to an inquiry from The Associated Press pointing out the difficulties of withdrawing a statement already widely distributed, the censors said 25 minutes later that publication could not be permitted.

Stoffel van der Merwe, deputy information minister, told foreign journalists Wednesday he opposed censorship personally, but he said the new restrictions were necessary because the government faced "a calculated, well planned revolutionary onslaught."

Activities banned apparently include further calls by the United Democratic Front for a 10-day Christmas boycott of white-owned stores and coverage of the boycott if it occurs.

The new regulations were issued under the state of emergency imposed June 12 because of an uprising against the apartheid policy of race discrimination that began more than two years ago.

A report by the South African Institute of Race Relations said 2,291 people had died in political violence from September 1984 to the end of last month.

In response to an AP query whether the figure could be published, the new media censorship center replied after two hours that publication was approved.

The center also suggested the inclusion of "official data" that 1,831 people had been killed in unrest in the same period. Government figures on the death toll are consistently lower than the institute's.

WHEN IS THE RIGHT TIME TO CALL YOUR BOYFRIEND?

a) When the president of Phi Gamma Delta asks you to Saturday night's Fiji Formal.

b) After raquetball class, to tell him that the instructor with the Australian accent and those blue eyes did wonders for your serve.

c) When you just feel like telling him you miss him after all.

Maybe you shouldn't tell him everything that's going on. But if you still care about him, why not call and whisper some sweet things he'll never forget?
Like why you call using AT&T Long Distance Service, and why you trust AT&T's high quality service and exceptional value.
When you tell him that AT&T gives you immediate credit if you dial a wrong number, he won't be able to get you out of his mind.
And telling him you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections will drive him crazy.
All of which will probably inspire him to drive out for the weekend, giving you an excuse to blow off that silly frat party after all.

WSU next task for 6-0 'Cats

Second road test of season

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State, which has had little trouble disposing of its foes at home so far, will soon find out just how good it is away from the friendly confines of Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats will face only their second road test of the young season when they square off against intrastate rival Wichita State Saturday — the first of two meetings between the teams this year.

"It's an in-state rivalry and it's at their place so I know the crowd's going to be wild. We'll have to be ready," said guard William Scott, the Wildcats' second-leading scorer.

K-State, 6-0, has beaten all five home opponents by an average of 28 points, and no opposing team has been closer than 15 points at game's end.

However, the team barely escaped with a narrow 73-72 victory over the Red Raiders of Texas Tech in its first and only road game of the season thus far.

The 'Cats, coming off a 90-67 win over Abilene Christian Thursday, will attempt to record their longest season-opening winning streak since the 1979-80 season, when the team was victorious in its first eight contests enroute to a 22-9 season.

K-State leads the series between the two rivals 8-5, having won last year's contest in Manhattan 77-60, but will be facing an improved team this time around.

After a 14-14 record last season, first-year head coach Eddie Fogler — a former assistant to North Carolina coach Dean Smith — has the Shockers off to a 4-2 start this year, including an impressive 61-48 victory over Mississippi State on the road Wednesday.

K-State head coach Lon Kruger attributed his team's lackluster performance Thursday night in part to the squad's anticipation of the upcoming game. Kruger himself, however, said after the game that he had not looked ahead to the game with the Shockers.

"We really don't know too much about them right now. I do know that they're playing hard and playing well. Coach Fogler has them doing a lot of things that North Carolina is doing — multiple defenses, a good brisk passing game offensively," he said.

The Shockers are led by senior center Henry Carr who paces the team in both scoring (16 per game) and rebounding (9.5).

The WSU contest marks the beginning of a long stretch of road games for the 'Cats over the Christmas vacation.

K-State will play at Nashville, Tenn., Dec. 19-20 in the Music City Invitational. Should the Wildcats defeat Illinois State, another Missouri Valley Conference opponent, in the tourney's opening round, they would then likely face the host Vanderbilt Commodores.

Vandy has already turned some heads with their victory over highly ranked Indiana Tuesday.

After traveling to Rockford, Ill., Dec. 23 to square off against the Northern Illinois Huskies, the 'Cats will face by far their sternest test of the season.

Smith and the North Carolina Tarheels will provide opposition for the 'Cats Dec. 27 as the two teams battle in Kansas City's Kemper Arena. North Carolina was rated No. 1 in nearly everyone's preseason poll, and is currently listed among the top five.

The team will not return to Ahearn again until it opens the Big Eight Conference season Jan. 10 against the Nebraska Cornhuskers. The game will mark the return of star forward Norris Coleman, who has been ruled ineligible to compete until that time by the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

Rugged road campaign awaits Lady Cat cagers

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER
Sports Writer

The women's basketball team's rugged early-season road schedule continues Saturday when the Lady Cats travel to Omaha to take on the Creighton Lady Bluejays in a 1 p.m. contest.

K-State, 5-2, is coming off a 73-72 win over Drake Thursday.

Creighton enters the contest with a 4-0 record, which includes a victory over Big Eight Conference opponent Nebraska. The Lady Jays have also downed Montana State, South Dakota and Chicago State.

Creighton is paced by forward Pam Gradoville, who is averaging 21.3 points and 10.5 rebounds per game. Junior guard Tanya Warren averages 16.8 points and 2.8 boards per game, while Janet Ensign adds eight rebounds and 7.3 points per outing.

Through four games, the Lady Jays have averaged 77 points per contest while their defense has surrendered just 56.8 points per game.

Over the Christmas break, the Lady Cats will play host to the University of Missouri-Kansas City Dec. 19 in Ahearn Field House, and then head west immediately after Christmas where K-State will play three California schools in five days.

California-Santa Barbara will host the Lady Cats Dec. 29, and K-State will take on the Cal State-Fullerton Lady Titans the next night in Fullerton, Calif. Coach Matilda Mossman's squad will finish up their West Coast trip with a Jan. 2 match-up with Chapman College of Orange, Calif.

The Lady Cats then travel to Norman, Okla. Jan. 6 to take on preseason Big Eight favorite Oklahoma in both team's conference opener. K-State finally returns home to host Oral Roberts on Jan. 8.

The K-State-Creighton game will be featured on a delayed broadcast on WIBW radio after the Wildcats' men's game against Wichita State Saturday night. The approximate starting time of the women's game broadcast is 9:30 p.m.

ACU falls victim to sluggish K-State squad

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

To hear head coach Lon Kruger talk after the game with Abilene Christian Thursday night, you'd have thought the score was reversed.

For the record, the Wildcats came out on top 90-67.

"We came out and got whipped, no question about it," Kruger said after the game in Ahearn Field House.

"I think Abilene Christian was more ready to play, was quicker to the ball and had more fight than we did. (They had) more pride in what they were doing and were a much more impressive ballclub."

Kruger's displeasure stemmed from what he considered to be a lackadaisical effort on the part of his squad.

"(Abilene Christian) got the loose balls. They were more alert and quicker to the ball. Usually when there's a loose ball, I expect us to get it. When there was one tonight, I expected Abilene Christian to get it," he said.

Guard William Scott, K-State's leading scorer with 23 points, affirmed Kruger's sentiments.

"I don't think we came out and really took them seriously," Scott said. "They came out and established a good tempo, and it was hard for us to fight back and get the momentum going our way."

The 'Cats opened the game ice cold from the field as Abilene Christian built a 10-6 lead after five minutes of play. The 'Cats did not grab the lead until forward Mitch Richmond's thunderous dunk gave the team a 14-12 advantage nine minutes into the contest.

K-State gradually built the lead until it reached 12 at one point before leaving the court at intermission with a 38-26 advantage.

The Wildcats were unable to shake the pesky squad from Texas in the second half, as they led by only 10 points with the game clock under 11 minutes before the 'Cats finally took control. They extended their lead to 28 on two occasions before ending with the final 23-point margin.

As expected, K-State used the three-point line to its advantage. The 'Cats netted nine-of-19 from long range while Abilene Christian connected on its only attempt of the night. William Scott led the way as he hit on six-of-nine attempts behind the line and maintained his lead in the Big Eight Conference in that category.

The game marked the return of senior forward Percy Eddie, who has been sidelined with a broken wrist since the beginning of the season. Eddie made the most of the final few minutes of the game in which he played with three points, an assist and two blocked shots.

"It felt great," Eddie said. "I've been waiting for a long time."

> 'Abilene Christian) got the loose balls. They were more alert and quicker to the ball. Usually when there's a loose ball, I expect us to get it. When there was one tonight, I expected Abilene Christian to get it.' — Lon Kruger

Eddie, who had his wrist heavily taped for the game, said although the wrist feels fine, it will take another couple of weeks to be back at full strength. He expects to see increased playing time in the next few games and hopes to make his way all the way back into the starting lineup.

The team will be in action next Saturday night, on the road against intrastate rival Wichita State.

Abilene Christian University forward Vincent Patton gets rid of the ball after scrambling with K-State guard Mark Dobbins, as Wildcats Steve Henson (12) and Charles Bledsoe (32) assist in Thursday's game in Ahearn Field House. K-State won the matchup 90-67.

Leiding leads Cats by Drake, 73-72

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's women's basketball team overcame a 13-point halftime deficit to defeat Drake 73-72 Thursday in Des Moines, Iowa.

The Lady Cats, 5-1, were paced by 14 points from the team's leading scorer Sue Leiding. Susan Green added 12 points and Carlisa Thomas and Theza Fitzpatrick chipped in 11 points apiece.

For Drake, still looking for its first win of the season, it was the sixth consecutive loss. The Lady Bulldogs only played six players and were paced by their leading scorer, sophomore Missy Slockett, who tallied 29 points.

Drake held a 37-24 lead at the half.

K-State shot well from the field by hitting more than 53 percent of its shots, while Drake hit 54 percent of its field goal attempts. K-State turned the ball over 10 times while Drake was forced into 13 errors.

Even though the Lady Bulldogs were seeking their first win of the season, Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman didn't take the Lady Bulldogs record lightly after Drake played a tough early-season schedule which included Iowa and Kansas.

"They're a real scrappy and aggressive team, and I feel like they're ready to explode," said Mossman after Wednesday night's practice.

K-State will next play undefeated Creighton. The Lady Bluejays, 4-0, have defeated Montana State, Chicago State and South Dakota.

Henson settles in fine as part-time director

By DAVE WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

Steve Henson said after Thursday night's win over Abilene Christian University that he feels comfortable swapping leadership roles with Lynn Smith at point guard.

For a freshman, this may seem like a difficult thing to do. Not for Henson, though.

"I think that I've gained their respect (from the other players)," Henson said. "When we're out on the floor, everyone treats each other equally, so I just try to take some leadership and they respond pretty well."

A 5-foot 11-inch product of McPherson, Henson has proven himself an all-around contributor to the Wildcat team this year by playing his brand of quick, aggressive basketball.

Henson's play in Thursday's game against Abilene Christian College's version of Wildcats was respectable — both offensively and defensively.

Offensively, he tallied five points — hitting a three pointer in the first half — and netting two-of-two from the charity stripe in the second half. Moreover, he lead the team in assists with three, one of which was off a rebound he threw the length of the court to forward Mitch Richmond who promptly slammed it home turning things around in the first half for the ailing Wildcats.

Henson also engineered K-State play offensively at point guard, exchanging the role throughout the game with Lynn Smith. It is his quick defensive play, though, that is his strong side at this time in the season.

"Defense has been (the strongest part of my game)," Henson said, "but I think I'm a little better shooter than I have been lately," he said.

Coach Lon Kruger has been very pleased with the progress of his youngest player, but still notes a bit of impatience in his play.

"I thought he did (take a leadership role)," Kruger said. "I thought he was rushing things in the first half, but in the second half, when our defense was getting a little more solid, it was a result of him up front picking up the level of intensity in our game."

Henson has yet to get the starting call from Kruger, but is content playing in his present role for the undefeated K-State team.

Although gaining a starting role on the basketball team is important to Henson, he will also be active in the track and field program at K-State. He will begin his track career immediately after the basketball season ends, concentrating on the decathlon.

As a high school senior, Henson was a state champion high jumper with a personal best of 7-2.

Mets, Padres complete eight-player trade

By The Associated Press

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. — New York and San Diego completed an eight-player trade Thursday night involving power-hitting outfielder Kevin McReynolds for several of the Mets' young talents in the final hours of baseball's slowest-ever winter meetings.

The Mets and Padres had spent several days discussing the trade before finalizing the swap after several meetings Thursday.

To get McReynolds, along with relief pitcher Gene Walter and minor-league infielder Adam Ging, the Mets had to surrender five players.

Going to San Diego are two of New York's best outfield prospects, Stanley Jefferson and Shawn Abner, multi-purpose Kevin Mitchell and two minor-league pitchers, Kevin Armstrong and Kevin Brown.

McReynolds, 27, batted .288 with 26 home runs and 96 runs batted in last season. He would play left field for the Mets and join Darryl Strawberry and Len Dykstra in the outfield.

Mitchell, 24, batted .277 with 12 home runs and 43 RBI in his rookie season. He was the only player in the majors to start at six positions — all but pitcher, catcher and second base — and batted in every spot in the lineup except ninth. Mitchell, born and raised in San Diego, was the Mets' starting left fielder for the second half of the season.

Most teams checked out of the Diplomat Hotel by evening, and most left the 85th annual event empty-handed. The Philadelphia Phillies acquired veteran Mike Easler from the New York Yankees in the morning and Oakland and Chicago made a lesser swap later, bringing the total to seven trades involving 21 major-league players. At last

The Phillies began the morning by acquiring Easler and a minor-league pitcher from the Yankees for pitcher Charles Hudson and a minor-leaguer.

Easler, a .294 career hitter who batted .302 with 14 home runs and 78 RBI last season, had demanded a trade from the Yankees. Easler, 36, had been dealt from Boston to the Yankees this season (for Don Baylor) in the middle of a multi-year contract, giving him the right to demand a deal.

Hudson, 27, went 7-10 with a 4.94 ERA this season.

Editors try to free Chilean press; local publisher aids group's cause

By The Collegian Staff

The Inter-American Press Association, in an effort to encourage the government of Chile to allow five weekly publications to reopen, sent a mission to Chile last week.

One of the weeklies reopened Tuesday, said Ed Seaton, publisher of the Manhattan Mercury and director of the IAPA executive committee. Since these publications were closed down in September, this will be the second weekly that the government has allowed to reopen.

The five IAPA members of the mission were in Chile for three days. The group of editors from the United States, Colombia, Argentina and Panama met with the minister of interior and the minister of information in Chile, Seaton said.

The IAPA, an organization of Western hemisphere publications formed in 1926, is made up of editors and publishers devoted to the promotion and protection of freedom of the press and democratic institutions. The United States has been a member since 1946.

"Basically, what has kept the IAPA going over the years has been the considerable success in getting publishers out of jail and reopening newspapers," Seaton said.

Seaton, prompted by his interest in Latin America, has been active in IAPA for 14 years.

After the government of Peru confiscated newspapers in Lima, Seaton was sent on the mission to meet with government officials there, and in 1980 these newspapers were reopened.

On March 11, 1987, a new daily newspaper, La Epoca, is scheduled to begin publication in Chile.

"IAPA helps (the publishers of La Epoca) in the sense that we push the Chilean government to allow them to publish," Seaton said. The Chilean constitution requires approval by government for new publications to be distributed within the country, he said.

"This publication, which will be an opposition newspaper, is a major development in Santiago," Seaton said.

Hearings

Oct. 8, Casey contacted Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter, then national security adviser to President Reagan, about the Canadian threat. Casey, they said, was told that such a disclosure through a lawsuit would "blow the cover" on the Iranian arms deal and jeopardize chances of winning the release of Americans held hostage in Lebanon by pro-Iranian extremists.

One House Foreign Affairs Committee member, who spoke only on condition that he not be identified, said that sometime after Casey's conversation with Furmark, the CIA director summoned Marine Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, a member of the National Security Council staff who was coordinating the administration's efforts to aid the Contras.

The House member said Casey testified that he asked North whether he knew of any third-party support for the Contra rebels, and that North replied that he did not. Meese has said that North, who has refused to testify before congressional committees on grounds of possible self-incrimination, was the only administration official who knew "precisely" of the diversion of arms profits to the Contras.

Cohen said the Senate panel, after two weeks of hearings, still lacks sufficient evidence to conclude where the arms deal money went, to whom and under what circumstances.

"It's possible the money may never have left the Swiss bank accounts," Cohen said. "It may still be there. Or it may have been paid out for some kind of weapons that were traded for other weapons."

David Durenberger, R-Minn., chairman of the Senate intelligence panel, said in Omaha, Neb., Thursday that Poindexter, North and retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard Secord, another key figure in the arms deal, should "either take off their uniforms or...take off their Fifth Amendments."

Durenberger said he doesn't believe President Reagan was involved in illegal activities, but by allowing his former national security advisers to refuse to testify, the president "is making it look a lot more like he's guilty."

The senator said Reagan made a mistake in allowing a secretive environment in which a few close aides were "using a bunch of rug merchants" to conduct sensitive foreign policy operations. To prevent similar future occurrences, Durenberger said, "you don't restrain the National Security Council, you restrain the president."

Former national security adviser Robert McFarlane, in a speech here Thursday, said he believes the policy of making overtures to moderate elements in Iran was "sensible, apparently feasible and perhaps still a valuable course to pursue."

But McFarlane, who left the government in December, said government officials charged with responsibility for foreign policy must be fully involved, and "you must rely on the support of Congress and the American people."

Landscape architecture students show plans on expanding Manhattan urban community

By The Collegian Staff

Landscape Design Studio III students will present the results of a semester-long study applying ecological planning to the expansion of the Manhattan urban area today in the Union.

Alan Tautges, assistant professor of landscape architecture, said five of 15 students in his studio will be giving a presentation at 2 p.m. in the Union Big Eight Room.

"The heart of the presentation is a resource inventory and suitability analysis" of the 50-square mile Manhattan urban area, Tautges said.

The class was split into three groups each studying possibilities for different increases in population, he said.

"They had to come up with a plan to maintain the land and still make enough room for the city to expand," he said. "We picked the Manhattan area because it would be easy to go to the sites, and we could ask questions of people involved and get answers right away.

"Most of the time we, in the department of landscape achitecture, are concerned with the application of theories and ideas to real design and planning problems," he said. This project gave the students the chance to use what they have learned.

"All the research and planning is the students' own work," Tautges said. The students will present their project to the city of Manhattan next year.

Professor

he said. "Many of them have had some international study outside the country. The leaders are concerned with both the wildlife and the wildlife reserves in their country.

"Botswana is a cattle-based society and that produces a conflict of interests between these people's game management and the wildlife resources available."

Preservation of wildlife resources takes second place to the cattle and the resources cattle use, he said.

Poaching will be one issue that will be looked into in terms of wildlife resources; however, it is not the most important issue, he said.

The most important issues are the land resources and their preservation. Water and erosion of the land are some resources that research can benefit, he said.

Bussing said he thinks his teaching will definitely be enhanced by his study in Botswana.

"Anytime you have the opportunity to view something firsthand, you're enhancing your ability to teach that subject," he said.

Bussing will also be collecting data concerning the long-term monitoring of ecosystems for his own use.

"Whenever studies like these are done, there is often a better chance of receiving grants for further research," he said.

Students enrolled in classes that meet Wednesday (MTWUF, MTWF, MW, TWUF, WF, W, MWF) and all classes at the various hours on MU, MT, will be examined during the period designated by W and the hours of the regular class session. (See Item IV below and the chart above for special examination periods for certain courses.) For example, a class that regularly meets MWF at 11:30 will be examined on Monday, December 15, 11:50 a.m. to 1:40 p.m.

II. Students enrolled in classes that meet on a schedule which includes Tuesday, but does not include Wednesday, (T, TU, U, F, TUF, MT) and classes meeting at the various hours on TF and UF, will be examined during the period designated by T and the hour of the regular class session.

III. Day classes meeting only once a week on Monday, Thursday, Friday, or Saturday will be examined as follows:
Monday, Dec. 8 Thursday, Dec. 11 Friday, Dec. 12

IV. Evening classes will be examined during final exam week at a time following the last regularly scheduled class meeting and prior to the end of final examination week to be arranged by the instructor in consultation with class members.

V. No classes shall meet after Friday, Dec. 12, and all examinations shall be given as scheduled.

VI. Students scheduled to take more than two final examinations on any given day may see their instructors, and then Department Heads or Deans to resolve conflicts to relieve heavy examination loads.

VII. Students scheduled to take two or more special exams at the same time should take the one occurring first in the list at the scheduled time and arrange through the instructor, department head, or Dean to take the others at other times.

Organization helps farm families with financial difficulties

By ANNE BRANDSBERG
Collegian Reporter

Christmas Eve, 1985, the people in the Wetmore area donated time, food and clothes for farm families with financial problems.

The cause for these acts of kindness was a letter read over several regional radio stations that night. The letter, written by Wetmore businessman Guy Stedman, who is also the founder of Help the Farmers Inc., asked for help for farmers hurt by the farm crisis.

Stedman, owner of the hardware store in Wetmore, located approximately 50 miles northeast of Manhattan, said he began to see problems in the farm situation through talking with customers.

"People would come in and tell him how things were in the farm situation," said Clara Nieheus, co-founder of Help the Farmers Inc. "People were concerned but didn't know how to help. When they saw someone was willing to get involved, they gave their support. Our ideas have changed since we started.

"At the beginning, we thought it would be a good idea to raise money to help pay back some interest, but we realized we couldn't do that," she said.

"People donated their services to dispense these things. That's when we got physically involved," Niehues said.

But other problems entered the picture when Stedman's store burned last February, forcing the organization to move to downtown office space donated by other Wetmore merchants.

One of the organization's main functions is to assist farmers in obtaining clothing, food, shelter and fuel to keep warm in the winter. The group has also recently started a food bank, buying food such as canned goods and oatmeal from suppliers in the Kansas City area and Missouri.

Volunteer Glenda Noe said she had hoped for more staples like sugar, flour and baking soda, but the distributor only had canned goods.

Other food donations have been obtained from organizations such as the high school's Kayettes and grade school children, who collected canned goods during Halloween in a "Trick or Treat So Others Can Eat" campaign.

"We kept referring (the farmers) for legal advice when we got started," Niehues said. "Now we do a lot more than that."

"These people are ashamed to ask for help," Noe said. "For years in the past, they have been the ones that donated to the poor. Farmers are skeptical of coming in for fear of social condemnation. We try to ease their guilt feelings by making them realize there are lots of people who care."

Noe said there is more of a demand on their services when it gets cold, with people needing more food, warmer clothing and fuel for heating their homes.

"We're busy as bees in here working directly with people who need help," she said. "We're awfully busy. We get a lot of phone calls from very far away, sometimes from states way out East.

"When people realize they are faced with the threat of having their farm repossessed, they reach out," Noe said. "They don't seem to trust anyone near, so they call us."

She said "a tremendous response" has been achieved through telephone calls asking for donations, finding contributors who want to assist.

"We called the Wells'-Lamont Manufacturing Interest and asked for a donation of some gloves, because they have high quality, warm gloves," Noe said. "They gave me the name and address of a man I could write.

"I said we'd take seconds or whatever, just something to keep (the farmers') hands warm. And now we're waiting for a shipment of gloves to come in," Noe said.

Noe said the relief organization serves about 3,000 people in a 45-county area, with food collected in the area distributed locally. She also said they respond to requests from other area pantries serving farming communities.

These people don't fall under the Social Rehabilitation Services guidelines, Noe said.

"It doesn't matter that the people on the land don't necessarily own it; to SRS it's all the same," she said. "They are changing their guidelines to help the farmers, though. We still try to pick up where they leave off."

Help the Farmers Inc. also works with job placement, retraining and the county mental health department.

"We do peer counseling, (and) we offer lots of moral support to those who need it," Noe said. "It's very stressful to people who lose their farms."

Other Help the Farmers food banks are located in Williamsburg, Fredonia and Olsburg.

Niehues said other organizations are looking into other problems in the farming industry, trying to get prices changed and working for more favorable legislation.

"We let them do it because it takes too much time," she said. "We try to be the filler for those who need help now. Some aren't eligible for SRS programs and there are two-month waiting lists for other programs. We take into consideration the complex situation of farm bookkeeping. I'm a farm wife; I know how complex farm bookkeeping is."

The organization uses the same guidelines as the free lunch program in schools to determine which area farmers qualify for aid, with information coming from tax returns.

"We're mostly concerned with farm families with children, that they get plenty of nutrition, a good hot meal and, of course, fuel in the winter," Niehues said. "I say families, (but) really we help everyone in the farming community because anyone who lives in the farming community has a farm-related income."

Help the Farmers volunteers are paid by Volunteers in Service to America, but weren't picked up by Vista for two years, Niehues said.

"I did it for two years without getting paid. I suppose I'd do it anyway," she said.

"We pointed our service to those who need it. It's especially rewarding to be a volunteer. They (the farmers and their families) just need someone to talk to."

to the University Community

FINAL WEEK IS RAPIDLY APPROACHING. As the semester ends, students are thinking about the "catch-up" that needs to be done, often resulting in cramming and "all-nighters." For many students, the end of the semester means great anxiety and increased personal pressures.

The outcome of the semester often depends on final exams and sometimes students are unsure of how to cope with the level of stress that is common during final week. Many people need help and encouragement in seeking assistance in dealing with their stress.

Faculty may be contacted by students in their classes for advice or referral to campus/community resources.

For assistance with academic and related graduation problems, the offices of the academic deans and academic advisors should provide valuable assistance. Sources of help for personal or emotional concerns are less well known to both students and faculty. The following agencies may be of help in these situations:

A. For assistance with personal problems, test anxiety, vocational decision making, and study skills:
   1. Counseling Center, 103 Holton Hall, 532-6927 or walk in.
   2. Academic Assistance Center, 204 Holton Hall, 8 a.m.-12 p.m. and 1-5 p.m., 532-6492.

B. For critical emotional problems or severe physical reactions to stress:
   1. Mental Hygiene Clinic, Lafene Student Health Center, 8 a.m.-12 p.m. and 1-5 p.m., 532-6550.
   2. Lafene Student Health Center, 532-6544.
   3. St. Mary Hospital Emergency Room, open 24 hours, call 776-3322.
   4. FONE Crisis Center (a peer helping program), 5 p.m.-8:30 a.m., 532-6565

C. For detailed information about these sevices or consultation about appropriate resources for specific problem situations:
   1. U-LearN, Holton Hall, 8:30 a.m. to 4 p.m., 532-6442.
   2. Dean of Students Office, 102 Holton Hall, 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., 532-6432.
   3. DIAL Program for pre-recorded messages on mental health topics and alcohol/drug information, 532-6972.
   4. DIAL Program for pre-recorded messages on campus and community topics, and alcohol/drug information, 532-6907.

Poll reveals bookstore pays best text buy-back prices

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State Union Bookstore pays more for used textbooks than the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Fort Hays State University.

These are the results after polling Steve Jewett, textbook coordinator of KU; Jack Gilette, textbook supervisor of WSU; and Steve Gonzales, bookstore manager of Fort Hays State campus bookstores. The bookstores were asked when professors have to turn in their book orders to the bookstore; when the bookstore turns in the book orders to the publishers; how much the bookstore marks up new books; how much they buy back used books for, and how much they sell used books for.

The four bookstores vary in the amount they pay for used books.

Fort Hays State pays 50 percent of what the student bought the book for, whether the book was new or used when the student bought it, Gonzales said.

KU and WSU pay 50 percent of the current new book price, even if the book was bought used.

K-State pays 60 percent of the publisher's list price (new book price) for books that professors will use again, said Jerry Fields, book department manager of K-State Union Bookstore.

Professors in all four universities are supposed to turn in their book orders to the bookstore in April for the fall semester and in October for the spring semester. Each bookstore gives the professors specific deadlines each semester. These dates give the publishers' representatives time to introduce new textbooks to the professors and allows the bookstores time to contact vendors to buy as many used textbooks as possible.

The bookstores turn in their book orders to the publishers in June for the fall semester and in November for the spring semester. When teachers turn in book orders late, change their order, or if the books are not available, students have a delay in getting their books at the semester start.

All four bookstores mark up new books 20 percent to 25 percent of wholesale. The increase is to pay for overhead and freight expenses.

The four bookstores do not buy back books the professors will not use again. Vendors buy these books to sell to other schools which will continue to use the book. The prices paid to the students for these books are determined by the vendor in accordance with the amount of books he has in inventory and the demand he or she foresees for the book.

KU, WSU and K-State, charge 75 percent of new book price for used books when selling them to the students. The mark-up varies from book to book at Fort Hays State.

Tandy® 3000 HL

The Low-Cost Alternative to the IBM® PC/XT-286

$1999 Save $349.85

Reg. Separate Items 2348.85

Commercial Lease Available for Only $70 Per Month*

- Tandy 3000 HL with 512K Memory and Built-In 360K Floppy Drive
- CM-5 Color Monitor and Dual Display Graphics Adapter
- MS-DOS/BASIC/DeskMate®

Put a Tandy 3000 HL computer into service before December 31, 1986, and take advantage of the old tax laws. The Tandy 3000 HL beats out the IBM PC/XT-286 in price, performance and options. Operating at 8 MHz (vs. 6 MHz for IBM's 286), the Tandy 3000 HL's advanced 16-bit microprocessor delivers up to seven times the speed of a standard PC's microprocessor. That means you can run software faster than ever. The Tandy 3000 HL is easy to expand with seven full-size expansion slots (four 8-bit XT-compatible and three 16-bit) to meet your business's growing needs. And the Tandy 3000 HL is network compatible with all MS-DOS computers. Get a demonstration today.

MIKE—I'M so proud of you and so happy for you! You've finally reached your goal! Happy Graduation! Love ya—[illegible]

SCOTT V.—I can feel your hand in mine when we're apart. Can you feel mine? Don't be sad! Be mine for Christmas—I love you! S. Sunshine. (75)

DENNIS—HERE'S to Trivial Pursuit and all that other jazz. Merry Christmas. Love ya, Cin. P.S. Watch out for shedding hair. (75)

TRI SIGMA Pledges—Good luck on finals and have a Merry Christmas. Sigma love, The Actives. (75)

SUPERMAN—THE past six months have been awesome (I hate that word but . . .) I love you more each day. Happy Birthday and Merry Christmas. Forever yours faithfully this anniversary, Lois. (75)

COL WAD, Congrats, you finally made it! Maybe? We've had a blast, from Tuttle, K.C., getting excited, summer softball, Bushwackers, Padre drunkeness, skiing, our awesome parties, Spur, to all the fun, weird things we've pulled. There's too much more to mention, but we'll remember. I will miss you so much! Thanks for being yourself. Love, your roomie, Linda. (75)

DENISE P., Congrats on graduating! You've been a fun roomie, good luck in the real world. I'll miss you a lot. Love, Linda. (75)

KD's: THROUGH our years we've had lots of fun, and in our hearts you're number one. We are the two graduates to be, just wanted to give you one last—big AOT! Good luck on finals. Love, Marsha and Jackie. (75)

COLLEEN AND Linda—Here's to midnight munchies, bad cabs and man hunts. Thanks for a memorable semester. Merry Christmas! Your roomie, Denise. (75)

LAMBDA CHI Crescents—See Announcements. (75)

CHERYL—WORDS alone cannot express the feelings I have for you. You have enriched my life and I love you for it. Merry Christmas and here's hoping for more "study breaks" and time with you. Love, Dan. (75)

LILLIAN: CONGRATULATIONS, Happy Birthday, Merry Christmas, Happy New Year's and Good Luck. Love, Susie. (75)

AGD PLEDGES: Good luck on finals and have a great Christmas. Susan G. (75)

AGD TRANSFERS: Good luck wherever you are going. Take care and we'll miss you. AGD sisters. (75)

KIRK—I love you! I love you! I love you! I love you! Merry Christmas! Forever, Pati. (75)

ATO PAUL and Jeff—PeeWee wants to say, it will be a Merry Christmas day, if you eat at Hilltop Cafe, on the world's longest date, drinking Groisch's til late! (to "and she was"), Bartles and Jaymes (the real ones?) say, Happy New Year's Day, with our party hats on, watching movies at dawn, dryer riding without an I.D., after drinking at a room party! But best of all, it will be most fun, roadtripping with D.C., Zits, Boobless and the Tanless One! Love, Lisa B. and Lisa T. (75)

SYLVIA, REMEMBER Miss Piggy award, birthday celebrations, Eisenhower Center and Joe Engle's home, balcony parties, wine and cheese, Smith friends, Smurthie love?, Sylbie Ebert . . . When you think of KSU, forget the stress, or "what might have been"; recall good times, and love that you have found and created here (better Rx for ulcers). I'm going to miss you, but as you face the unknown, know that me and many others are wishing the best for you always, unconditionally. You're very special and I don't know how I'll cope without you as roomie. Love, Karen. P.S. Good luck on finals! (75)

KKG KYLE: "May all of your dreams bloom like daisies in the sun." Have fun with your little ones. I'll miss you! L & L rise dot dot.(75)

PORTHOS—TO a girl who has everything (except maybe time), here's to all the good times, past and future. We hope you have a happy (and relaxing) Christmas. —Athos and Aramis. (75)

AD PI's: Finals are here, but never fear, for the end is near. We've hung the mistletoe and said our Ho-Hos, soon it will be time to go. Happy Holidays. (75)

PATTY, LAURA, and Michele—Although my alarm clock would beep and beep, you never let me oversleep. Thanks for being my roomies! Merry Christmas. Theta Love, Stacy. (75)

PIKE RON—Just wanted you to know I am thinking of you. Over Christmas Break, hope you know, I'll be blue without you. Love ya, Pam. (75)

TO AGD Seniors Kim and Renea: A new day is dawning and you have what it takes to make it bright. Thank you for sharing yourself with AGD. We love you for it. Your, AGD sisters. (75)

KD PLEDGES—Your study hours are done, but finals have just began. Study hard and you will see, how strong our KD love can be! We love you—The Members. (75)

Hey Bayby Wayby,

Congratulations on graduation
You're the sweetest
And the Neatest
I like your 'puter
But you're cuter.
The arch on July 4th
The arch at New Year?
A summer of fun
A year of new cheer.
Lots of Love,
Fred

DKL: YOU and Danny had better look out, the girls at the rec are getting pretty hot! Happy Birthday. I love you! MDS. (75)

ANNIE M.: Good luck out in the "real" world and remember me always! By the way, have you seen my harddrive? Your special friend, Ron. (75)

PIKE LITTLE Sisters—Come join the guys for study break treats Tuesday at 10 p.m. (75)

MARY SOBBA—You're the first one of us to be over the hill. Happy 21st B-day! Celebrate! Eat, drink and beat Mary! Love, your roomies. (75)

PATTY H.: Yea! You made it. I'll never forget our Bessie B. days, philosophical and other talks! Good luck. Love ya, Skelly. (75)

CKC: You did it! Congratulations and love, KMJ. (75)

BRYAN U., Brad S.: Paisleys (Oh, God!), "I hate men," three hour calls, and little blue people! Thanks for putting up with me this semester. Wendy. P.S. Yes, I'm smiling. (75)

DAN SMADING and KD Jody—Your little sister is proud of you! Good luck! Love, Andi. (75)

GREG, CONGRATULATIONS, you made it! I'll miss you . . . save all your weekends for me! Love, Andi. (75)

TERESA M.—Happy Birthday! Good luck on finals. There is light at the end of the tunnel! Love, Michelle. (75)

LANCE C.—Remember the football games, Kite's, early morning visitors, Harry the pumpkin, the Plaza, formals, roses and mismatched socks? It's been better than great! Love, Michelle. P.S. You'd better love to write letters! (75)

GEORGE AND Sue—Thistlehair, the Christmas Bear, has been kidnapped. Call us for ransom requirements. (75)

JULIA—IT was great for 2.5 years, but it's almost over now. Congratulations on your graduation. You've been a great help and the best sister there is (but don't tell the other four). Thanks for always being there for me. Let's celebrate and have a great weekend! —Love, your "Little" Sister. P.S. Eddie will never be able to take your place. (75)

Wefald refuses Housing's appeal, returns student to residence hall

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

University President Jon Wefald has denied the Department of Housing's appeal of a Student Tribunal decision allowing John Torres to remain in the residence hall system, the president said Thursday night.

However, Torres, a freshman in commercial art, is now thinking about moving out of the residence hall system anyway.

"I have been thinking about moving out — just because I am tired of the hassle," he said.

Problems began for Torres Nov. 6 when he was dismissed from Marlatt Hall by the Marlatt Hall Judicial Board for violating several University Honor Codes and hall liquor regulations.

Torres appealed the decision to the Tribunal, a higher judicial board, which overturned the ruling made by the hall judicial board.

The Tribunal overturned the judicial board's decision because it opposed the harsh sanctions taken against Torres, according to Brian Wheeler, chancellor of the Tribunal and senior in animal sciences and industry.

The housing department then appealed the Tribunal's decision to Wefald.

"We are agreeing with the Student Tribunal," Wefald said Thursday.

The Student Governing Association bylaws clearly allow a defendant the right to appeal a decision made by the Tribunal, said Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney.

"The problem is if you look at the procedures (in the constitution), they are ambiguous," she said.

Thompson said there is no place in the constitution that actually states the plaintiff or anyone else — except the defendant — has the right to appeal a Tribunal decision.

"I think the President thought it best to leave it in the hands of the judiciary board," she said.

Thomas Frith, director of the housing department, said he does not agree with Thompson's interpretation of the Student Governing Association's constitution.

"We have a different interpretation (of the laws)," he said.

He said a passage in the constitution states that a final appeal can be directed to the president, but it doesn't actually say if the plaintiff has the right to appeal.

"I think that when they were written, no one considered the likelihood," Thompson said, referring to the appeal by the housing department.

"I don't know of any instances where this has happened," she said.

Torres said he was not surprised that Wefald denied the housing department's appeal.

"The lawyer told me that's probably what (Wefald) would do," he said.

Meanwhile, Torres said he will talk to the housing department to discuss the possibility of being released from his hall contract.

Projects

feel terrible," Lapping said. "We know there are burglaries and pieces of art are taken. But it's just rotten luck. There is a different policy in each department."

Because of the diversity of policies on campus on the subject of who owns students' projects and graduate research, a committee has been established by John Noonan, associate dean of the graduate school, to try and define the issues of ownership.

"When you are talking about tradition and not policy, usually what is articulated is just an individual's thinking at one moment, which is pretty ambiguous," Noonan said.

The committee is being formed to anticipate questions that may arise over the ownership of graduate research, especially if the government or a private industry provided some or all of the funds, Noonan said.

The head of the committee, Richard Gallagher, professor of electrical and computer engineering, said there are nine or 10 representatives from the University who have been chosen to look at these questions. They will try to establish if there is a problem, who owns the research data and who will maintain and update the data for future use and continuation of the research.

"We will try to make an umbrella statement to fit the various colleges both at undergraduate and graduate levels," Gallagher said. "The proposed policy statement would then appear in the graduate and faculty handbooks and possibly the University catalog."

Until there is a University policy, questions of liability and ownership will arise. In the case of the interior design projects being taken, the students asked the department for material compensation to redo the portfolio project. Their requests were denied because the department does not carry insurance on student projects, Peterson said.

"We felt like it was nobody's fault," Forslund said. "But when the department took our project, we feel like they were liable."

"It's an honor to have your work displayed," Tuttle said. "But not enough to risk the projects being taken."

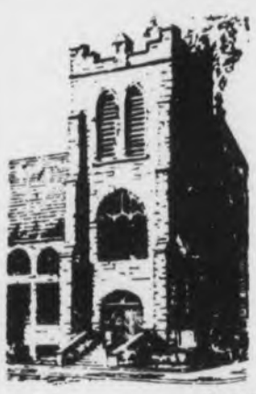
ing of student debt last spring.



The money will also pay for making bathrooms in Anderson Hall handicap-accessible, installing an outside access ramp and building a restroom to replace the one removed for the elevator, Garvin said.

He said the restroom should be completed by the spring semester.

Before the elevator can be installed, the limestone foundation must be replaced by concrete to support the structure. The foundation has impeded construction progress, but the elevator and other handicap facilities should be completed by April.

WE'RE PAYING CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS NOW!
SELL YOUR BOOKS AT VARNEY'S
(regardless of where you bought them)
AND GET YOUR YELLOW TOKEN
10% off any Non Textbook Items at Varney's BOOK STORE IN AGGIEVILLE

★Get your yellow token, which is good for 10% off any non-textbook items, when you sell your books during dead week or final week. You decide what the token is worth by the amount you purchase. THE MORE YOU BUY THE MORE YOU SAVE! You can use the token whenever you want. Use it for Christmas purchases or use it next semester.

★Bring all your books to Varney's (regardless of where you bought them) and our buyers will value them individually. You choose what you want to sell! WE BUY BOOKS EVERY DAY! However, you can usually get the most for your books by selling them to us at the end of the semester.

★The price we pay for books is determined mainly by two factors—if the books will be used again at K-State and if we need the books for our stock. If we cannot buy your books for our stock, we will offer you the best price we can, based on the national market.

★Remember, it's what you get for all your books that counts, and we think that the wholesaler we buy for pays the highest prices.

★We know you're busy and in a hurry so we have four buyers to take care of you. We try to keep the time you spend in line to a minimum. We also buy until 9 at night during dead week and until 10 at night during final week.

On Our Cover

In a season strong with tradition, both cultural and personal, the Manhattan Civic Theatre is spreading the rich traditions contained in the musical "Fiddler on the Roof." A brief look at the lives of Tevye the dairyman and his family yeilds the sharing of popular songs "Matchmaker," "Sunrise, Sunset," and "Tradition," among others. Performances are at 8 tonight and Saturday, with a matinee Saturday at 2. See Page 4.

Mini-series could spawn Yuppie soap

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — We have daytime soaps and nighttime soaps and satire soaps. "A Year in the Life" could be described as the first Yuppie soap.

The potential fall '87 series is being introduced in miniseries format, in three 2-hour installments beginning Monday on NBC.

"A Year in the Life" follows from one Christmas to the next the Gardners of suburban Seattle, an overprivileged, Madison-Avenue version of the Average American Family.

The series was developed by Joshua Brand and John Falsey, creators of "St. Elsewhere." Like that award-winning series, "A Year in the Life" is blessed by intelligent and sophisticated, if not original, writing.

What it lacks is the natural drama of a hospital or cop show, relying instead on the appeal of the characters, the way "Family," the ABC series of the late 1970s, did.

"A Year in the Life" offers a virtual film festival of borrowed cinematic bits as well as plenty of images seemingly derived from popular television commercials.

When the Gardners play football in the backyard, you expect them to pause and admire the shiny, new American car parked in the driveway. When a son pulls up in front of his girlfriend's upscale, suburban house in a luxury sedan, the camera might as well cut to a shot of her expensive cologne.

There's music from "The Big Chill," a graduation party straight out of "The Graduate," and imaginings of glory from "The Natural" and "Breaking Away."

In keeping with the slickness, most of the cast members look like they were just sent over by a modeling agency, though their performances are first rate.

Richard Kiley plays Joe, the patriarch of the clan. Eva Marie Saint plays his wife.

Morgan Stevens, looking like a young Robert Redford, is eldest son Jack, a ne'er-do-well who returns after two years of bumming around Mexico to borrow some money, but ends up working for his father. A high school baseball star, he still dreams of making it in the big leagues.

'Fiddler on the Roof'

Scared by Tevye's concocted nightmare about her dead grandmother, Golde cowers under her covers.

Tradition seems to be in the air at this time of year, but for the Manhattan Civic Theatre it is not Christmas tradition, but instead the familiar song "Tradition" from the musical "Fiddler on the Roof."

The production opened on Dec. 5 and 6, and continues this week, with performances at 8 p.m. tonight and Saturday. A matinee performance at 2 Saturday has also been scheduled. All performances are City Auditorium, 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue.

"Fiddler on the Roof" is a book by Joseph Stein based on stories by Sholem Aleichem. The musical version contains music by Jerry Bock. The story is set in the early 1900s in the village of Anatevka, Russia, and centers around life in the village, a Jewish peasant community, and the traditions of its people.

Although a fiddler on a roof appears at both the beginning and the end of the show, most of the action of the play develops around the family of Tevye, a dairyman, his wife, Golde, and their five daughters, Tzeitel, Hodel, Chava, Shprintze and Bielke.

The story deals with many Jewish traditions, one being that of a matchmaker arranging marriages. Yente, the village matchmaker, arranges a wedding between Tevye's oldest daughter, Tzeitel, and the well-to-do local butcher, Lazar Wolf, a man old enough to be her father. Tzeitel begs Teyve not to force her to go through with the wedding because she is in love with Motel, the village tailor, whom she has known since childhood and is closer to her age.

Teyve gives in to Tzeitel's request, although this goes against tradition. He worries about how to tell his wife that he has told Tzeitel she can marry the man she loves, rather than the man the matchmaker suggests, so he pretends to have a dream in which Golde's grandmother appears and blesses the marriage of Tzeitel and Motel.

Their second daughter, Hodel, also defies tradition by telling Teyve she plans to marry Perchik, a young radical from Kiev. She asks for his blessing rather than his permission. Hodel must leave Anatevka to be with Perchik in Siberia.

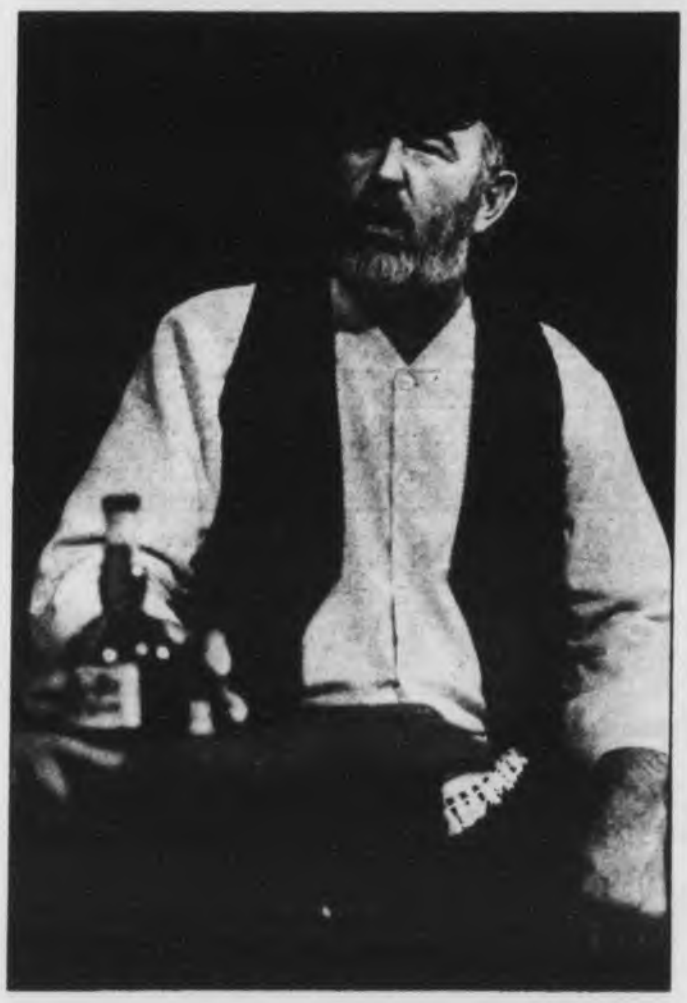
Although Teyve and Golde had different plans originally for Tzeitel and Hodel, they came to accept Motel as their son-in-law, and hoped that Hodel would be happily married to Perchik when she joined him in Siberia.

Chava, the third daughter, goes beyond what Tzetel and Hodel did in defying tradition. She marries outside the faith to a Russian gentile, Fyedka. After she does this, Teyve cuts her off from the family as though she were dead, in keeping with tradition.

Throughout the story, there are indications that the Jewish people will be forced to leave Anatevka. This also has been happening in nearby villages, and finally the orders of the Czar are given for all Jews to evacuate their homes in Anatevka.

As the family prepares to leave, Chava returns to tell them goodbye. At first, Teyve turns away from his daughter and refuses to speak to her, but when Tzeitel bids Chava farewell, Teyve says, "God be with you," showing that in his heart, he does not see Chava as being dead.

Finally, Teyve, Golde and their two youngest daughters leave Anatevka for America, hoping that Tzeitel and Motel and their child will be able to join them eventually.



Songs from the production include both songs about Jewish traditions, "Matchmaker," "Sabbath Prayer," and "L'Chaim," in addition to the love songs, "Miracle of Miracles" and "Now I Have Everything."

Several K-State students appear in the production: Jennifer Whisker, freshman in secondary education as Tzeitel; Kimberly Stratton, freshman in music as Hodel; Nicholas Michael Jaksa, sophomore in engineering as Fyedka; Sheila Hervey, freshman in secondary education as Mirala; and Patrick Turnquist, freshman in medical technology as the constable.

Film Review

Eastwood film lacks energy, human touch

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Clint Eastwood's newest film, "Heartbreak Ridge," is the kind of movie that directors John Ford and Howard Hawks once specialized in — stories of men learning to work together for a common cause (and learning to respect one another in the process).

This time the story is about a platoon of young marines, loudmouthed and arrogant, who desperately need a sergeant tough enough to put up with their insubordination. That sergeant will be Gunney Sgt. John Highway (Clint Eastwood), a battle-scarred warhorse. His face is like a weather-beaten crag of rock and his voice is a gravelly growl. He spits out four-letter words as if each curse were sacred.

The Major (Everett McGill) says he should be put under glass with a sign that reads "Break in case of war." But he's just the right man to turn this platoon of ragged young men into fighters.

And they will need to fight — in the U.S. invasion of Grenada. It's in these scenes that the film works the best. Instead of taking the "Rambo" philosophy — that war can be fun — the marines are shocked when they see the victims of their bullets and grenades. Their faces turn green and, at one point, a marine asks God for forgiveness. This makes the battle scenes seem strange, almost as much of an anachronism as Gunney Highway.

In these scenes, cinematographer Jack Green utilizes a handheld camera, running along the dirt roads with the marines. This gives the film a documentary-like realism.

Unfortunately, the Grenada invasion comes very late in the film. And when it does happen, it seems rushed. The bulk of the movie is devoted to the training of the marines, but these men must be one of the dullest platoons on record. The only character who stands out is a rock 'n' roller (Mario Van Peebles), but he's just a caricature.

Gunney himself is an interesting character, but the movie never gives us a clear picture of the dilemma he faces. He would like to get back together with his ex-wife (Marsha Mason), so he reads women's magazines to learn how women think. In a funny scene, he starts spouting the women's magazine rhetoric to his ex, asking her what happened to their "relationship." But scenes like this one are too few and far between.

The training scenes themselves are much too familiar. We've seen them in countless movies before (most recently in "An Officer and a Gentleman"). "Heartbreak Ridge" just recycles these scenes.

It's not as if this material didn't have any potential. But unlike the films of Hawks or Ford, the marines never become anything but pawns for Gunney Highway to push around. If the screenplay had supplied these characters backgrounds, they might have become more interesting. But as is, it's difficult to care what happens to them.

University agencies face charges on income

By CHRIS STEWART
Staff Writer

Directors of seven University auxiliary accounts and local agencies are officially being informed today of a 3-percent charge on income from sales and services, which may lead to higher costs for various student services.

The directors will find a letter from President Jon Wefald on their desks informing them of the newly imposed institutional support fee, said John Moore, assistant vice president for administration and finance.

The support fee, designed to alleviate the central administration's shrinking reserves, academic computing and equipment funds, should net between $300,000 and $350,000 for the administration this fiscal year, Moore said.

Each agency's fee is being determined from the sales and service income from the last fiscal year.

"It will be a fee to help pay for some of the costs of utilities, police protection and accounting — those things which are central to the University," said William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services.

Moore supplied a list of the seven accounts and agencies with their approximate institutional support fee payment to the University for the current fiscal year:

— Health Services — $13,500

— Department of Housing — $100,000

— Department of Intercollegiate Athletics — $70,000

— Kansas Artificial Breeding Service Unit — $25,000

— K-State Union — $100,000

— Parking Restricted Fee Account — $15,000

— Student Publications Inc. — $20,000

One-half of the total fee will be billed to the agencies this month, followed by monthly payments throughout the remainder of the fiscal year, said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

In December, the administration proposed the fee be levied on about 70 departments and agencies. The original idea met with disapproval during a Council of Academic Deans meeting, said William Stamey, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Stamey said when the administration realized the council's criticisms against imposing the fee on the departments were valid, they scrapped the original proposal.

Since that meeting, the Administrative Council narrowed those assessed the fee to seven, and approved the measure during a meeting Tuesday, Moore said.

Directors of the agencies differ in their views of the support fee, and some say the cost would ultimately be passed to the students, but probably not immediately.

"I'm not very supportive of (the fee). It will add up as another increase for students," said Walt Smith, director of the K-State Union.

"After we take a serious look, we may have to increase prices. Right now we don't anticipate any changes," he said.

Administrative overhead charges are not an uncommon practice around the Big Eight and K-State's peer institutions, say University officials.

"Every public institution that I know of has a similar charge. I think we have been very fortunate not to have to pay it up until this point. It was something that was going to happen sooner or later," said Thomas Frith, director of the Department of Housing.

Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene Student Health Center, said money generated from sales and services of Lafene should be put to its intended use of bettering the service to students using Lafene.

"I think this is taxation without representation," Tout said. "The students should be more aware of where their dollars are going, and at least consulted when there is a change.

"What (the administration) attempted to do when they found out the state of Kansas was going to have a financial crunch, and there was going to be a 3.8 percent budget cut, they started looking around to those

After 18 years as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, William Stamey will retire on July 1. Stamey, who joined K-State in 1953 as an assistant professor of mathematics, said he believes the quality of the faculty has improved, helping to account for an increase in the prestige of the college's programs during his tenure.

Dean of arts and sciences college to retire post July 1

By DERON JOHNSON
Collegian Reporter

After 18 years at the helm of the University's largest college, William L. Stamey announced Jan. 6 that he will retire as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. His retirement will be effective July 1.

Stamey, 64, said although he will have no direct input in the selection of his successor, he plans to visit with the finalists.

"The candidates no doubt will visit with me," he said. "I will tell them what a good place Kansas State University is and what a great job this is."

Provost Owen Koeppe said the process to name Stamey's replacement will begin Thursday when Koeppe meets with faculty members from the college to get their input on the formation of a search committee.

"We hope to have a search committee named by the early to middle part of next week," Koeppe said. The goal of the committee will be to have a list of candidates ready for interviewing by the end of the semester and to have Stamey's successor announced by the end of June.

Although he isn't sure of the composition of the search committee, Koeppe said the plan is to have two students serve on it.

"Normally, (in past committees) I have asked a faculty member to chair it," he said.

The University will advertise in the Chronicle of Higher Education and seek the advice of deans of arts and sciences throughout the nation in searching for candidates, Koeppe said.

The successor will have "a combination of solid academic experience and administrative experience," he said.

Reagan elects K-State alum as press aide

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

K-State alumnus Marlin Fitzwater was appointed Monday to replace Larry Speakes as chief spokesman for President Ronald Reagan.

Fitzwater, a 1965 journalism graduate, will leave his position Feb. 2 as press secretary for Vice President George Bush to become assistant to the president for press relations. James Brady, who was shot during an assassination attempt on Reagan in 1981, will maintain the title of press secretary to the president.

Fitzwater's job as press secretary for the vice president entails attending meetings with the vice president and keeping the press informed on the issues.

He said there is a lot of similarity between his job as press secretary for the vice president and his new position. The difference between the two jobs is in Fitzwater's contact with the press. As Reagan's spokesman, he will work in "more of an open press conference format."

"The main difference is that I will have two press conferences a day," he said.

Fitzwater said he tries to make his presentations to the press as comprehensive as possible.

"A press sercretary has to believe in what he's doing," he said in an article appearing in the January 1987 edition of Update, a K-State journalism alumni magazine. "You have to believe that the government is there to serve the people, and that the people have the right to know what the government is doing.

"I respect reporters, I believe in the government, and I think I'm an important link between the two," he said.

Although many have lost faith in Reagan through the Iran-Contra scandal, Fitzwater's trust has not been shaken.

"I believe very strongly in the president," he said.

He said he also believes in the strength of K-State. Fitzwater said he obtained an excellent education from K-State, although he wishes he would have had more time to concentrate on liberal arts classes.

He emphasized practical experience in his five years of college, paying for his education by juggling as many as four jobs at a time.

During his sophomore year, Fitzwater served as business manager for Collegian advertising, staff writer for the Collegian, advertising representative for the Manhattan Mercury and campus correspondent for the Topeka Capital-Journal.

In his remaining three years at K-State, Fitzwater left the Collegian and maintained his positions at the Topeka Capital-Journal and the Manhattan Mercury.

Upon graduation, Fitzwater moved to Washington, D.C., where he applied for work at the Washington Star and the Washington Post.

"They both told me to go back to Kansas and get some more experience," he said in the Update article.

Ignoring their advice, Fitzwater began a trail of government jobs that eventually led him to his current position.

He started his climb as a technical writer at The Appalachian Regional Commission, an agency set up to combat poverty in the Appalachian Mountain region.

In 1980, after working in the Department of Transportation and the Environmental Protection Agency, Fitzwater took his first

Police find few clues in stabbing of cab driver

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Two assailants remain at large as the victim of a brutal stabbing underwent emergency surgery Tuesday morning at Irwin Army Community Hospital at Fort Riley.

Chuck Primm, 42, 920 Fremont St., underwent a second surgery because of "additional complications" resulting from the incident, said Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish.

Primm, a driver for Bell Taxi Transportation, Manhattan, was stabbed more than 25 times around 9 p.m. Jan. 4 on Whiskey Lake Road, about a mile north of the Interstate 70-Kansas Highway 18 exit, Deppish said. The incident occurred in Primm's cab.

Between 8 and 9 p.m., Primm picked up two white males in the Hardee's parking lot in Aggieville, Deppish said.

"It's not helping us at all," Deppish said of Primm's condition. "We cannot talk with him, he can't help us with the investigation — in fact, he's going downhill."

Hospital officials refused to release any information except to confirm that Primm was in the Intensive Care Unit.

Although investigators have not been able to speak with Primm, they did visit him last Friday, Deppish said.

"He was so heavily sedated that he wasn't really able to help us," he said.

The Geary County Sheriff's Department continues to search for new leads in the case.

Investigators are following up on some leads that "appear possibly to be helpful," Deppish said.

No descriptions have been released yet, he said, adding that he was "not sure" if the suspects were local men.

The department is operating on the assumption that the motive for the stabbing was theft.

"He had two billfolds," Deppish said. "One had money in it (when he was found), and one did not."

The amount of money stolen has not been determined, Deppish said. "We do not think it was a large amount of money," he said. "Cab drivers are not known to carry a substantial amount of money."

He estimated the amount to be less than $300.

Though Primm is a civilian, he was taken by ambulance to Irwin Army Community Hospital because it was the nearest facility, Deppish said.

"We always decide, in a case that bad, to take them to the nearest hospital."

Deppish said Primm was a lucky man.

"For all practical reasons, this man should

Officials arrest hotel fire suspect

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Federal officials Tuesday arrested a maintenance worker at the Dupont Plaza Hotel and charged him with setting the New Year's Eve fire that killed 96 people at the posh hotel.

Court documents filed at U.S. District Court in Old San Juan identified the arrested man as Hector Escudero Aponte. It was the first arrest in the case.

Escudero Aponte, a hotel employee and Teamsters union member, used a Sterno-like fuel to torch new furniture stacked in the hotel's ground-floor ballroom, according to a complaint filed by the FBI in U.S. District Court.

The 5-page complaint said the suspect went to the hotel at about 2 p.m. and set the fire shortly after a union meeting broke up. The fire, which injured about 140 people, raged out of control through the ballroom and then the casino directly above.

Ethiopian radio reports plane crash

LONDON — An Ethiopian air force plane carrying 54 passengers and crew crashed in the Eritrean provincial capital of Asmara on Tuesday and killed everyone on board, the official radio reported.

According to the report on the official Ethiopian Radio, monitored in London by the British Broadcasting Corp., the crash was due to a mechanical failure.

The plane, carrying air force personnel, was en route to the capital of Addis Ababa when the plane suddenly went out of control, the radio said.

"It crashed while it was trying to land after developing sudden problems about three minutes after taking off from Yohannes the Fourth Airport (in Asmara)," the broadcast said.

Ethiopian Radio gave no further details of the crash, BBC said. It did not specify the kind of airplane.

An official at the Addis Ababa control tower said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press in Nairobi, Kenya, that he knew of the crash only through the radio report and had no additional details. The official refused to give his name.

Eritrean rebels have been waging a guerrilla war for independence against the country's Marxist government and its predecessor for about 25 years. Eritrea is the East African country's northernmost province.

Gunmen kidnap French reporter

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Gunmen on Tuesday kidnapped a French reporter covering Terry Waite's mission to free American and other foreign hostages held in Lebanon. They pistol-whipped and shot at another French newsman who escaped.

Police said eight men in two cars grabbed Roger Auque, 31, soon after he photographed Anglican Church envoy Waite taking a morning stroll along the seafront in Moslem west Beirut. Auque is a freelance reporter-photographer for French, Canadian and Belgian radio stations and photo feature agencies.

Paul Marchand, a French reporter accompanying Auque, fought off the men in west Beirut's Raouche residential district at 9:40 a.m. and escaped, police said.

Waite, the personal emissary of Archbishop Robert Runcie of Canterbury, told reporters after hearing of the abduction: "I'm very sorry to hear it."

Marchand told France's Radio Monte Carlo, his employer, that the assailants shot at him as he fled. He said he will stay in west Beirut.

"I can't leave now. Roger is my friend," a shaken Marchand told the CBS television network in an interview.

Small rockets key to shuttle escape

SPACE CENTER, Houston — NASA engineers have concluded that the only practical way for astronauts to escape from the space shuttle in an emergency would be to use small rockets that would yank them out a side hatch and let them parachute to Earth.

The method would work only under certain circumstances, and would not have helped the crew of Challenger. But it would give astronauts in the future "a chance where there is none now," a NASA official said, and the astronauts corps has endorsed the concept.

It has been presented to shuttle chief Richard Truly, but NASA leaders have not given their approval. A decision is expected by March.

Bill Chandler, the Johnson Space Center engineer who directed the escape study, said it could be installed for the resumption of shuttle flights, now set for February 1988. The estimated cost: about $50 million.

NASA's plans for an astronaut escape have always called for them to ditch the shuttle in the ocean. Experts now believe ditching would provide little chance for the crew to survive, Chandler said.

Chandler said a parachute system is practical only when the shuttle is in controlled, gliding flight below 20,000 feet. The rest of the time, he said, the craft is traveling too fast or too high.

Challenger's seven crew members died when the spacecraft broke into pieces while two solid rockets engines and the shuttle's three main engines were firing.

Stock show boasts high-class trade

DENVER — The National Western Stock Show has changed since the days when a cowboy who had come west in a boxcar could spit out his tobacco and get a tooth pulled by a dentist promising painless extractions.

Such colorful exhibitors have vanished, and the National Western has evolved into a sophisticated cattle industry trade show. Now marking its 81st year, it is billed as the world's largest, most prestigious convention for cattlemen and cowboys.

But it's still entertaining for those in the business, and for the urbanites who don "drugstore cowboy" outfits of fancy boots, oversized silver belt buckles and hats to relive a bit of the Old West during the show's 12-day run.

This year, ranchers from Argentina, attend the show, which begins Wednesday.

Some will sell cattle from 20 breeds, or choose from an estimated 25,000 head offered at a video auction.

Education board selects chairman

TOPEKA — The State Board of Education on Tuesday elected Bill Musick, a Minneapolis Republican, as its new chairman.

For the last two years, Musick served as vice chairman of the board, and he will serve a two-year term as chairman. The board oversees elementary and secondary education, as well as the state's 19 community colleges.

Musick was first elected to the board in 1984. A retired school administrator, Musick was superintendent of schools in Minneapolis for 23 years.

He has been director of the Kansas State High School Activities Association and the Kansas Association of School Administrators. He replaces Robert Clemons, an Independence Republican.

Kansas' inaugural festivities feature student performances

By SUE DAWSON
Managing Editor
and TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

Two groups from the Department of Music performed at Gov. Mike Hayden's inauguration Monday at the Kansas Capitol in Topeka. The K-State Orchestra and Men's Glee Club were the only groups from the Regents' schools to perform.

Before the inaugural ceremony, the Men's Glee Club, directed by Gerald Polich, associate professor of music, sang in the rotunda of the Capitol for about 20 minutes.

On the steps of the Capitol, the group performed the national anthem.

"It was a fun experience and quite an honor to be a part of such a nice ceremony," said Eric Featherston, junior in animal sciences and industry and Glee Club member.

The Republican Party did an outstanding job organizing the ceremonies, said Garth Gardiner, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and member of the Glee Club.

The crowd of about 3,000 gathered on the south side of the Capitol and enjoyed the unusually warm temperatures.

Honored guests at the ceremony included former Gov. Robert Bennett and Sens. Robert Dole and Nancy Kassebaum.

After taking the oath of office, administered by the newly sworn-in Kansas Supreme Court Justice David Prager, Hayden kissed his wife, Patti, and daughter, Anne, and gave eldest daughter, Chelsi, a hug.

Hayden thanked former Gov. John Carlin for his "extraordinary support" during his transition into office and offered words of remembrance to McDill "Huck" Boyd, Hayden's long-time political adviser and friend, who died Friday in Wichita.

Although Kansas faces difficult times in the coming years, the new governor said, Kansans have "not only endured but triumphed" during much harder times.

"We will not surrender to our present situation, nor should we underestimate it."

People are the ones who make Kansas strong, Hayden said, and his own strength began with the spirit of his grandmother, a pioneer, and his grandfather, who fought in France, and was reinforced by his own parents.

After his address, the new governor took command of the Kansas Army and Air Force National Guard and the Kansas Highway Patrol and reviewed the troops. Hayden was also given a 19-gun salute, which is customary for a governor.

Sworn in before Hayden were associate justices Donald Allegrucci and Harold Herd; court of appeals judges Bob Abbot and Mary Brisco; state board of education members Mildred McMillon, Paul Adams, Sheila Frahm, Richard Robl and Bob Clemons; Insurance Commissioner Fletcher Bell; State Treasurer Joan Finney; Attorney General Bob Stephan; Secretary of State Bill Graves; and Lt. Gov. Jack Walker.

After the ceremonies, the public was able to tour the Capitol and enjoy a buffet inside.

Official guests ate at banquets in Topeka and proceeded to the Municipal Auditorium for the Grand March and Ball.

While guests were arriving before the program, the K-State Orchestra played a series of dance tunes by various composers including Strauss, Ellington and Manilow. Directed by Adrian Bryttan, associate professor of music, "The Blue Danube Waltz" was done in "Strauss-style" with the conductor directing while playing violin. The orchestra was asked to continue playing when they were finished, and they obliged the crowd with another 20 minutes of music.

Al expenses for both groups were paid by the Inauguration Committee, which operates largely through donations.

It is traditional for the committee to recruit entertainment from the Regents' schools, said Robert Steinbauer, head of the music department.

Gov. Mike Hayden affirms the oath of office to become Kansas' 41st governor during ceremonies Monday at the Capitol in Topeka as his wife, Patti, and daughters, Chelsi, 10, left, and Anne, 5, hold the family Bible.

Official predicts stalled arms talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A senior State Department official, underscoring President Reagan's charges of Soviet backtracking in arms control negotiations, said Tuesday that Soviet demands for a new nuclear test ban treaty have become an obstacle in talks on major cuts in strategic weapons.

Rozanne L. Ridgway, assistant secretary of state for European and Canadian Affairs, said the test ban issue is among proposals altered by the Soviets since they were first dicussed during the Reykjavik summit between Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

The test ban issue is critical, not only because U.S.-Soviet arms control talks reopen Thursday in Geneva, but also because the United States has scheduled two nuclear tests in February and the Soviets have threatened to end their testing moratorium after the first U.S. blast this year.

Government sources disclosed earlier this week that two tests are scheduled for Feb. 5 and Feb. 12, and that six tests are set for the next three months.

"When we got to Geneva and we tabled our proposition, we already knew one Soviet position — which we considered wrong — which is to tie everything up together, to say you can't have progress on this until you have progress on that," Ridgway said, when asked to define Reagan's charge of Soviet slippage.

The former ambassador to East Germany said the Soviets also argued that they "cannot proceed with discussion of the 50 percent reduction on strategic weapons until you have a nuclear test ban treaty."

"That was moved from being all by itself on an agenda, to being placed in front of another issue and made a condition," said Ridgway.

Meanwhile, in Moscow, the Kremlin named one of its top Foreign Ministry people to head the Soviet team at Geneva this week in hopes of making this round of talks on nuclear and space arms a "turning point," a Soviet official said Tuesday.

At a news conference on arms control, officials also confirmed that Moscow would agree to allow "basic research" on space weapons in orbit but said it stands firm on refusing to agree to testing "Star Wars" devices in space.

Deputy Foreign Minister Vladimir Petrovsky confirmed Washington reports that Yuli Vorontsov, a first deputy foreign minister and top East-West expert, had been named the Soviets' chief negotiator at Geneva.

On Monday, the United States announced that Max Kampelman, head of the U.S. Geneva delegation, was promoted to State Department counselor to match the Soviet move. Kampelman's appointment requires Senate confirmation.

Editorial page undergoes some changes

DERON JOHNSON
Editorial Page Editor

For those on the outside looking in, the operation of a newspaper is often shrouded in mystery. Names are perceived without faces, and policies and procedures exist without any semblance of reason or order. And so it probably is to some readers of the Collegian.

While this column will not answer every question about the Collegian, it will help clarify the policies and operation of this page. Before I proceed, I should tell you something about myself.

This is my second semester on the Collegian, and last semester I was the features editor. Yes, I realize the change from features editor to editorial page editor is like transferring from K-State to the University of Kansas — well, maybe not that drastic — but I look forward to the position with great enthusiasm and anticipation.

As editorial page editor, I will probably have more contact with our readership via letters to the editor and guest columns than any other staff member. It is for that reason I realize this position goes beyond just one of management. It also involves some public relations jockeying as well.

With that brief introduction out of the way, I will explain the policies and rules of operation by which this page will run this semester. First, I want to emphasize the importance of letters to the editor. They will be given increased priority this semester.

Letters are important for two reasons: They are your primary outlet for expression, and they are our most reliable barometer. Since this page is designed as a forum for the presentation and exchange of ideas, I hope readers utilize the opportunity to tell us what we're doing right and — most importantly — what we're doing wrong.

Furthermore, readers can be certain they will always have the last word on any discussion. As a rule, letters deemed suitable for publication will be published in the order in which they come to our office. Readers who want to make a statement of greater impact may write a guest column.

The single greatest change which will be made to this page is a cosmetic one, as is probably already evident to regular readers. The headline style has been changed to give the page a more distinctive look, and some different design techniques will be utilized as well during the semester.

Our goal was to give the page a rejuvenated identity and bring it more in line with current design trends. It has been several years since the design of the editorial page has been significantly altered, and with the changes already in place, I believe we have succeeded in meeting our goal.

There will probably be other less noticeable changes during the semester, depending on the changing needs of the page's constituents. But any further alterations will be part of a gradual, natural evolution, not an overhaul.

Editorials will continue to appear unsigned, a policy reinstated last semester. Although some people oppose the decision to run the editorials without the author's name, doing so allows the reader to concentrate on the idea being expressed, not who is expressing it. Furthermore, all editorials reflect a collective opinion, not an individual one.

Editorial stances are determined in twice-weekly meetings of the Collegian's editorial board. The majority opinion of the board on the issues discussed determines the Collegian's editorial position. In the past, when the board could not arrive at a majority opinion, issues passed by without being commented on by the newspaper.

However, similar issues this semester may be the basis of pro-con columns by members of the board. These columns would present both sides rather than bypassing the issue altogether.

So, that is an explanation of how this page will run this semester. Anyone with questions or suggestions is encouraged to write, call or just stop by the newsroom. I or any other Collegian staffer will be glad to assist.

On behalf of the entire Collegian staff, I wish everyone an enjoyable and successful semester.

Tough fiscal questions confront Gov. Hayden

Monday's inauguration marked the beginning of Gov. Mike Hayden's term, but it did not mark the beginning of his work on Kansas' state budget.

Shortly after winning the election, Hayden announced to Kansans how seriously affected the state budget has been by the depressed state economy. But his solution — a reduction in state spending — is not unique.

Former Gov. John Carlin also implemented a cut in state spending in July 1984. The cut Hayden has implemented is in addition to that former cut, and the result is a severe reduction in funds for state agencies.

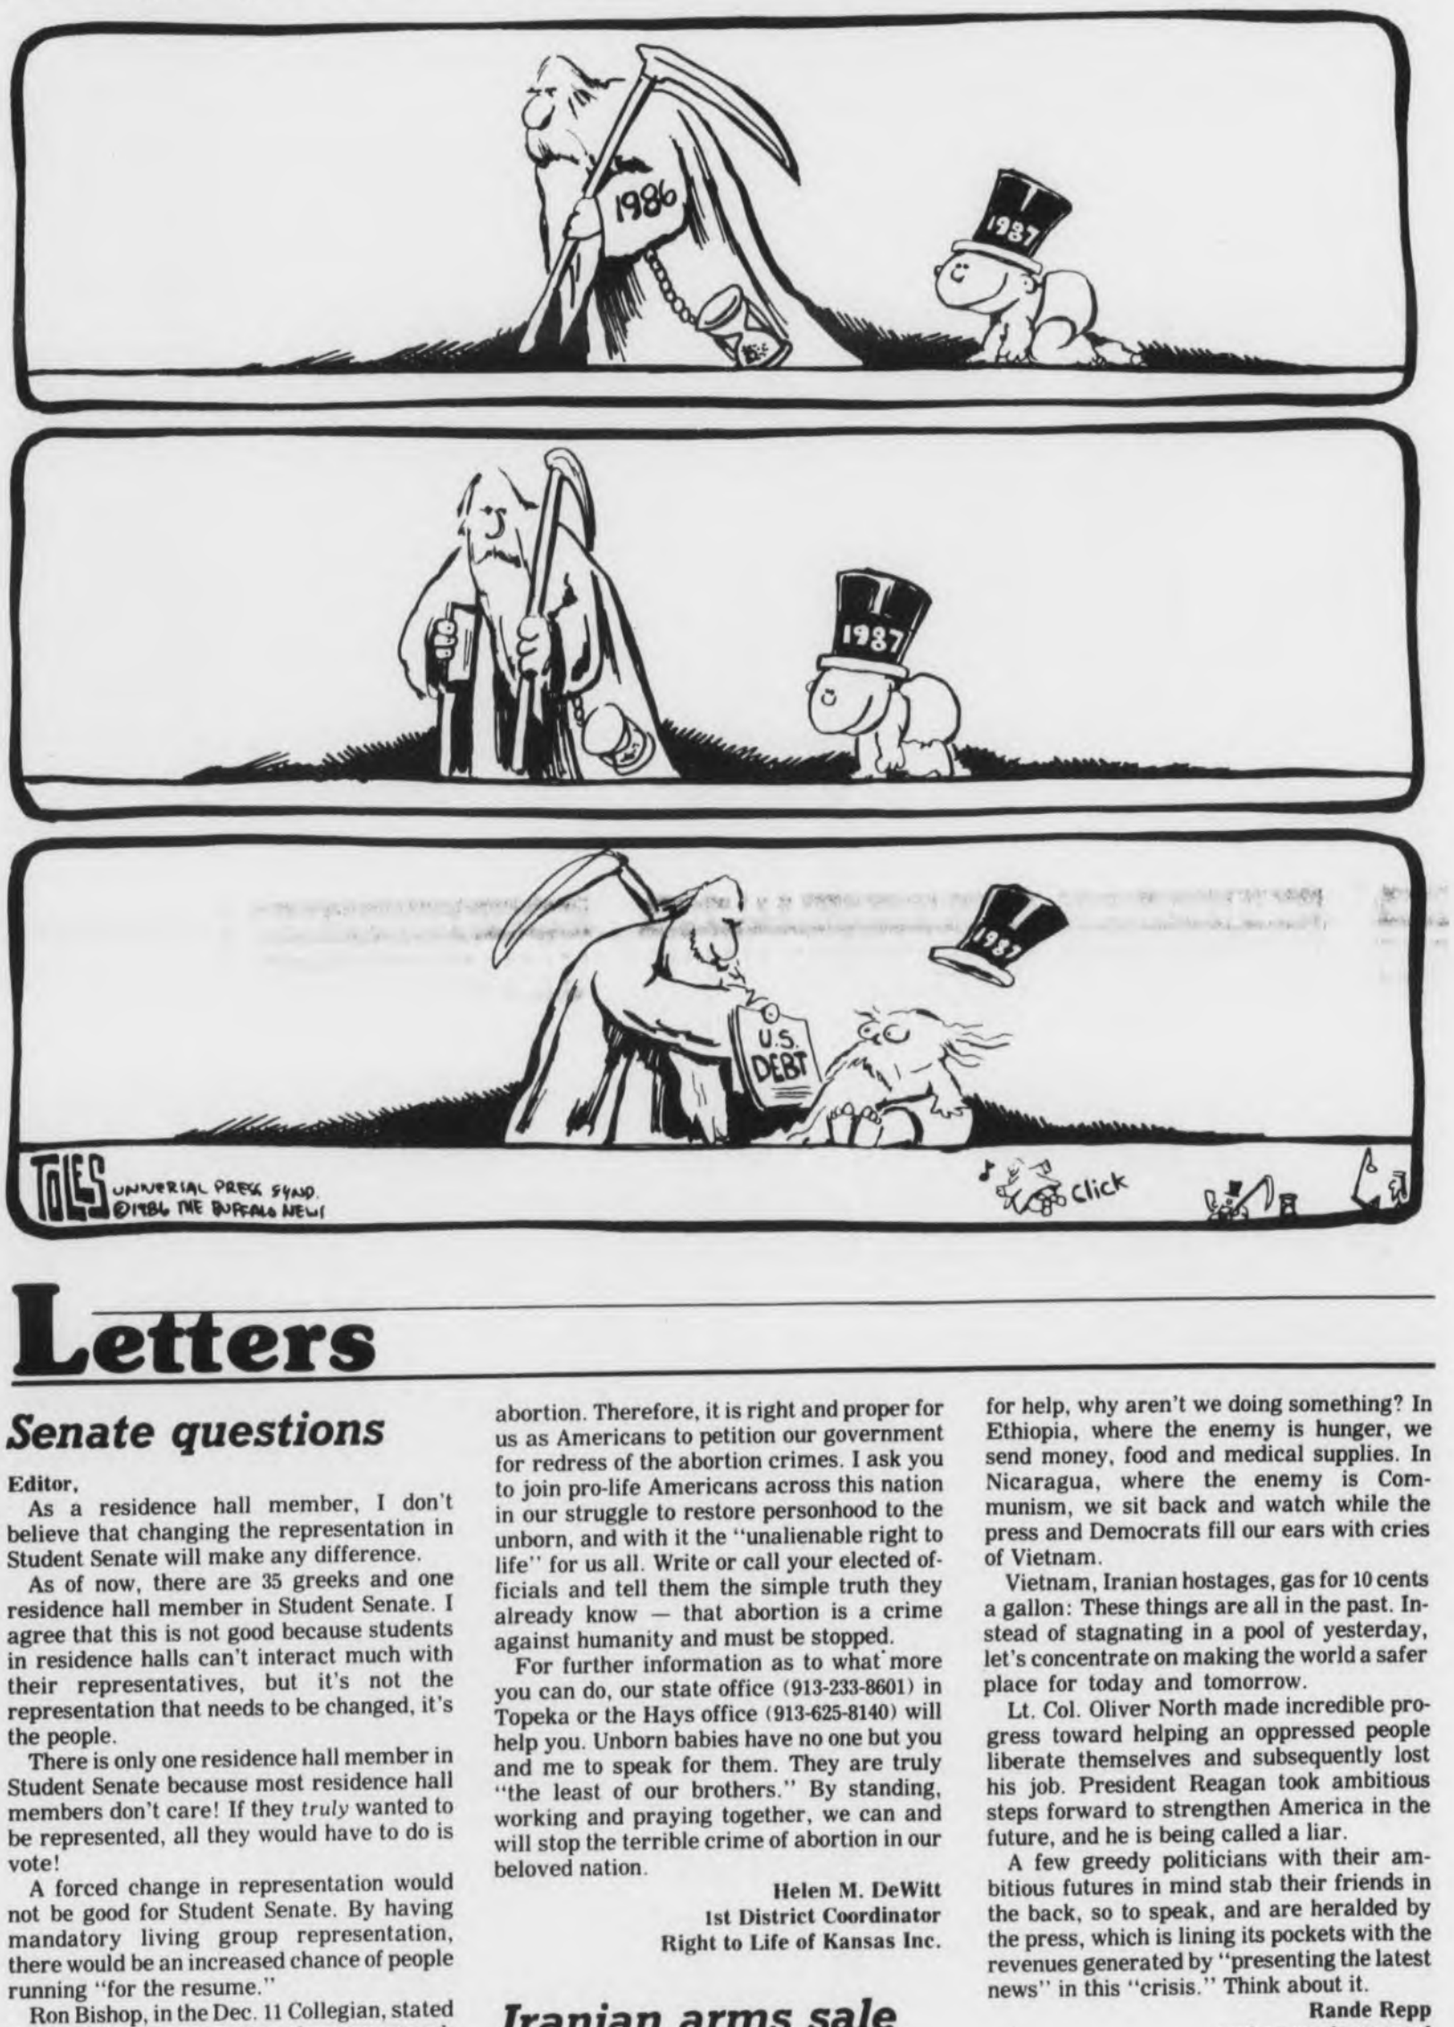
Many Kansans look for creative budget leadership from Hayden, and some expect that his experience in dealing with Kansas' sad economy will enable him to somehow magically turn things around.

While optimism is high about Hayden's active leadership, we should also realize he will probably make some highly unpopular and possibly unprecedented decisions in order to return integrity to the state budget. Kansans should expect creative, problem-solving leadership from Hayden — one of his campaign promises — but the role of Kansans is also defined in terms of action.

We should be prepared to critique Hayden's budget decisions and the effects they will have and take the time to notify our representatives of our opinions. Now is not the time to simply elect a man to office and expect himto lead without input.

This semester to offer fresh start for students

Alas, when students thought they could never live through last semester's finals, along came the winter break, a new year and now a new semester. Upon reflection, those classes didn't seem that difficult, although at the time most students uttered some profane words that didn't exist before they spoke them.



But that's all in the past. This is a new semester, and students should take full advantage of what it has to offer. There's nothing like a schedule of new classes and fresh challenges to encourage a scholarly attitude — in essence, a clean slate.

For some students, a clean slate is precisely what they need. But, lest students totally put last semester out of their minds, they should reflect on what they didn't accomplish and use that knowledge to make this semester work better. After all, mistakes provide the greatest source of learning.

For those precious few students who have no regrets about last semester's performance, they should allow that sense of satisfaction to fuel their quest for success this semester. Also, they should strongly consider passing on their secrets to the rest of the student population.

Fortunately, students are allowed a fresh start at least twice a year. In probably no other facet of life do students find the same opportunity.

The opportunity for academic excellence is presenting itself once again. Students should strive to capture it.

Senate questions

Editor,

As a residence hall member, I don't believe that changing the representation in Student Senate will make any difference.

As of now, there are 35 greeks and one residence hall member in Student Senate. I agree that this is not good because students in residence halls can't interact much with their representatives, but it's not the representation that needs to be changed, it's the people.

There is only one residence hall member in Student Senate because most residence hall members don't care! If they truly wanted to be represented, all they would have to do is vote!

A forced change in representation would not be good for Student Senate. By having mandatory living group representation, there would be an increased chance of people running "for the resume."

Ron Bishop, in the Dec. 11 Collegian, stated that "This matter should not become a greek vs. residence hall vs. independent struggle." It will become a struggle because that's what most "dormies" want — to beat the greeks. Why give them another chance at a repeat performance of the '85-'86 student body presidency?

Abortion tragedy

Editor,

"The word 'person' does not include the unborn." (The U.S. Supreme Court, Jan. 22, 1973, Roe vs. Wade.) Five thousand days and 20 million lives later, abortion on demand has buried a nation of children as big as the whole of Canada.

Abortion — the killing of unborn babies — is an evil; it always has been and always will be. Abortion is a crime against humanity, and yet abortionists want to continue this evil by presuming to operate under legal protection of the Court.

Crimes against humanity cannot be "legalized" by a government or a dictator as history has proven. Thus, the Supreme Court (a branch of our government) cannot make abortion legal; all the Court could do on Jan. 22, 1973, was to decriminalize the evil.

Abortion can be stopped. Members of our legislative bodies, as well as our president and the governor, can challenge the Court and change the laws to protect babies from abortion. Therefore, it is right and proper for us as Americans to petition our government for redress of the abortion crimes. I ask you to join pro-life Americans across this nation in our struggle to restore personhood to the unborn, and with it the "unalienable right to life" for us all. Write or call your elected officials and tell them the simple truth they already know — that abortion is a crime against humanity and must be stopped.

For further information as to what more you can do, our state office (913-233-8601) in Topeka or the Hays office (913-625-8140) will help you. Unborn babies have no one but you and me to speak for them. They are truly "the least of our brothers." By standing, working and praying together, we can and will stop the terrible crime of abortion in our beloved nation.

Iranian arms sale

Editor,

Re: the "Iranian arms crisis." I think a few questions need to be asked. Why are we selling weapons to terrorists, giving the proceeds to crazed revolutionaries? And what will our allies think?

That Iran has caused us considerable heartache in the past I cannot contest. Times change, however. Just 42 years ago, we were bitterly fighting both Germany and Japan, and now they are our allies. President Reagan is correct in his decisions to try and re-establish ties with Iran, especially considering its strategic location.

TOW missiles can hardly be concealed beneath a coat and used to hijack a plane; and while some consider them offensive weapons, I can hardly imagine a battalion of foot soldiers carrying them across a desert overnight to destroy the enemies' tanks where they sit.

As for the Contras, consider the United States' own revolutionary past. If the money had been given to Afghan rebels or Polish dissidents the press would be more understanding; yet the only difference between Afghanistan and Nicaragua is that in Afghanistan, the Russian army is actually fighting to keep a puppet dictator in power, while in Nicaragua the Russians are merely sending weapons, advisers and money to keep a puppet dictator in power. Some difference, huh?

If an oppressed people are crying out to us for help, why aren't we doing something? In Ethiopia, where the enemy is hunger, we send money, food and medical supplies. In Nicaragua, where the enemy is Communism, we sit back and watch while the press and Democrats fill our ears with cries of Vietnam.

Vietnam, Iranian hostages, gas for 10 cents a gallon: These things are all in the past. Instead of stagnating in a pool of yesterday, let's concentrate on making the world a safer place for today and tomorrow.

Lt. Col. Oliver North made incredible progress toward helping an oppressed people liberate themselves and subsequently lost his job. President Reagan took ambitious steps forward to strengthen America in the future, and he is being called a liar.

A few greedy politicians with their ambitious futures in mind stab their friends in the back, so to speak, and are heralded by the press, which is lining its pockets with the revenues generated by "presenting the latest news" in this "crisis." Think about it.

McCain funding

Editor,

With all the recent furor surrounding the proposed athletic fee, it seems an excellent time to appeal to K-State students for a different type of funding — a cultural arts fee to subsidize the price charged students for McCain events. As we are working to improve our athletic program, so should we be looking toward the enhancement of our cultural arts program.

This enhancement, in the form of a $5 per year fee, would greatly decrease McCain's current inaccessibility caused by high ticket prices. Currently, McCain tickets average nearly $13 each — an expensive form of entertainment for college students.

The contribution that McCain events can make to a more well-rounded education cannot be evaluated in terms of dollars and cents. However, the fact that McCain currently receives only $2,800 per year from a general activities fee indicates that McCain has been overlooked in terms of funding.

A cultural arts fee would drastically reduce student ticket prices and aid in the expansion of the McCain season with a potential benefit to all K-State students. Let's support the arts for a change!

Proposal may reduce student financial aid

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

As schedules, fee cards and checks changed hands during registration Monday and Tuesday, flyers denouncing President Ronald Reagan's proposed financial aid cuts were also distributed.

The flyer, produced by the Office of Student Financial Assistance, stated Reagan has proposed to eliminate the College Work Study, National Direct Student Loan, Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant, and State Student Incentive Grant (State of Kansas Scholarship) programs. It said the proposal would also reduce Pell Grants and "drastically increase interest on Guaranteed Student Loans."

Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, said he wrote the synopsis to inform students that this may be "the last student financial aid you receive."

Viterna urged students to write their congressional representatives to thank them for past financial help and ask them to vote against Reagan's proposal.

"A lot of people are saying they're going to write," said Bobbie Reutzel, sophomore in speech pathology and financial assistance worker, who handed out flyers during registration.

Although Viterna said he doesn't believe the measure will pass, if approved, "there wouldn't be anything left for students to think of," he said.

Christina Bolton, legislative director for U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., said Reagan wrote his budget merely to stay in compliance with the Gramm-Rudman budget law.

"It's a game that we play, he knows Congress isn't going to accept them," she said.

Bolton said Dole is against measures that will hurt students in financial need.

"In general, he does not support any further budget reductions in education unless they can be made in adminstrative ways or ways that will not impact negatively on those who depend on the benefits," she said.

Carol McDowell, chief aide to U.S. Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., said Slattery wouldn't have been able to go to college without federal aid and is also against financial aid cuts.

"He's always been in favor of student loans and financial support for students," she said.

Further information about financial assistance may be obtained through the financial aid office, Fairchild 104.

This proposal and Reagan's entire budget for fiscal 1988 is currently under Congressional review.

Bill eliminates salt mines as waste disposal site

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Disposal and storage of radioactive waste in Kansas' salt formations would be prohibited under terms of a measure introduced Tuesday in the Kansas House.

The sponsor of the bill, Rep. LeRoy Fry, D-Little River, said he hopes to use the proposal to discourage the possible selection of the salt mines near Lyons for use as a regional radioactive waste disposal facility.

State health officials have said owners of the mines have made presentations to the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact Commission about the possibility of using the salt formations as a waste disposal site.

The commission is reviewing 32 counties across Kansas as possible locations for a disposal facility as well as sections of Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana. The executive director of the commission says federal law requires that a host state for the disposal facility be selected by Jan. 1, 1988.

Fry said he introduced the bill in response to widespread opposition in his district to using the salt mines as a radioactive waste facility.

"You ought to see the number of signatures going on petitions against this in Rice County," Fry said. "This is so that we'll have the legislation if we need it and then we can go to court over it if we are selected."

The lawmaker claimed there have not been adequate studies of the long-term effects of storing waste in "deep cavity" facilities and that the commission originally said it was seeking to dispose of the waste by using a shallow land burial method.

The measure, which was the lone bill introduced in the House Tuesday, would forbid the use of underground salt formations for disposal or storage of both high- and low-level radioactive waste.

One bill was introduced Tuesday in the Senate as well. That measure is designed to help the state's 304 school districts deal with proposed cuts in education financing.

The proposal would allow districts to put interest they earn on idle funds into their general fund bank accounts. Currently, state laws direct that the interest can only go into a limited number of funds, such as transporation funds.

"Teacher salaries are not one it can be used for," said Sen. Don Montogomery, R-Sabetha, the bill's sponsor, adding that the measure could help some districts avoid cutting teacher salaries because of the state's fiscal crisis.

Survey rates high school ag programs

By LORI STEVENS
Collegian Reporter

Believing that educational programs are worthwhile only if students benefit, the Kansas Vocational Agriculture Teacher's Association has evaluated Kansas high school vocational agriculture programs.

After an October 1985 request from the KVATA executive committee, Richard Welton, professor of adult and occupational education, and Julie Koci, graduate student in adult and occupational education, worked on the project.

"The vocational agriculture program is designed to prepare high school students for a career in agribusiness," Welton said. "Each high school program is designed to meet the needs of the community."

The teachers are in charge of their programs, with courses offered as electives to the students. As an example, a student could take a semester of crop production along with regular English and math classes.

Koci selected five schools from each of the seven Future Farmers of America districts in the state to be represented in the study.

Koci asked high school vocational agriculture teachers to send a list of their 1981 graduates who were involved with vocational agriculture programs. Koci sent out 227 surveys and received 81, which she used for the basis of the study.

Responses concerning experiences in vocational agriculture programs indicated 75 percent of the graduates felt the program helped them learn how to work. Eighty-nine percent said the program taught skills useful in an agricultural career.

The program proved helpful in other areas: 64 percent thought the program taught them skills in non-agricultural occupations, and 82 percent said the program helped them to learn how to get along with other people.

Mayor to leave post, focus on other areas

By ERIN EICHER
News Editor

The Manhattan City Commission will have to meet the challenges of the next four years without Mayor Rick Mann, who plans to vacate his post on the commission and the office of mayor in April.

Mann announced Thursday that he would not be seeking re-election to the city commission at the close of his four-year term.

"I've been interspersing city activities into my workday. This week alone, I have three major speeches to give. That takes a great deal of preparation time," Mann said. "I haven't been able to spend enough time with my family."

Mann, 36, was elected to the five-member commission in 1983 and became mayor last April. Also at that time, he was promoted to executive vice president of Kansas State Bank, 1010 Westloop. Mann said the increased responsibility of this position must take precedence over his political ambitions at this time.

According to traditional succession, the title of mayor will fall to Gene Klingler, currently in the third year of his term on the commission.

Mann's position on the commission will be up for re-election in April, along with the positions currently held by Suzanne Lindamood and Nancy Denning. Denning has declared her candidacy, while Lindamood has not yet announced if she will be running.

Mann said he is proud of the working partnerships formed between K-State and the commission during the past four years.

The fire station built near the intersection of Kimball and Denison avenues is an example of a cooperative effort between the University and the city. K-State permitted the city to build the fire station on its land in exchange for University fire protection, he said.

Also, the city helped fund lighting for K-State's Frank Myers Field in exchange for allowing the American Legion baseball team to play there, Mann said.

The University was also connected to one of his more unpleasant memories of working on the commission — the two Aggieville disturbances.

The Aggieville melee following the last K-State-University of Kansas football game was "one of those things that two years ago we had hoped that we would find some ways and methods to avoid that happening again.

Mann said some of the challenges the commission would be facing in the years to come include continuing development of the city, widening Seth Childs Road to four lanes, building an extension for Anderson Avenue and continued monitoring of the downtown redevelopment project.

Federal judge sentences 3 Mafia bosses

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Three of the Mafia's top bosses were sentenced Tuesday to 100 years each in jail by a federal judge who said he wanted to give their would-be successors something to think about.

The bosses of the Colombo, Genovese and Lucchese organized crime families received the century-long terms for membership on a commission that had settled disputes, divided loot and occasionally ordered rubouts for the Mafia since Prohibition.

U.S. District Judge Richard Owen said he had to send a message "to those out there who are undoubtedly thinking about taking over the reins of power." And authorities cautioned that the convictions and sentencings did not mean the end of the mob in America.

"The worst mistake we can make is to declare a final victory" Thomas L. Sheer, head of the FBI's New York office, said following the sentencing of the bosses and five mob underlings at federal court in Manhattan.

"I can't say it's the end of the commission," U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani said at a news conference in his office after the sentencings. "But it makes it much more difficult to operate that kind of an operation."

Owen sentenced the defendants, who were all in the courtroom, one at a time and said his comments to the first, Genovese boss Anthony "Fat Tony" Salerno, 76, applied to all.

The other top bosses sentenced to a century were Carmine "Junior" Persico, 53, head of the Colombos, and Anthony "Tony Ducks" Corallo, 73, the boss of the Lucchese mob.

He sentenced four of the five mob underlings convicted with the others last November to 100 years apiece. Bonanno crime family soldier Anthony "Bruno" Indelicato, 38, was only charged with two racketeering counts but received the maximum 40 years for those crimes.

The others sentenced to 100 years were: Colombo underboss Gennaro "Gerry Lang" Langella, 48; Lucchese underboss Salvatore "Tom Mix" Santoro, 72; Lucchese consigliere, or counselor, Christopher "Christy Tick" Furnari, 62; and Ralph Scopo, 58, a Colombo soldier and former labor leader.

All but Indelicato could have been sentenced to more than 300 years in prison.

They were convicted after a two-month racketeering trial .

Amtrak probe reports speeding before crash

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal investigators, continuing to focus on possible human error in their probe of the collision of an Amtrak train and three Conrail locomotives, reported Tuesday that both of the trains appeared to be speeding immediately before the crash.

An analysis of speed recorders showed that the Conrail locomotives were traveling about 64 miles per hour before the engineer applied the brakes and the Amtrak passenger train was traveling 128 miles per hour before brakes were applied, officials said.

The National Transportation Safety Board, meanwhile, released details of a series of speed tests using similar Conrail locomotives that showed the Conrail engineer should have had enough time to stop before sliding into the path of the Amtrak train on Jan. 4.

NTSB member Joseph Nall said a stop signal should have been visible, according to the tests, more than a mile from where the two tracks merged. He said the tests, conducted Monday, showed the locomotives able to stop at least a half-mile before the intersection.

Nall said the Amtrak train, which should have been traveling at 105 miles per hour because of special restrictions on the train, was actually traveling 128 miles per hour when the engineer applied the brakes.

Hayden's welfare cuts approach $12 million

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The first serious disagreement over Gov.-elect Mike Hayden's proposed budget cuts could come Wednesday when the House Appropriations Committee reviews the $11.7 million in reductions made in welfare funding for the current fiscal year.

The panel Tuesday reviewed more than half the $60 million in cuts Hayden is submitting to the Legislature to meet a revenue shortfall but didn't get to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services portion of the appropriations-lapsing bill.

That comes Wednesday, when Democrats on the committee are expected to stir debate on the most controversial of the cuts: the reduction of funding for those on aid to dependent children and general assistance, as well as medical assistance, for the poor and unemployed.

Rep. Bill Bunten, R-Topeka, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, conceded there are "legitimate concerns" about the welfare budget cuts but this is not the time to engage in full-fledged debate.

"We need to get this bill out," Bunten said. "We can decide later if substantive changes need to be made. It can be adjusted in light of a more complete revenue later in the session."

Hayden has tried to make the $60 million in cuts "as painlessly as possible," but there nevertheless will be an unavoidable impact on programs and people, his chief financial adviser told the committee Monday.

In deciding how to reduce spending by state agencies by 3.8 percent the remainder of this fiscal year Hayden has reached "as good a balance as one can achieve" in being fair both to state agencies and the individuals affected by the cuts, said Marlin Rein, the fiscal expert on Hayden's transition team.

Rein went before the committee to explain how Hayden arrived at the $60 million in reductions he is recommending to the 1987 Legislature — which convenes next Monday. They are in response to a $93 million projected revenue shortfall this fiscal year because of a continuing sluggish state economy.

The House committee will review the cuts through Wednesday, then the Senate Ways and Means Committee will study them Thursday and Friday.

The bill making the cuts will be introduced in the House Monday, then the Appropriations Committee will debate it Tuesday and report it to the House floor for debate next Wednesday, the third day of the new session.

Hayden learned two days after his Nov. 4 election victory that the Consensus Estimating Group had reduced the estimate of how much tax revenue state government would collect this year by the $93 million.

To meet it, the incoming governor instructed agencies to propose to him how to cut their spending 3.8 percent to save the $60 million. His goal is to absorb a $13 million actual deficit the state would face if nothing were done, pay for $17 million in supplemental appropriations Hayden expects to submit to the lawmakers, and leave a $30 million general fund balance on June 30.

While many of the individual agencies' reduction amounts had become public earlier, Tuesday was the first time Hayden had unveiled specific amounts he is recommending each be cut.

More than two-thirds of the reductions, 68.5 percent, are in just three agencies — Department of Education, Board of Regents and Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

The public education cuts total $24.46 million, $17.27 million of which is is reduced state aid to Kansas' 304 local school districts; the regents and their institutions are losing $12.1 million, and SRS is giving up $11.73 million.

Cuts crucial to bus line, official says

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An official of Trailways Lines Inc. said Tuesday his company will go "belly up" if state utility regulators reject its proposal to abandon bus service to 62 of the 75 Kansas communities it now serves.

Malcolm Myers, Dallas, vice president of traffic for Trailways, told the Kansas Corporation Commission his company was losing $50,000 per day nationwide and drastic action is needed if the company is to survive.

"In July and August of 1986, it became extremely apparent that if we were to survive we must take drastic action," Myers told the commission as it launched hearings into Trailways' abandonment request. A decision is expected by Jan. 20.

"We very carefully decided what we needed to do to tear out the cancerous areas of the body that we needed to live.

"We decided we must redeploy our assets before we virtually go down the tubes. The decision was the most painful undertaking any of us ever had. It's no fun tearing down a company you've put 35 years of your life into. But we're trying to keep our heads above water."

Myers rejected the contention Trailways was abandoning the people in the communities where bus service would be eliminated effective April 1. The proposal would leave 40 cities without any bus service.

"We didn't pull out of Kansas; we didn't pull out and leave the poor people of Fort Scott — they left us," Myers said. "We didn't pull out until our buses were running the streets of Fort Scott empty. And that's true of the entire state of Kansas."

Myers singled out Fort Scott in response to questions from an attorney representing that southeast Kansas community at the hearing.

"I sincerely believe if we're not successful in these abandonment proceedings, we're going out of business," Myers said. "I believe its not in the public interest in the areas we'll continue to serve to require us to continue losing money on these routes. I know what we're attempting to do here will happen. Either it will happen gracefully with permission here or from the ICC or it will happen by us going belly up."

Trailways, the largest provider of bus service in the state, says its lost $1.7 million on its bus operations in Kansas in the 12-month period ending Aug. 31. The company says a subsidy of $2.9 million would be needed for Trailways to maintain the same level of service now provided.

On Aug. 29, Trailways notified the commission of its plans to drop all but one Kansas route: from Kansas City to Wichita via Topeka, Lawrence, Emporia, Augusta, Winfield and Arkansas City.

Routes to be dropped are: Wichita to Pueblo, Colo.; Wichita to Joplin, Mo.; Kansas City, Mo., to Joplin; Kansas City, Mo. to Denver; and Wichita to Lincoln, Neb.

Even though Trailways plans to keep one route, Myers doubts whether even that route will survive.

Myers said the news media and state regulators were making too much out of Trailways' abandonment, saying people who now rely upon public transportation will "still get where they need to go."

Colleges experience effects of cutbacks

BUDGETS on the block

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

No spring class sessions will be closed because of recent budget cuts in the College of Agriculture, said David Mugler, director of resident instruction in agriculture.

Most of the classes are highly specialized, and specific courses are required for students. It is difficult, therefore, to find classes the college could do without, Mugler said.

To avoid closing classes, the Department of Entomology has consolidated several. Although this reduces the need for teachers, it makes the classes much larger than in previous semesters, said Robert Helgesen, head of the department.

The College of Agriculture has also made changes in faculty and staff postitions. Several faculty positions that have been vacated will not be filled until the budget has been stabilized, Mugler said.

Four out of 23 faculty positions have been frozen in the entomology department.

"This has a very dramatic effect on the department as a whole," Helgesen said.

Although the department terminated one research assistant's position, Helgesen said it is trying to protect teaching by freezing vacant positions rather than laying off anyone currently employed.

Helgesen said positions that have not been filled are being assumed by other faculty and staff members.

Stanley Leland Jr., associate director of the Agricultural Experiment Station, said in addition to not having the money to bring in new faculty, it is difficult to attract the best minds in the country because of the low monetary budget of the University overall.

Other changes made in the College of Agriculture include cuts in overhead operating expenditures.

"Right now we are at an exciting threshold in bio-technology and we should be experimenting, but we don't have the state-of-the-art equipment to do so," Leland said."

The entomology department will also have to postpone the purchase of major pieces of equipment. However, as in many other departments, some faculty members have received independent research grants that do not require money from that state and are not affected by the budget cuts.

Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, said in a December Collegian interview that budget cuts also would affect recruitment spending.

"We cannot follow up on contacts in the same quality we were," Woods said.

Although the budget has been tight because of recent statewide cuts mandated by Gov. Mike Hayden, the College of Architecture and Design did not have to lay off any faculty or staff members.

Claude Keithley, head of the Department of Regional and Community Planning, said he refused to lay off students and clerical help to save departmental expenses because many of the students are putting themselves through school.

"We made a commitment to these people, and we aren't going to break it," Keithley said.

Mark Lapping, dean of the college, said it was not necessary to lay off faculty members because of the substantial cuts made in other areas, including travel expenses.

"There will be virtually no faculty or administrative travel," he said.

Lapping said out-of-state travel is very important in architecture because the professors travel to conferences and conventions to submit papers, introduce research results and learn what is new in the field.

The regional and community planning department in the college has $500 left for travel money for its five faculty members until the next fiscal year, Keithley said.

If the cuts continue, he said, it will be difficult for the faculty to uphold the K-State image.

Cutbacks are also being made in the upkeep and purchase of equipment.

"When something breaks, we aren't going to be able to fix it until the next fiscal year," Keithley said.

New electronics and machinery will have to wait until fiscal year 1988, Lapping said.

Although all required classes in the college will be offered as scheduled, some departments are not offering elective courses.

"We usually have to cut a few classes every semester after registration due to low enrollment," Lapping said. "I think because we are so overloaded in other areas the tendency (to cut classes) may be greater this semester."

Classes being offered as scheduled will be larger than usual due both to an enrollment increase and the combination of classes, Lapping said.

In order to save money, the college will be closely monitoring mailing and phone calls, which will have a direct effect on recruitment, Lapping said. The college usually corresponds with prospective students and sends out pamphlets explaining course offerings and options.

"With the incredibly high teaching loads and underpaid faculty, the intangible effect of the budget cuts," Lapping said, "is that it really hurts the morale of the faculty and staff."

Lafene, Union improvements continue

By CHRIS DOLL
Staff Writer

As students begin the spring semester, construction continues in the K-State Union and Lafene Student Health Center. When finished, directors at both facilities hope they can serve students better.

Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene Student Health Center, said he hopes to increase patients' privacy by removing the booths used to hear the patient's health concerns before they see a doctor. Three rooms, a rest area, a storeroom and a special-care room will be converted into private rooms for the same purpose to allow a patient more privacy.

"Patient privacy is an on-going problem," he said. "It always comes up when we are evaluated."

Tout said the renovation project should be finished in one to two weeks.

The Union is completing another phase of construction in the cafeteria. Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said she hopes to open a cone construction area featuring "condiments" on the east side of the food service area by Feb. 2.

It will offer a variety of hard-dip ice creams and soft-serve vanilla ice cream for floats, shakes, sundaes and flurries made how the customers want them. She said the area will be open from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m.

It will also feature an area where hamburgers, hot dogs, nachos and chili will be served when the rest of the cafeteria is not serving hot food.

The earlier phases of construction were revamping the center soda fountains and the area where hot food is served. Sisson said she hopes to make the Union a better place for the students to use after construction is completed.

One reason she hopes the Union will be used more is because it now helps financially support the University. Because of recent budget cuts, the Union now sends some of its profits to the University, which it did not do before.

A third area of the addition will be a bakery display case, which will sell items in bulk quanities. Sisson said she hopes this will increase awareness and use of the Union's bakery and special-order services.

"We hope to be able to increase our offers to students by more efficient use of our labor," she said.

Because of savings in labor, Sisson hopes to extend the cafeteria's hours until 10 p.m. This change will not take effect until staffing for student managers can be worked out.

The next phase, she said, would be buying at least one computerized cash register. This would permit students' meal plans to be more flexible and less costly to students.

Now, students pay for specific meals in advance. If they miss a meal, they cannot be refunded, Sisson said.

With a computer, students could pay the Union a certain amount of money in advance. When a student buys food, the computer would subtract the cost of the food from the balance, and the student and cashier would realize the remaining balance.

This crystal barreled veteran of the campus has a ribbed finger grip for continuous comfort and is perfectly balanced for effortless writing. Best of all, you'll never throw it out because it's refillable.
The perfect teammate to the Better Ball Point Pen is Pilot's Pencilier 0.5mm mechanical pencil. It has a continuous lead feed system and a cushion tip that helps eliminate the frustration of lead breakage. The Pencilier's jumbo eraser does the job cleanly while the ribbed grip offers the same comfort as the Better Ball Point Pen.

Kansas native gives K-State artifacts from New Zealand

By KIM GREENWOOD
Contributing Writer

In the early '60s, Celia Markum traversed 600 miles up the Sepik River in New Zealand to visit the native people and look for original artifacts.

Markum recently donated her findings to the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work.

The collection is being exhibited in the anthropology display cases in the east wing of first floor in Waters Hall.

Originally from Junction City, Markum collected the artifacts when she and her late husband, Ralph White, went on a tour of the South Pacific.

Markum said she knows the pieces are valuable because she has seen similar artifacts in various museums, including a museum in Sidney, Australia.

At first, Markum displayed the artifacts in her Junction City home, but she recently remarried and moved to Port Isabel, Texas, where she no longer has room for them. Markum said she and her family were always quite attached to K-State, so she decided to give the collection to the University.

"We were thrilled and overwhelmed by the donation from Markum," said Pat O'Brien, professor of anthropology.

"The Sepik River basin has long been recognized as an area producing some of the finest art in the primitive world," states Anthony Forge in the article "Art and Environment in the Sepik."

"Margaret Mead...has noted that the Mundugamor of the New Guinea highlands believe that being born with the umbilical cord wrapped around the neck is a necessary requirement for a male infant to become an artist." However, they believe these males must have the proper training to become artists, according to "Art in Primitive Societies" by Richard L. Anderson.

A hand-woven mask is associated with harvest and symbolizes plenty, Markum said.

"Masks and figures were the most spectacular cult objects, though the most sacred were often the musical instruments — particularly flutes — the sounds of which were held to be the voices of ancestors or earth and water spirits," as stated in "Art of Oceana, Africa, and the Americas" from the Museum of Primitive Art.

One artifact is a flute with a black, carved figure on it. The flute was used in ceremonies that took place in the "men's house," a place women were not allowed.

"The ceremonial houses, cult centers that also functioned as clubhouses for the men, were often huge structures with lavish ornamentation (especially in the Sepik district) including carved posts and finials, and ceilings and gables sheathed in bark paintings," according to "Art of Oceana, Africa, and the Americas" from the Museum of Primitive Art.

Fables surround some of the artifacts. One relic in particular is an elongated face that is associated with the creation of the Sepik River. The fable explains how the Sepik River people cried and their tears ran down their face and nose to create the river, Markum said.

Elongated noses and concern with eyes, either through design or use of shells, readily identify the artifacts from the Sepik River area, said Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology.

"For instance, one of the features of Sepik art very commonly discussed is the frequency of long noses; noses with extensions ending in animal heads or human faces with noses like bird beaks," Anthony Forge stated in his article.

The artifacts come from several villages along the Sepik River and hill country. The expedition traveled in a dugout canoe with outboard motors, stopping at various villages to see the people and their lifestyles.

Markum said she participated in the trip because she has always been interested in people and their cultures.

The villagers were quite willing to sell their artifacts for money, she said.

Those on the trip saw "two villages in the hill country that had never allowed white man in before," Markum said.

One of the men in the village grew up there, but went away to be educated. When he came back to his village, he was concerned about the economic condition of the village. He spoke with the village headmen and encouraged them to let white men visit the village, Markum said.

"Some (of the villagers) were friendly, and some resented the fact we were there," Markum said.

During the trip, Markum said they saw different tribal customs and religious ceremonies. Two of the dances they saw in the hill country incorporated a very ornate use of feathers and were unknown to the tour guides.

Though the people of New Guinea speak more than 700 native languages, English is not included. Consequently, the people on the tour communicated with the natives through the tour guides. Also, some of the village leaders and children knew some English as a second language, Markum said.

Except for a few tribes, most of the natives are colonized. Many of the village children receive formal education, but are then unable to find work. They do not fit into their village life any longer either, Markum said.

Volunteer group aids area families hurt by farm economy

By ANNE BRANDSBERG
Collegian Reporter

Christmas Eve, 1985, the people in the Wetmore area donated time, food and clothes for farm families with financial problems.

The cause for these acts of kindness was a letter read over several regional radio stations that night. The letter, written by Wetmore businessman Guy Stedman, co-founder of Help the Farmers Inc., asked for help for farmers who had been hurt by the farm crisis.

Stedman, owner of a hardware store in Wetmore, located about 50 miles northeast of Manhattan, said he began to see problems in the farm situation through talking with customers.

"People would come in and tell him how things were in the farm situation," said Clara Niehues, co-founder of Help the Farmers Inc. "People were concerned but didn't know how to help. When we saw someone was willing to get involved, we gave them support.

"Our ideas have changed since we started," she said. "At the beginning, we thought it would be a good idea to raise money to help pay back some interest, but we realized we couldn't do that.

"We kept referring (the farmers) for legal advice when we got started," Niehues said. "Now we do a lot more than that."

"These people are ashamed to ask for help," said volunteer Glenda Noe. "For years in the past, they have been the ones that donated to the poor. Farmers are skeptical of coming in for fear of social condemnation. We try to ease their guilt feelings by making them realize there are lots of people who care."

Noe said there is more of a demand on their services when it gets cold, with people needing more food, warmer clothing and fuel for heating their homes.

"People donated their services to dispense these things. That's when we got physically involved," Niehues said.

But other problems entered the picture when Stedman's store burned last February, forcing the organization to move to downtown office space donated by other Wetmore merchants.

One of the organization's main functions is to assist farmers in obtaining clothing, food, shelter and fuel to keep warm in the winter. The group has also recently started a food bank, buying food such as canned goods and oatmeal from suppliers in the Kansas City area and Missouri.

Noe said she had hoped for more staples like sugar, flour and baking soda, but the distributors only had canned goods.

Other food donations have been obtained from organizations such as Wetmore High School's Kayettes and Wetmore Grade School children, who collected canned goods during Halloween in a "Trick or Treat So Others Can Eat" campaign.

"We're busy as bees in here working directly with people who need help," she said. "We're awfully busy. We get a lot of phone calls from very far away, sometimes from states way out East.

"When people realize they are faced with the threat of having their farm repossessed, they reach out," Noe said. "They don't seem to trust anyone local, so they call us."

She said "a tremendous response" has been achieved through telephone calls asking for donations, finding contributors who want to assist.

"We called the Wells'-Lamont Manufacturing Interest and asked for a donation of some gloves, because they have high quality, warm gloves," Noe said.

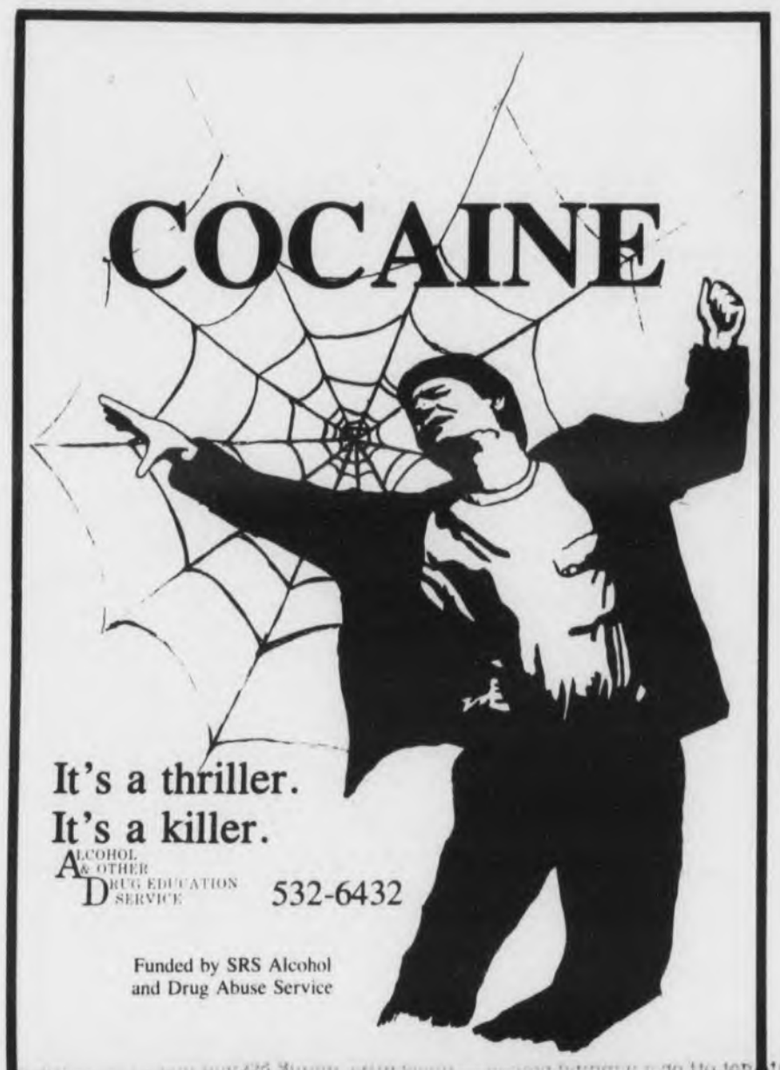
"I said we'd take seconds or whatever, just something to keep (the farmers') hands warm. And now we're waiting for a shipment of gloves to come in," Noe said.

Noe said the relief organization serves about 3,000 people in a 45-county area, with food collected in the area distributed locally. She said they also respond to requests from other area pantries serving farming communities.

These people don't fall under the Social Rehabilitation Services guidelines, Noe said.

"It doesn't matter that the people on the land don't necessarily own it; to SRS it's all the same," she said. "They are changing their guidelines to help the farmers, though. We still try to pick up where they leave off."

Help the Farmers Inc. also works with job placement, retraining and the county mental health department, noting some people contacting the office need counseling to help handle their stress.



Niehues said other organizations are looking into other problems in the farming industry, trying to get prices changed and working for more favorable legislation.

"We let them do it because it takes too much time," she said. "We try to be the filler for those who need help now. Some are not eligible for SRS programs, and there is a two-month waiting list for other programs."

"We're mostly concerned with farm families with children, that they get plenty of nutrition, a good hot meal and, of course, fuel in the winter," Niehues said. "I say families, (but) really we help everyone in the farming community because anyone who lives in the farming community has a farm-related income."

Help the Farmers Inc. volunteers are paid by Volunteers in Service to America, but were not picked up by VISTA for two years, Niehues said.

"We pointed our service to those who need it. It's especially rewarding to be a volunteer. They (the farmers and their families) just need someone to talk to. To these people, losing their farm, their home, is like a death in the family."

K-State earns votes in Associated Press poll

Staff/Brad Fanshier

Wichita State University forward Sasha Radunovich drives past K-State's Norris Coleman during the second half of the clash between the intrastate schools Monday in Ahearn Field House. The Wildcats, led by Coleman's 24 points, held off a Shocker rally to win 79-67.

11-3 'Cats dump WSU, set records in NU game

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

Bolstered by an 11-3 overall record and impressive victories against Wichita State and Nebraska in its last two outings, K-State received two votes in the latest Associated Press men's basketball top 20 rankings released Tuesday.

The last time K-State received a top-20 ranking was in United Press International's 1981-82 final poll, after a season in which the 'Cats finished 23-8.

"We appreciate the votes," Coach Lon Kruger said. "We still have a lot of work to do before we earn a spot in the top 20, but that gives us something to shoot for."

In their most recent action, the 'Cats earned a 79-67 victory Monday in Ahearn Field House against intrastate rival Wichita State on the strength of their pressure free-throw shooting in the closing minutes.

The margin of victory was not indicative of the game, however, as a KSN television audience and more than 11,000 fans watched an 11-point Wildcat halftime lead disintegrate.

"WSU really out-fought us in the second half," Kruger said.

K-State's near 70-percent field goal accuracy in the first half slipped to 35 percent in the second, and the Shockers used this to their advantage, combining intense man-to-man defense and hustle to get back into the contest.

The Wildcats had to rely on clutch free throws from Steve Henson and Norris Coleman in the closing minutes to clinch their 11th win.

Wichita State pulled ahead 67-66 on two free throws by Gus Santos with 3:31 remaining in the game, but K-State rebounded to knot the score on Coleman's free throw on its next possession and never looked back. The Shockers were held scoreless for the rest of the game as the 'Cats went on to win by 12.

"We lost a big lead in the second half," Kruger said. "We weren't moving very well and we became tentative. I'm really proud of the way they (the 'Cats) came back. We maintained our poise. We knew it would be a battle."

A record-setting 114-82 win over Nebraska Saturday in Ahearn was important in several respects. K-State got off on a winning note in conference play, Coleman made his 1986-87 debut and several school marks were set.

Six Wildcats scored in double figures, and K-State also outrebounded Nebraska 38-29.

K-State's point total was the highest ever in a University game, beating the old mark of 111 points against Morgan State in 1985. The team also set a record for most points in one half (61 in the second). It was also the first time since the 1980-81 season K-State had scored more than 100 points in a conference contest.

The 'Cats also came close to bettering a Big Eight record for most points scored in a conference game (119), established by Iowa State against Colorado in 1975.

K-State never trailed in the game and cruised to a 53-37 halftime lead on the strength of three-point shooting (six-for-nine in the half). In the second half, the 'Cats shot even better as they were 22-of-30 from the two-point range and seven-for-eight on three pointers. The 'Huskers could never rally and trailed by 38 points during one stretch in the second stanza.

Coleman came off the bench in the contest and delivered 23 points and nine rebounds to lead both teams.

K-State played at Milwaukee's MECCA Arena Jan. 7 against Marquette and won a 85-84 squeaker. K-State led by three at the half, 37-34, and built a six-point advantage with 1:45 left in the game.

Marquette pulled to within one, 83-82 with 1:13 left, but Will Scott — who tied Mitch Richmond for scoring honors with 23 points — made two free throws with 11 seconds left to seal the victory for the 'Cats.

Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo., was the site of K-State's Dec. 27 match-up with nationally ranked North Carolina. After the 'Cats played UNC tough the first 20 minutes of play, the Tar Heels went on to down the 'Cats 81-62 and led by as many as 26 points in the second half.

"I was disappointed in the way we opened the second half," Kruger said.

"I think it is certainly a down note in the way we lost. There is nothing to be pleased about losing by those numbers."

"We were very happy that we won the game. K-State is a good ball team," Tar Heel coach Dean Smith said. "They play very active and hustled the defense a lot."

North Carolina All-American guard Kenny Smith said, "This is the toughest 20-point win I have ever played in. You have to give their players a lot of credit for not giving up."

Richmond and Lance Simmons led the 'Cats with 14 points each. The 'Cats shot only 44 percent from the field and were outrebounded 38-33.

K-State escaped DeKalb, Ill., with a narrow 81-79 win Dec. 23 against Northern Illinois after taking second place in the Music City Invitational Dec. 19-20 at Nashville. Richmond paced the 'Cats against UNI with 20 points.

In the Music City Invitational, K-State beat Illinois State 87-86 and lost to tourney host Vanderbilt 79-72. Simmons and Richmond were named to the all-tournament team.

Wichita State handed K-State its first loss of the season, 63-60, Dec. 13 at Henry Levitt Arena in Wichita. The 'Cats were without the services of Richmond who was sidelined with a badly sprained wrist.

Miller takes job in Pennsylvania

By The Collegian Staff

Associate Athletic Director Steve Miller has accepted a position with the Special Olympics organization in Pennsylvania and will leave the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, the Manhattan Mercury reported Tuesday.

Miller took an administrative position last spring after coaching the Wildcats' track and field teams for the past five years.

Miller could not be reached for comment.

Slumping 'Huskers to test Lady Cats' win streak

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

K-State's women's basketball team will be looking to extend its eight-game home winning streak Wednesday when the Lady Cornhuskers of Nebraska visit Manhattan for a 7:30 p.m. contest in Ahearn Field House.

The Lady Cats are 11-3 overall and 0-1 in the Big Eight Conference.

Nebraska, 8-6 overall after a 5-0 start, is coming off a 81-79 overtime win at home Sunday against Kansas. Coach Angela Beck has 14 returning players from last year's team, including all of last season's starters.

Even though Nebraska appears to be in a slump — 3-6 in its last nine outings — Lady Cats coach Matilda Mossman said her squad isn't taking the game lightly.

"They are very balanced from a scoring standpoint and they are going to do a lot of different things. They are going to be very aggressive," Mossman said.

"We have to control the tempo of the game, and we've got to jump on them on offense and make them do some different things defensively if we are going to win the game."

In a home doubleheader with the men's team Monday night, the Lady Cats soundly defeated Saint Mary of the Plains 88-50. K-State started slow offensively and allowed St. Mary to hold the lead for the first seven minutes of the game.

After Mossman inserted her two freshmen guards — Carol Smith and Elyse Funk — into the game, things started to happen. By halftime the Lady Cats had built a 44-28 lead.

Susan Green paced the team offensively with 16 points. Tracy Bleczinski scored 14 points and led the team in rebounding with 10 rebounds. Carlisa Thomas and Sue Leiding each had eight rebounds.

K-State outrebounded St. Mary 43-23 and shot 58.1 percent from the field. Carlisa Thomas led K-State with eight of the team's 19 steals

In the first outing of a four-game home stand Thursday, the Lady Cats trounced Oral Roberts 95-57.

"We jumped on them early and dictated some things in the first five-10 minutes of the game and got a big lead and forced them to play catch-up ball," Mossman said.

K-State lost its Big Eight opener to 20th ranked Oklahoma, 70-47, Jan. 6 at Norman.

Over the semester break, K-State went on a three-game road trip to California. In the first game Dec. 29, K-State beat California-Santa Barbara, 57-48. The next evening the Lady Cats downed California State-Fullerton, 80-68. K-State got its new year off to an impressive start Jan. 2 by soundly defeating Chapman College, 95-51.

Against Chapman, the Lady Cats set several season records. Leiding scored 27 points and tied Green for the most points scored this season. Thomas set a season high for rebounding with 15 and also had a record nine steals.

In the last home game of 1986 on Dec. 19, the Lady Cats defeated University of Missouri-Kansas City 72-61. Green paced K-State with 27 points and Thomas set the season single-game record for assists with 13.

In the final game before Christmas break, the Lady Cats lost to Creighton in a close game 62-59. Leiding hit 11-of-18 field goals in the losing effort.

'Cats' fans welcome Coleman's return

Standout regains last season's form

By TOM MORRIS
Sports Editor

Norris Coleman, who shouldered multiple NCAA rulings which sidelined him for almost a year, walked confidently to his customary position on Ahearn Field House's wooden basketball court Saturday against Nebraska.

With a thunderous roar of approval from more than 9,000 fans attending Saturday's Big Eight Conference opener for the Wildcats, Coleman entered the game with 16:26 remaining in the first half and K-State holding a 12-2 lead.

He scored his first bucket — a 10-foot turnaround jumped over Nebraska's Keith Neubert — at the 15:04 mark to give the 'Cats a 17-6 lead, but then missed his next four attempts.

Was Coleman nervous?

"I don't know that he was," Coach Lon Kruger said. "If he was, it didn't really show. I thought he played real well...He missed some shots early, but he'll be able to get those down."

"Everybody gets nervous," Coleman said. "I missed some shots that I know I'm going to hit (later on). I should have made those shots, maybe I missed them because of nervousness, but as the game gradually wore on I could feel my confidence building."

Coleman finished the contest with a game-high 23 points on 8-of-16 shooting from the field and hit seven-of-nine attempts from the free throw line. He also had nine rebounds and one blocked shot in the 'Cats' record-setting 114-82 win against the Cornhuskers.

And Monday against Wichita State, Coleman once again led both teams with 24 points and paced both squads in rebounding with eight.

His clutch free-throw shooting, 8-of-10 down the stretch, helped ensure K-State's 79-67 win.

Coleman appears to be in midseason form, even though he sat out the first 13 games of the 1986-87 campaign because of an NCAA ruling.

"When I was on the bench in the second half against Wichita State, all I wanted was to be out on the floor — giving my best down the stretch," Coleman said.

"I like to get the ball down low," he added. "If I don't make the high percentage shot, I get fouled. All in all, the more games I play, I'm beginning to feel more confident.

"Of course, he's an outstanding player," said Kruger after Monday's come-from-behind win. "He is a big target inside where there's a big crowd and where you're more apt to draw a foul."

Coleman, 25, led the freshman class in scoring last season with a 21.9-point average per outing and averaged almost eight rebounds per game before being sidelined by a Feb. 27, 1986 NCAA decision that said he was ineligible since he did not have a 2.00 GPA following his 1979 graduation from high school in Jacksonville, Fla.

The NCAA ruled in November that Coleman would be eligible following the 13th game of this season providing he repay any financial aid he received while he was ineligible. The NCAA also took away a year of Coleman's eligibility which made the 6-foot 8-inch forward a junior when he stepped on the court against Nebraska.

Even though Kruger said Coleman is "a pretty good sixth man right now," the first-year coach added that a decision will be made about Coleman's inevitible return to the starting lineup Thursday or Friday.

Coleman said he doesn't mind his current role coming off the bench.

"I don't mind," Coleman said. "It is kind of unusual to me to come off the bench, but wherever Coach Kruger sees fit to play me is fine with me. As long as I can contribute to the team...I have no gripes."

And the fans have no gripes with Coleman who could have played at any school (except for a Big Eight Conference member) instead of sitting out until mid-February. But Coleman spurned offers from such basketball powerhouses as Maryland and Kentucky to remain in Manhattan.

"There are caring people in Manhattan and I guess that's why I stayed here," he said. "I've been in the fast life before and I don't like it as much. I feel warm here knowing that these people care about me and I care about them.

"That ovation the crowd gave me (Saturday)...This is something I've been waiting for."

departments that were managing their monies well," he said. "I'm not through fighting yet. I don't think I should be penalized for being a good manager of the students' dollars."

Another criticism of the proposal is that the agencies were not given enough time to properly prepare their own budgets for the measure.

"That was probably the big misgiving of this," said David Adams, director of Student Publications Inc. "If (the administration) would have said we are going to need to implement this in the next fiscal year, it would have given us time to go to the board and do some proper planning for it. I think they got in a bind, and this was their easy way out.

"When they are taxing sales operations like this, you don't just pull out many thousands of dollars without a plan. It's just like being charged a 3-percent sales tax, and not having the opportunity to charge it back to the customer," Adams said. "The other big problem with most of the groups that are going to be taxed on this thing is (the cost) will fall on the students, or at least indirectly on the students."

Athletic Director Larry Travis, who leads an already financially troubled department, said he was displeased with the fee, but viewed it as something that had to be lived with.

"I'm not too happy about having to come up with a number of dollars when we are already short budget-wise, but if they are going to charge all of the departments like ours on campus, we can't be separated out. We are going to have to do our share," Travis said.

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said in December the fee was being considered to help ease the financial burden placed on the University as a result of the 3.8-percent state budget cut proposed by then Gov.-elect Mike Hayden.

"The University has a particularly difficult problem. There simply are no funds. If the governor requires us to deposit the 3.8 percent, obviously the University is short a considerable amount of funds to do the job," Miller said.

Krause said the administration also wanted to wait until after the Board of Regents made a decision on a tuition increase for the spring semester before forging ahead with plans for the support fee.

"When the board made a decision not to pursue a tuition increase in the spring semester, it would have meant $450,000 to $500,000 for us. (The Regents' decision) just intensified the fiscal crisis," Krause said. "In the long run, there are probably some implications on (student) fees, but we are at a point of very seriously taking a look at what it takes to run an institution."

Krause said Miller was considering the measure last summer, before Gov. Hayden's budget cuts and the Regents' decision not to increase tuition for the spring semester.

political appointment. He served as deputy assistant secretary of the treasury for Donald Regan, who was then treasury secretary and is now chief of staff to Reagan.

Fitzwater first worked with the president when he became deputy press secretary to Speakes in 1982.

Through his position with Speakes, Fitzwater became acquainted with George Bush, which led him to apply for and obtain the position as press secretary for the vice president in 1985.

Fitzwater has worked for the government since he graduated, but he doesn't intend to end his career in the White House, he said in the Update article.

"I'm only 42. I have time for another career, perhaps in academia or in the private sector. I have met the Pope, the heads of state of several foreign countries, and my life has been very rewarding," he said. "But there are always new mountains to climb."

have died," he said. "In fact, that's probably what (the assailants) thought — that they'd killed him."

Primm's most serious wounds were in the neck and chest area, Deppish said.

"He had a collapsed chest when we got to him, and several defensive wounds," he said.

Deppish said he was not certain whether Primm radioed immediately for help.

"We suspect that he might have passed out one or two times. He'd lost a lot of blood at the scene."

The cab, a yellow Chevrolet station wagon marked No. 37, was found in the ditch when the ambulance arrived, Deppish said.

Primm drove for Bell Taxi intermittently for six or seven years, said his employer, Glen Puett, Ogden.

The drivers do not normally carry much cash with them, Puett said.

"Our tickets show that prior to picking up this particular fare he had run $37," Puett said.

Puett said he would not consider cab driving a dangerous profession, and his company does not provide training programs to help drivers handle such situations.

"This is the second time since 1955 I can ever remember anyone getting hurt," he said. "We did have a man shot about five or six years ago."

The man was shot twice, but lived, he said.

The stabbing has "put some fear" in some of the company's 70 drivers, Puett said.

"They think maybe we ought to put protectors between the passenger and the driver like they do in big cities," he said.

Bullet-proof glass costs about $640 per unit, he said.

Puett said he believes the stabbing was an isolated incident which may have been drug related.

"This person had to be insane to stab a man 32 times," he said.

In most cases, when a driver is robbed, the assailant will jerk the microphone cord out of the radio to prevent the driver from calling for help, Puett said.

"But they didn't jerk the one out of this one," he said. "Thank God, he was able to call in and tell us where he was at."

Puett said he was informed of the incident at his home at 9:20 that evening.

"I pray that they catch these people," he said. "It will set everybody more at ease to get those people off the street."

Colleen Campbell, assistant manager of Hardee's in Aggieville, said she thought it was unfair to imply the assailants had been in the establishment.

"As far as I know, he didn't pick them up here at Hardee's — he picked them up in the street in front of Hardee's," she said.

Stamey

1953 as an assistant professor of mathematics, said he has noted several positive areas of growth within the college during his tenure.

"The college is very much better in terms of faculty," he said. "We have a stronger research program in the sciences, humanities and social sciences. We've improved the ability of our students to be admitted to graduate programs and professional programs.

"I believe we've certainly gained more prestige in sciences, mathematics, social sciences and humanities. We were able over those years to improve the quality of what we are doing."

In addition, the success of Rhodes and Truman scholars and the development of the college's professional majors have been positive developments, he said.

Stamey said the most important gain made during his tenure was the college's increased commitment to scholarships. Such an increase has led to greater notoriety among some of the programs, he said.

The biggest disappointment for Stamey was the lack of emphasis given the arts.

"I guess I would have liked to see us develop more strongly in the arts than we have," he said. "We have improved greatly in music and theater, but our dance program is not going to be allowed to continue (offering) its major. So it's a mixed bag."

The Kansas Board of Regents decided to discontinue the undergraduate dance degree at the University after reviewing the University's Mission Role and Scope document.

One positive development for the arts was the opening of the Nichols Theatre, Stamey said. Besides reflecting on accomplishments, he said there are goals still to be attained.

"There are things left to be done," he said. "I would like to see it (the college) pay more attention to the general education of all students in the University. I would like to see us get on a sure fiscal foundation."

Stamey said the University's current financial woes contributed to his decision to retire, but only "minimally."

"It would be much more exciting if we were looking forward to expansion rather than contraction," he said. "I'm just not as charged up as I was a few years ago."

Stamey said the University's budget cuts could be "precarious" for some of the college's research programs.

Because of the budget cuts, Stamey said he is concerned that some faculty members might become disenchanted and leave the University.

"The loss of one or two faculty members may jeopardize the programs," he said. Because of the expense involved in replacing quality faculty members, Stamey said some of the positions may remain vacant.

"We run the danger of losing some excellent faculty members and not having the resources to replace them with faculty that are as good," he said.

House rejects university chiefs' pay cut, passes budget bill

From Staff and Wire reports

TOPEKA — House Republicans Wednesday fervently rejected Democratic efforts to force high-salaried state employees to share in pay cuts designed to help make Gov. Mike Hayden's 3.8 percent budget cuts more palatable.

An amendment to a bill trimming state spending, submitted by Rep. Jack Shriver, D-Arkansas City, would have cut agencies' funding to reflect a 3.8 percent reduction in the salaries of all their personnel earning $50,000 a year or more. Shriver's amendment failed, 49-75, on a largely party-line vote.

If the amendment had passed, University employees — including presidents of the six state universities — would have been forced to take a 3.8 percent cut. Before the amendment was defeated, President Jon Wefald said in a story in the Manhattan Mercury that he would be in favor of the cuts.

"For myself, I'm in support of a cut," Wefald said. "...But I don't think other staff or faculty who make $50,000 should be cut."

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, told the Collegian he would have supported the cut for himself, but not for faculty.

"I think that (would have) very serious consequences" for the University, Miller said. Adoption of the amendment would have made it difficult for the University to retain some faculty members, he said.

The rejected amendment was part of a bill passed by the House and sent to the Senate which trims state spending by $60 million this fiscal year. The measure went first to the Senate Ways and Means Committee, which was expected to waive it on to the full Senate for debate and probable passage by Thursday afternoon.

That would put the bill on Hayden's desk by Friday, meeting his request to lapse the spending authorization the first week of the 1987 session in order to meet a state revenue shortfall which precipated a financial crisis shortly after Hayden was elected in November.

"In our haste to pass this bill, some serious questions remain unanswered and some serious errors are going to be made," said Rep. Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg, House minority leader.

However, Rep. Bill Bunten, R-Topeka, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said legislators will have further chances this session to correct inequities in these budget cuts.

Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Lenexa, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, went to a caucus of Senate Democrats Wednesday to explain that the same game plan exists in the Senate as in the House for quick passage of the lapse bill. That plan dictates no amendments.

"If you want to take five hours to amend it, you can," Bogina told Democrats. "I will resist it."

However, several Democratic senators indicated they plan to offer amendments — just as minority members did in the House Wednesday.

House Republican leaders did permit adoption of one amendment, but it was sponsored by them.

That amendment, approved on voice vote, applies the 3.8 percent reduction to the special salaries received by legislative leaders as compensation for the extra work they do in their positions.

A major showdown came on a motion by Rep. Henry Helgerson, D-Wichita, to restore $1.19 million to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services' budget to avert a $5 per month reduction in cash payments the state makes to those receiving aid to dependent children and general assistance.

That amendment failed, 54-70.

Construction adds facilities to University

By SUSAN D. BAIRD

The University is undergoing a facelift.

Currently under construction, Phase 1 of the Willard Hall project and the Weber Hall project will be major additions to the University's teaching and research facilities.

Although Dondlinger Construction Co. has had some groundwater problems while working on the Willard project, Project Manager Steve Bennett said they anticipate completing Phase 1 much before the scheduled completion date of Aug. 12, 1988.

Begun in July 1986, Phase 1 has a total estimated cost of $10,343,000, said Vince Cool, associate director of facilities planning.

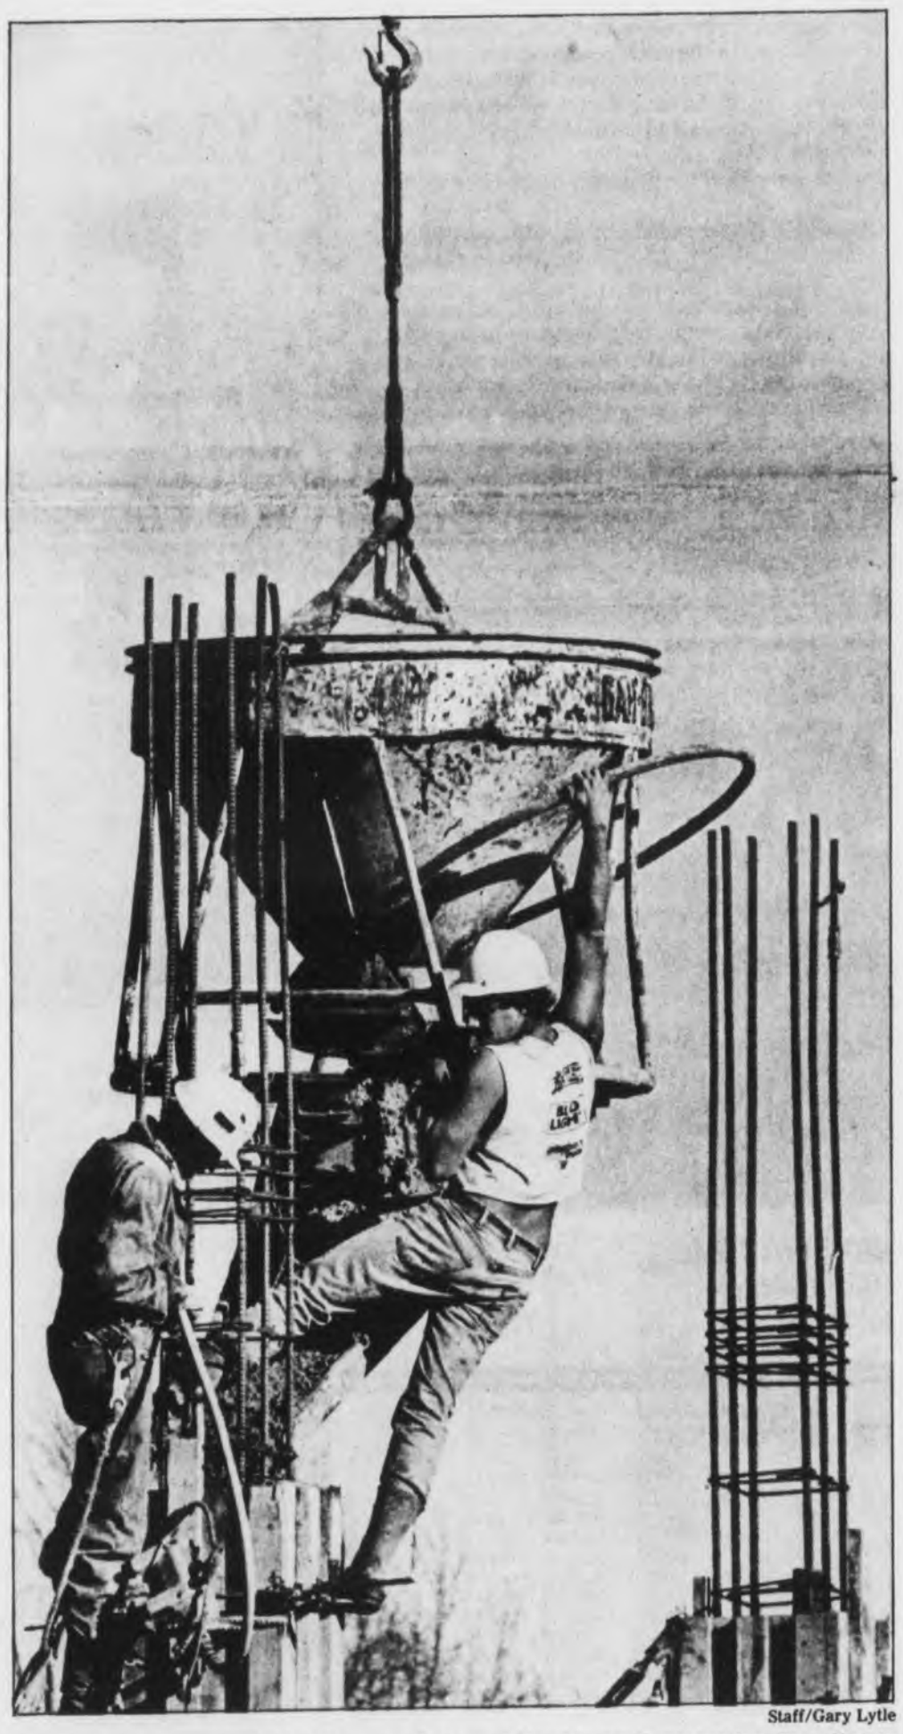
Willard's Phase 2 includes erecting a building south of Phase 1 to house a library and teaching and research facilities. Cool said the Board of Regents would probably not approve the needed $12 million for another four or five years.

Willard had become hazardous because of fumes from experiments, so building undergraduate laboratories was the highest priority with Phase 1, he said.

"Willard Hall couldn't exhaust the fumes inherent in modern chemistry teaching," Cool said. "Faculties were no longer able to effectively teach in that facility."

The new building will contain 10 chemistry and seven biochemistry offices. First and third floors will contain chemical research laboratories; fourth floor will hold biochemistry laboratories; and second floor and part of the third floor will accommodate general teaching labs.

Some biochemistry and chemistry faculty members will remain in Burt and Willard halls, respectively, but Leasure Hall will be vacated. Cool said the University has no definite plans for using the lab area in Leasure.



The original plans for Willard Phase 1 had included a new chemical storage building, but the Legislature didn't allocate enough money to pay for it, said Kenneth Klabunde, head of the Department of Chemistry.

Used for chemical storage, the current facility is "inadequate in size and safe storage," Cool said.

The architects and contractors felt it best to leave off the (chemical storage) building because it was separate from the main buildings, Klabunde said.

"There was nothing to delete (from the original project) without hampering safety," he said, but the storage area was the most

Regents reaffirm college's mission

By PAT HUND
Campus Editor

After further review of the University's mission statement, the Kansas Board of Regents accepted the University's recommendation to continue strong emphasis in the teacher education programs in the College of Education.

In other action at the December meeting, the Board dismissed two degrees from K-State: the undergraduate dance degree and the doctoral degree in English after a year-long program review of all Regents' schools.

The Board also prepared complete mission statements for all six universities in the Regents' system and the Kansas Technical Institute.

November's mission statement as prepared by staff members of the Board proposed non-emphasis in K-State's College of Education — a move that left University officials angry and puzzled.

In the revised mission statement, however, strong emphasis was placed on the educational programs at K-State, according to a statement in the mission role and scope study.

"Kansas State University will continue to support bachelor, master's and doctoral programs in education, with major emphasis in rural education, science and mathematics education, elementary education and educational administration," the statement said.

The final adoption of the mission statement by the Regents has drawn heavy support from University officials.

"We are generally satisfied with (the finalized mission statement)," said Provost Owen Koeppe.

"I think (the Regents) recognized this is the largest (teacher education) college in the state and realized it must be appropriately stressed," Koeppe said.

"I think the College of Education can live very well with the mission statement," he said.

Board abandons proposal for spring tuition increase

By ERIN EICHER
News Editor

Tuition did not rise this semester, despite an increase proposed by presidents of Regents schools in November in an effort to ease the pain of Gov. Mike Hayden's mandated budget cuts.

Presidents of the six Regents universities moved to consider advancing a 3-percent tuition increase scheduled for fall 1987 to this semester, but the idea was dropped at the December Board of Regents meeting when sufficient support was found lacking.

"The previous board meeting (in November) followed on the heels of the governor-elect's (Hayden's) request for 3.8 percent cuts," said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

Although support for the proposal was not known in November, the suggestion had to be put on the agenda at that time to "get it on the table while there was still time" to act, said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

"Whenever there is this magnitude of budget changes given on such a short time line, most institutions would look at a tuition surcharge," Krause said.

He said the short notice made the presidents of Regents institutions "start to scramble" to find ways to deal with the cuts, and a tuition increase was one possibility they considered to help soften the blow.

He estimated a tuition increase would have meant a $450,000 to $500,000 reduction in the $3.1 million that must be trimmed out of the University budget.

"Right from the very beginning, the initial budget recision instructions indicated that it would not be in keeping with the governor-elect's (Hayden's) guidelines to raise tuition," Krause said.

The tuition increase, which would have required a legislative action to change fixed university budgets, was dropped from the agenda in December with "literally no discussion as to what the impact would be," he said.

Krause said Frank Becker, Regents chairman, had taken the idea to legislative leaders and representatives of constituent universities and found "no overwhelming support" for a tuition increase.

"I didn't see anybody crawling through glass for it," Krause said.

According to Regents policy, tuition is set at 25 percent of educational costs, said Mar-

Bogus airline tickets ground travelers

By JUDY LUNDSTROM

When Subbarao Venkatesh purchased a round-trip airline ticket to India last July, he never dreamed he was about to become a victim of an international scam involving mail fraud and potential money laundering.

The scandal, a "huge problem beyond all reasonable expectations within the industry," constitutes tens of millions of dollars of losses annually for American airline companies, said a legal assistant for TWA in New York.

Venkatesh was one of several K-State students who was "ripped off" as a result of unknowingly purchasing invalid airline tickets, said Dianne Urban, student's attorney.

Venkatesh, graduate student in computer science and a native of Bangalore, India, had not been home in four years. When he decided to go, he found a travel agency in Virginia offering a round-trip ticket price of $1,010 — substantially lower than any others he had contacted.

"I got the ticket and really didn't bother to check it properly," he said.

After spending five weeks with his family, Venkatesh checked in at the TWA desk in Bangalore. A TWA official informed him the ticket had the word "free" printed on it, which rendered it invalid.

"I couldn't even get out of India," he said.

Quite a few people at the airport had the same problem, he said. TWA finally endorsed his ticket, but because it was stamped "free," no airline would accept it.

After several days, Venkatesh purchased a one-way ticket to the United States. The new ticket cost nearly 80 percent as much as the round-trip ticket.

When he complained to Galaxy Travel, the agency in Virginia that sold him the ticket, Venkatesh said he was told the agency was not responsible for the problem.

"They told me to talk to TWA," he said.

When he returned to Manhattan, Venkatesh checked his American Express receipt and discovered the money for the ticket had not gone to Galaxy Travel, but to a company in La Jolla, Calif., called The Coupon Bank.

Venkatesh said he lost more than $1,000 in the incident, in addition to arriving one week late for fall classes.

The invalid tickets stem from frequent flyer certificates, awarded by some airlines to frequent-flying customers. Instead of using them, many recipients sell their cer-

Five K-State students will test their acting talents against about 100 fellow student actors in the regional Irene Ryan Competition Jan. 21-25 at the University of Iowa, Iowa City.

Penny Cullers, senior in theater; Dan Shea, senior in radio-television; Elizabeth Sherby, junior in theater; Nancy Sloan, senior in theater; and Kelli Wondra, graduate student in speech, will represent K-State at the annual competition.

Irene Ryan, better known as Granny on "The Beverly Hillbillies," set up the competition fund to encourage young actors, said Harold Nichols, head of the Department of Speech.

Twelve regional winners, one from each region, will win a $1,000 scholarship and the chance to compete in the final competition in April at the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in

Iran, Iraq dispute military moves

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran said it recaptured 14 strategic hills from Iraqi troops in a new offensive northeast of Baghdad on Wednesday, but Iraq said it repulsed the assault and inflicted "immense losses" on the Iranians.

Iran also said it hit the Iraqi capital with a missile for the second straight day, while Iraq said its planes bombed Iranian cities for a fifth day.

Iran's pre-dawn thrust in the central sector of the 730-mile battlefront came five days after an estimated eight divisions of Iran's fanatical Revolutionary Guards pushed into southern Iraq, apparently aiming for the port city of Basra.

Fierce fighting was reported in both sectors in the 6-year-old Persian Gulf war Wednesday, and an Iranian missile exploded in Baghdad shortly after noon, the third to hit the capital in five days.

The official Iraqi News Agency said the missile hit a residential district, killing civilians and damaging houses and shops.

Iran said Iraqi dissidents reported the missile hit al-Dowra oil refinery, killing or wounding 120 people.

An Iraqi military spokesman warned that "Iraq's retaliation will be swift and destructive."

Second man charged in hotel fire

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — A Dupont Plaza Hotel busboy was charged Wednesday with helping a maintenance worker start the New Year's Eve fire that killed 96 people at the luxury hotel.

Both longtime hotel employees were in custody on arson charges as investigators of the fire indicated more arrests could follow.

"The Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms will continue to investigate this case until we're certain anyone connected with the fire has been identified and brought to justice," said Jerry Rudden, a spokesman for the agency.

Another federal investigator, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said, "We're trying to find everyone who was involved. If it was two people we want them both; if it was 10 people we want all 10."

Armando Jimenez Rivera, a 28-year-old bar busboy, was arrested Tuesday and arraigned Wednesday on a charge of arson in U.S. District Court. He was accused of helping Hector Escudero Aponte, 35, set fire to the hotel.

Former official testifies in Iran case

WASHINGTON — Former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance said Wednesday the Reagan administration's decision to secretly sell arms to Iran was an expensive blunder that cost the United States the trust of its allies.

While sources in and out of government said the State Department's chief official on Central America had worked closely with then-White House aide Oliver L. North in controlling what the administration says was private military aid for Nicaraguan rebels, Vance questioned the rationale for the arms sales.

"To be blunt, this great nation — if it is to remain worthy of global leadership — cannot again manage its foreign relations as an amateur," said Vance, leadoff witness for a series of Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on the policies behind clanestine Iran arms deal and the diversion of some proceeds to the rebels, known as Contras.

Meanwhile, The Washington Post reported in Thursday editions that North had a long-term plan for the release of U.S. hostages in Lebanon by shipping weapons to Iran. The Post reported informed sources said a document outlining the plan was dated last Jan. 24, a week after the Jan. 17 authorization by Reagan of the arms shipments, and found in North's files.

Defense office requests $25 billion

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is asking Congress for an estimated $25 billion for classified programs, much of it going for radar-evading Stealth weapons and other high-tech projects, an analysis of the proposed fiscal 1988 defense budget shows.

The estimate is based on information provided by Pentagon and congressional officials who spoke on condition of anonymity, along with analyses by the private Center for Defense Information, which often is critical of Reagan administration defense proposals, and the Defense Budget Project, which seeks to inform the public about Pentagon spending.

Their studies show that proposed spending for classified programs is rising, but the rate of increase is dropping in line with smaller increases requested in the public portions of the $312 billion defense budget.

The $25 billion sought for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1 compares with a classified budget of about $23 billion in the current fiscal year for so-called "black" programs.

Marijuana linked to Amtrak crash

WASHINGTON — Both crewmen of the Conrail locomotive that ran a stop signal and slid into the path of a speeding Amtrak passenger train were found to have marijuana in their system at the time of the accident, federal investigators said Wednesday.

One source close to the investigation said the amounts of marijuana in blood and urine samples taken from the two men within hours of the Jan. 4 accident near Baltimore were "substantial" and indicated possible chronic or recent use of the drug.

It remained uncertain, however, whether the marijuana was sufficient to have affected the performance of the engineer or brakeman at the time of the accident, said the source, who asked not to be identified.

Brownback to join Hayden cabinet

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden on Wednesday announced that he would make Sam Brownback, secretary of agriculture, an official member of his cabinet.

Hayden said he plans to issue an executive order to reorganize the cabinet by the end of next week. In the past, governors have made the secretary of agriculture an unofficial member of the cabinet.

Hayden made the announcement during a lunchtime address to the delegates to the State Board of Agriculture, which is having its annual meeting in Topeka this week.

"As governor, I want to work with the department, the board, the secretary," Hayden said.

Hayden's speech also was a strong endorsement of the current way the board operates, which former Gov. John Carlin tried to change last session.

Currently, delegates from local farm organizations elect the board, which then chooses the secretary. The board supervises agriculture programs in the state. Carlin wanted to give the governor the power to appoint the secretary and to make the board strictly advisory. However, the Senate's last session rejected an executive order to do so.

Kansas is the only state to have such a system, but Hayden said it made the secretary responsible to farmers and agricultural producers and not governors.

"Let me assure you that I'm a strong supporter of the current system of selection," Hayden said.

Union director retires after 30 years at K-State

By SUE DAWSON
Managing Editor

After 30 years of service to the K-State Union in various capacities, Director Walter Smith has announced his intention to retire.

"I decided it was time to step down and let someone else take over," he said. Smith will leave his post on May 17.

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, said plans are under way to look for a new director.

"We're in the process of getting the (search) committee together, and we expect to have it together by the end of this week," said Sutton, chairman of the committee. "There will be representation from students, people in the Union, faculty and civil service people."

Smith said he made the announcement now because "I wanted to give him (Sutton) some time to find someone else."

Two goals Smith said he would like to attain before stepping down are the completion of Phase 4 of the Union Stateroom cafeteria project and the full operation of new computers and cash registers in the Union Bookstore.

The cafeteria project involves five phases of additions and improvements to both the cafeteria and eating areas. Smith said he served an advisory role in the project, but the staff also gave input.

"We all worked together on it," he said. "I think it was something that needed to be done."

Smith began as director in 1973 but has worked in the Union in several positions, including assistant and associate director, since February 1957, about one year after the Union began operating.

Originally from Weber, Smith planned to come to K-State to pursue graduate work, but he found that all the graduate assistantships in business were filled. A position as Union accountant was open, however, and Smith decided to apply.

"I loved the place, and I've been here ever since," he said.

After working for the K-State Union for 30 years, Director Walter Smith has announced his retirement effective May 17. Smith began his career as a Union employee in 1957, one year after the building opened, and has served as director since 1973.

Smith said he believes the business aspect of Union operations was the strongest area.

Of his responsibilities as director, Smith said, "I'm in charge of basically the total operation of the Union."

The New York Times last year rated the Union as one of the top 10 student centers in the nation.

Smith attributed the success of the Union to the students and their participation as well as the hard work of the staff.

"We've had a tremendous staff working in the Union all these years," he said. "They've been delightful to work with."

Smith will remain in Manhattan with his wife, Darlene, but he said he hopes to travel at some point.

"I just want to take it easy for a while," he said.

Center plans AIDS awareness week in March

By The Collegain Staff

The Gay and Lesbian Resource Center has received a $1,400 grant from the state that will be used to educate the campus about acquired immune deficiency syndrome, said Patrick Orth, senior in interior architecture and president of GLRC.

The State Department of Health and Environment confirmed the grant during finals week of last semester, Orth said. To inform the public of the deadly disease, GLRC has made tentative plans for an AIDS awareness week sometime in March or April.

Orth said there are reasons for a week of AIDS education, rather than having the disease programs throughout the semester.

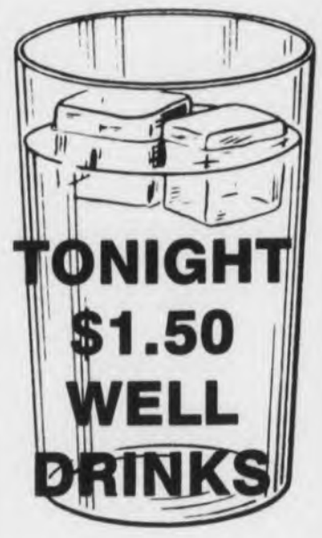
"We want sex to be an issue on this campus for one week," he said. "If we push the (AIDS) education over the semester, people will get tired of hearing about it. But if we blast it for one week, people may get the message."

Orth said they will try to make people aware of the political and social aspects of AIDS as well as the medical and psychological problems.

"AIDS is no longer the gay plague. All of society is in danger. The key to controlling the disease is changing people's sexual habits. That is what we advocate — responsible attitudes about sex."

GLRC will also work with similar organizations at the University of Kansas and Wichita State University. Those organizations also received grants, he said.

Orth said most of the money will be used to bring in speakers and sponsor open forums concerning AIDS.



Orth said he expects the presentations might be a little too much for some people.

"They (the presentations) will be blunt and to the point. Unfortunately, we may offend some people, and we may embarrass others. But this is not our intention; we are trying to educate people about a devastating disease.

"If one person begins practicing safe sex because of us, we will have accomplished something," he said.

GLRC is located in the basement of Holton Hall. More information can be obtained by calling 539-0874.

Oral Roberts reaches pathetic, all-time low

Just when viewers thought they had seen every tasteless stunt imaginable from the ranks of the "pray TV" preachers, veteran evangelist Oral Roberts has hit a new low. Roberts, who is famous for promising his viewers "Something good is going to happen to you," recently announced that something bad might happen to him.

Roberts explained to his Sunday morning viewers on Jan. 4 that God would not let him live past March unless he could raise $4.5 million. "I'm coming to you today to talk to you in a way that I've never shared with you," Roberts said just before hitting his video congregation up for donations.

This isn't the first time Roberts has used his position as a minister to benefit the Tulsa, Okla. university that bears his name. Last March, Roberts raised $3.5 million to support the medical scholarship fund at Oral Roberts University.

This time, however, Roberts has added a new twist by claiming that God has personally threatened to end his life if his followers do not come through with the cash by March.

"I'm the closest to God I've ever been, but I'm under an almost unbearable burden," he simpered. So far he has received $750,000 in pledges.

Viewers in Dallas have complained about his money-raising stunts, and the station which carries Roberts' broadcasts has warned him it will not continue to air such appeals. Asking for money is one thing, but a televised suicide threat is yet another.

Drug-induced deaths show depth of tragedy

It's no surprise to most K-State students that drugs are available on campus. A drug death, however, seems to bring to surface the reality of their destructiveness.

Buffy Larsen, a K-State freshman in psychology, died during finals week last semester from an overdose of cocaine, according to a Riley County police report.

Only a few years ago, drugs such as cocaine and other amphetamines were viewed by many as harmless recreational outlets. While occasional use sometimes turned into debilitating addiction, instant death was not considered a possible side effect.

The drug-related deaths of Len Bias, University of Maryland basketball player, and Don Rogers, of the Cleveland Browns, shed new light on the problem of the use of illegal drugs in America.

Larsen's death brings even closer to home the fact that a temporary drug-induced escape from reality may become permanent.

If you know someone who may have a drug problem or would like to know more about the effects of drugs, the following agencies are available for information and help: Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, the Counseling Center and U-LearN, all located in Holton Hall; Lafene Student Health Center and FONE Crisis Line.

Students should not hesitate to utilize these resources.

Administration gives tax burden to students

The administration on Wednesday informed directors of several University auxiliary accounts and local agencies that they would be assessed a 3-percent fee on income derived from sales and service. The cost of this measure will inevitably be passed on to the students and faculty in the form of higher prices for the goods and services affected.

Charges for the various goods and services will probably not increase this year due to set rates and prior agreements. But look out for the increases for the next fiscal year after the directors have had a chance to plan accordingly.

Those in Anderson Hall should devise better plans to keep from spending, rather than pursue measures which will benefit the administration's lot while putting the burden on the rest of the University.

The administration contends that Gov. Mike Hayden's budget cuts, and the lack of a semester tuition increase from the Board of Regents prompted the relatively sudden action, which did not give the agency directors time to plan for the cuts. The administration, however, could also say that they had these cuts dumped on them quickly, also without a chance to prepare.

The administration, however, was considering this action since the summer and seems to have found opportune circumstances under which to enact the measure.

Gov. Hayden praised the Regents for not approving a semester tuition increase, which would have meant another $450,000 to $500,000 for the administration to spend.

Hayden's praise was not brought about by the desire to help students make ends meet. The purpose of the state's budget cuts is to decrease spending, not allow state agencies to continue spending at the same or increased rates by taxing entities within.

It is time for the administration to tighten its own belt.

Denials abundant in arms sale

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

I had a very merry Christmas, thank you. In my stocking was a congressional investigation of the Reagan administration's foreign policy — something I had hoped for since last autumn when the now celebrated disinformation campaign was exposed. If you recall, as part of that affair, the Wall Street Journal unwittingly became an instrument of "national security" by printing government lies.

Then there was the Nicaraguan adventure of mercenary Eugene Hasenfus, who claimed he was working for the CIA. If that revelation proves true, then any number of laws were violated by the esteemed agency. At this point an investigation was suggested, but our own Sen. Bob Dole dismissed the idea because he thought it might embarrass the president. Whatever you say about Dole, you can't fault him for being inconsiderate of the president's feelings.

Next came the Reykjavik summit. Reagan's proposal managed to upset a lot of influential people (including various arms contractors), although we still don't know exactly what he proposed. By this time, I had written Santa three letters begging for congressional hearings.

When Congress finally announced it was setting up Watergate-style investigations, well, let's just say it was better than the Christmas when I got a new bicycle. I especially liked the implications of that word "Watergate." The more Richard Nixon, George Shultz and George Bush insisted this adventure in American democracy was not like Watergate, the more visions of presidential resignations danced through my head.

But what makes this even more exciting is that the integrity of so many administration officials has been called into question — Meese, Speakes, Regan, Shultz, Casey, North, Poindexter, even the great prevaricator himself. For example, after Reagan consistently denied trading arms for hostages, the Senate investigation panel turned up a document which stated arms were in fact traded for hostages. This document bore Reagan's signature.

Then came Larry Speakes' assertion that Reagan had met with Lt. Col. Oliver North fewer than 20 times, always in large groups. "No one-on-one meetings," Speakes said. Later, an associate of North's claimed North had personally briefed Reagan on "a fairly regular basis, often after normal White House working hours." So intense was the arguing over who was alone with whom that I had to check the listings to make sure I wasn't watching "Divorce Court."

Next, Ed Meese and Chief of Staff Don Regan testified that selling weapons to Iran became U.S. policy only after the Israeli government first shipped arms. Former national security adviser Robert McFarlane had testified earlier that the decision was initiated and authorized by Reagan from the beginning. The Israeli government supports McFarlane's testimony, although if I had to bet money, I'd say they are all lying.

Then, Ed Meese insisted "the only person in the U.S. government who knew precisely about this (the diversion of profits to the contras), the only person, was Lt. Col. North." If only North knew, then how did Ed Meese know that no one else knew, unless Meese knew? The answer, of course, is that North was not the only one who knew. CIA Deputy Director Robert Gates told the House Intelligence Committee that North had informed Casey of the "Persian diversion" in early October.

The biggest surprise, however, came after North refused to testify and then told reporters, "I don't think there is another person in America who wants to tell his story as much as I do." Reagan must have believed him though, because a day after he canned North, the president called him "a national hero."

Even Shultz has come out looking bad. After he told members of Congress the arms shipments were a complete surprise to him, Casey's testimony indicated that the shipments were no big secret and that "Shultz knew more" than he had indicated.

Not that Casey's testimony is beyond question either. As Rep. Samuel Gejdenson, D-Conn., a member of the investigating panel, said, "If Casey really knows as little as he tried to portray to the committee today, he ought to be fired for incompetence. And if he knew more, he ought to be fired because the president instructed his people to be forthcoming." The same could be said of Regan and Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger. Like Shultz, Weinberger claimed he knew nothing of the arms shipments to Iran.

And what of Reagan? Is he telling the truth? Richard Nixon has assured us that Reagan knew nothing of the contra connection. How is Nixon so sure that Reagan is coming clean? As he told a group of Republican governors, "He has told me so. I believe him." Well, if Nixon said it, then it must be so.

However, when Reagan claims he doesn't know anything, I have to believe him. After all, I couldn't count the number of times in the last six years I have argued that same point.

Do I seem to be gloating over my Christmas present? Well, maybe I am just a little, but as Molly Ivins, a columnist at the Dallas Times Herald wrote, "Listen, my momma may have raised a mean child, but she raised no hypocrites."

Pray TV ignores human factor

Campus Editor

Television has given a new meaning to "evangelism." Out of the depths of Christianity have arisen religious personalities proclaiming the Gospels via the airwaves.

When the trend toward TV evangelism first appeared, I didn't take the programs seriously. It was difficult for me to imagine anyone being "saved" by watching the "boob tube."

But being the broad-minded soul that I am, I decided to re-examine my belief and tune into the religious airwaves over the Christmas holidays.

One program I watched was "Pray TV," a movie about a seminary graduate who had to choose between an assistant minister's position at a local congregation and employment with a television evangelist.

One similarity between the positions was the interaction with people both jobs afforded. As a traditional minister, the young man would visit members of the parish. In the TV evangelism business, he would interact with other employees who were members of the evangelist's "flock."

More fundamentally, he would spread the word of God. In the first instance, he could conduct a worship service, while in the latter he could write sermons for the evangelist to read.

But when the new recruit toured the evangelist's facilities, a subtle difference between the groups' approaches materialized.

Upon joining the evangelist's flock, television viewers received a small cross (choice of silver or gold), a "THANK YOU JESUS" bumper sticker (choice of red or blue backgrounds) and a prayer wheel. If a person was upset over the death of a loved one, he could turn the wheel to find the appropriate Bible verses offering comfort.

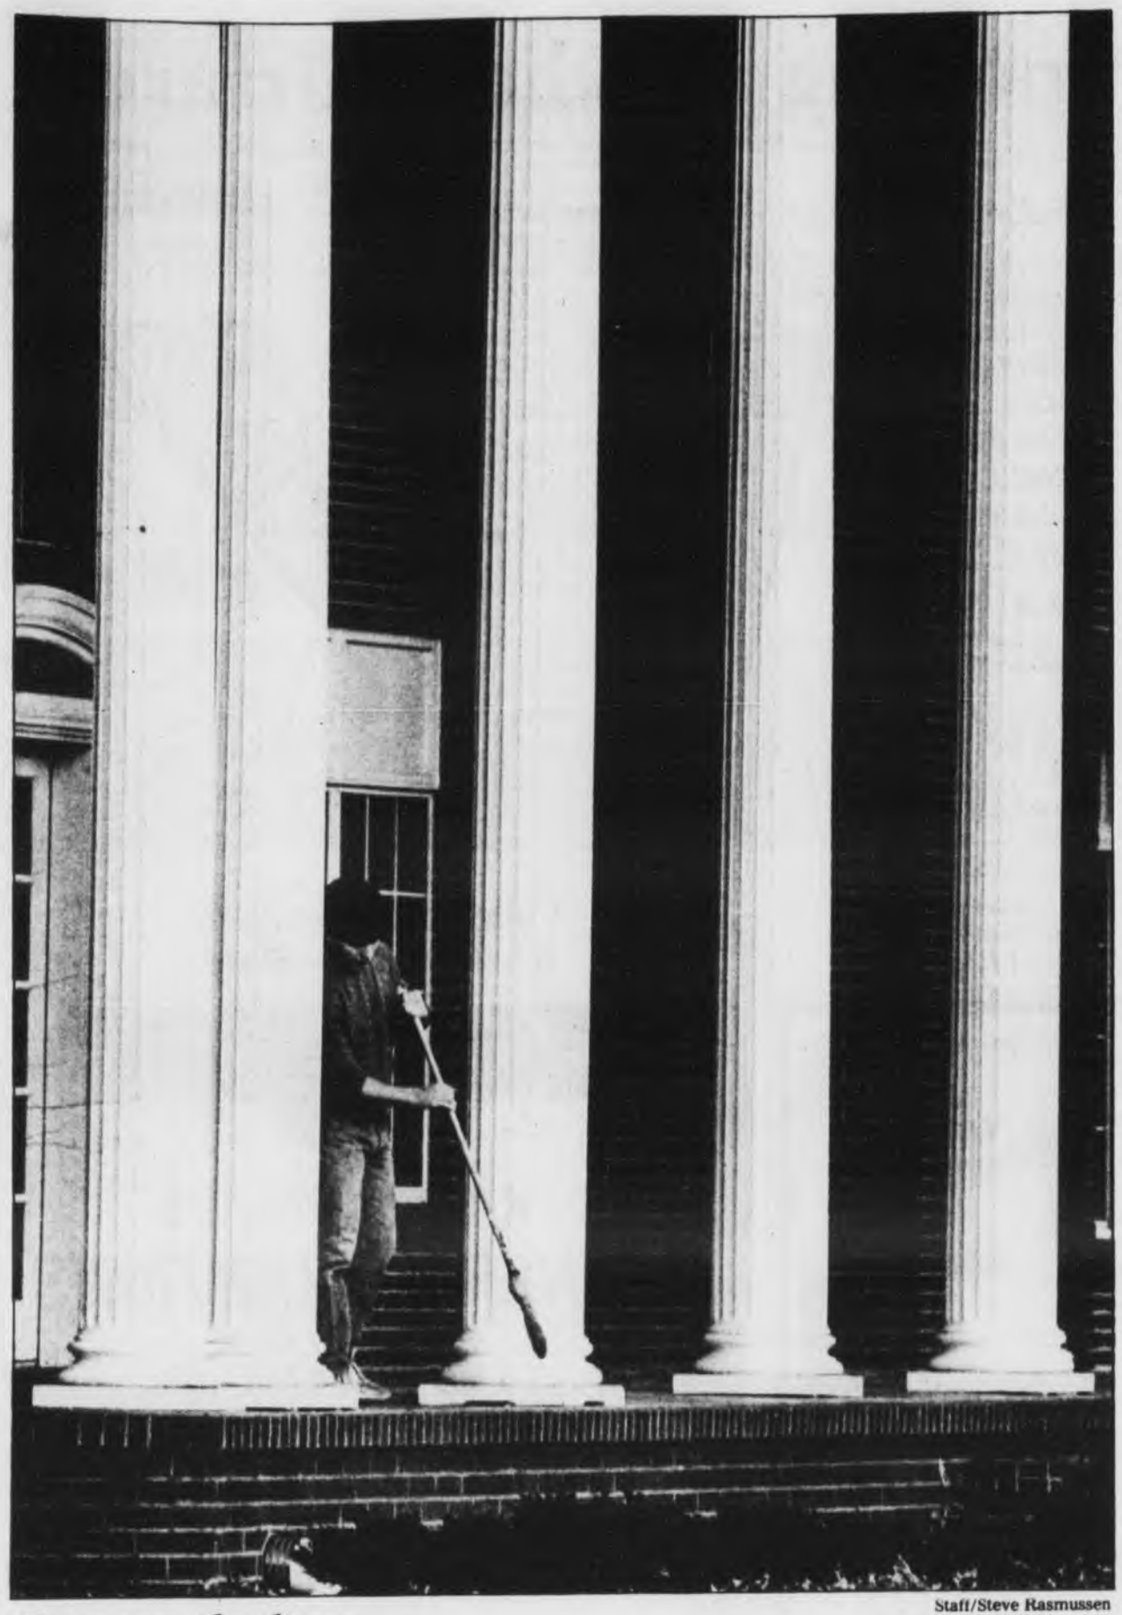
After belonging to the club for one year or donating $25, members received the evangelist's book — not "The Book" — with his "autograph" on the inside cover. Office staff used a machine to stamp his signature on the book and any "signed" letters.

Because the evangelist didn't have time for personal ministry, he filed a variety of paragraphs on the computer. When a person wrote to the evangelist about a problem, an employee could choose applicable paragraphs that, when arranged in the proper sequence, offered a solution. If the person's problem was serious, a reply would be mailed to him within 24 hours.

This detached, somewhat callous approach to missionary work challenged my understanding of the traditional way to spread Christianity. The evangelist more closely resembled a peddler of Christian wares than a preacher of the Gospel.

Success to this organization meant the amount of money pumped into the machine and the number of "souls" contacted.

Churches strive to increase membership and depend on local congregations for financial support. But success for them is measured by how supportive the "saved souls" are of the congregation and the community services provided by the church.



When overseas missionary work commences, it's more convenient for television evangelists to plant TV antennas than people. Although these television evangelists reach millions of people, how much meaningful spiritual guidance do these programs offer viewers?

The traditional mission concept emphasized direct contact with the people. Since the days of John the Baptist, flesh-and-blood missionaries have introduced millions of people to Jesus. People could discuss their problems with traveling evangelists and receive personal spiritual guidance.

Churches offer a personal Christianity not available from television. Someone writes the sermon and composes the music for a service performed in a TV studio just as a church's minister might do, but the television screen acts as a barrier, separating the congregation from the pastor.

Within a television congregation, the pastor ceases to be a shepherd because he can't tend his flock. When a person dies, media ministers can't take time off from their business to conduct the funeral service. The traditional duties of baptizing infants, performing wedding ceremonies and visiting ill parishioners no longer apply.

Television evangelists may literally "preach the Gospels to all nations," but if people don't have daily exposure to Christianity on a personal level, the meaning behind the message will be lost to them.

tificates to travel agents, who in turn resell the certificates as valid airline tickets to unsuspecting travelers. Since the frequent flyer tickets are often sold at a cheaper rate, they are attractive to travelers looking for a bargain.

Urban said the cases she is working on involve international travel. K-State students were able to fly out of the United States successfully, she said, but encountered problems once they tried to return.

"All of them had purchased round-trip tickets," she said, "but couldn't get confirmed flights home."

Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan, who is investigating the case, told Venkatesh he had "become involved inadvertently in a major scheme that TWA is currently fighting in court."

"I think the initial liability is with the travel agency in Virginia," Stephan told the Collegian. "This of course presents a problem because we can't go to Virginia."

It is "almost impossible" to resolve out-of-state problems, he said.

"We've been out of state, but it generally involves thousands of dollars," he said.

Furthermore, some states do not even have consumer protection offices or consumer protection acts and are not as inclined to help someone who lives out of state, he said.

Crossing state boundaries presents legal drawbacks for ticket fraud victims, but it appears to present an advantage for the agents who are selling the tickets.

The issue currently being debated is whether the selling of frequent flyer tickets is illegal.

"Frequent flyer tickets are promotional gifts," said TWA's legal assistant. "No one pays for them, and we don't expect payment for them, but we mean for them to be used by the person they are issued to or their immediate families."

After airlines issue frequent flyer bonuses, companies like The Coupon Bank buy the certificates and write up tickets with the buyers' names on them, she said.

A full-page ad in a recent Travel Weekly magazine boasts of first-class tickets at half-price fares. The ad says The Coupon Bank "buys and sells award coupons from frequent flyers."

Selling frequent flyer tickets is only part of the problem. Some agents will validate tickets, then sell them and keep the money, she said. In other cases, the tickets are used as a means of "laundering" money.

When entering the United States, an individual is allowed to bring in a limited amount of cash. The number of airline tickets one can carry, however, is not limited.

"People bring money into the country as tickets, then sell them to an unscrupulous travel agent," she said.

While companies like The Coupon Bank argue their actions are on the up-and-up, many, including Stephan, believe otherwise.

"There's no question that they're bogus tickets," he said. "There's absolutely no justification for their use."

Carole Harvey, special agent for the Kansas consumer protection and anti-trust division, agreed. "It involves a money wash from another country; it involves a number of other states — it's a tangled web," she said.

Selling frequent flyer tickets is a violation of the Kansas Consumer Protection Act, Stephan said.

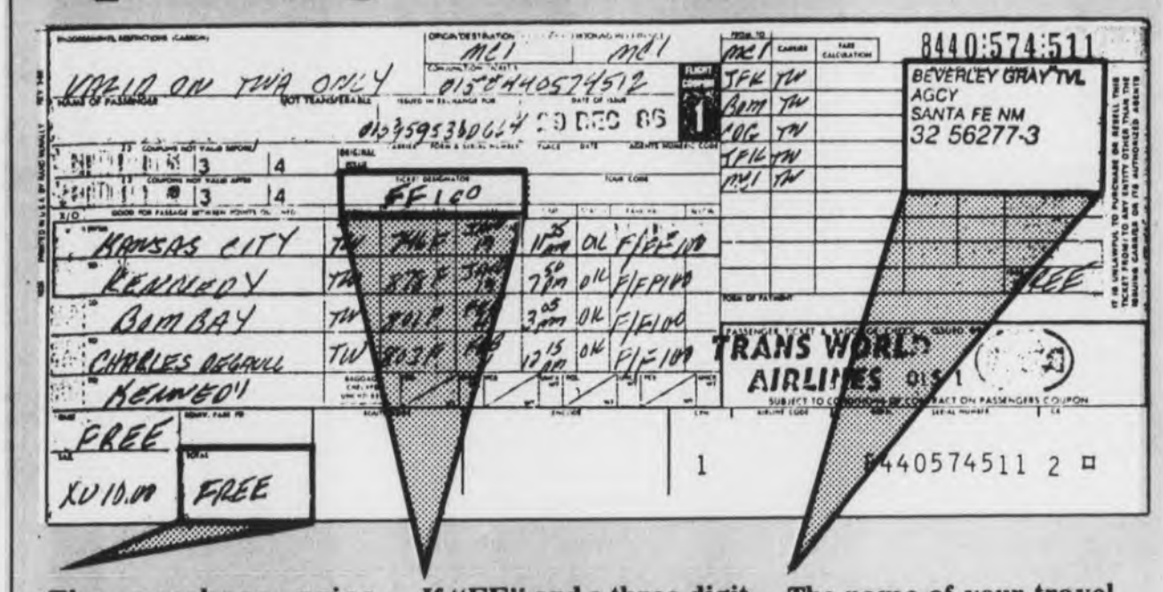
"They can't be legitimately selling tickets that can't be used," he said. "The problem is when you've got people in Kansas going to Virginia to get a ticket."

In some cases, Stephan said, he can pressure "legitimate" out-of-state companies to satisfy a consumer.

"But when you've got some scam group, you can just kiss it off many times," he said.

"It's certainly illegal in the sense that they do not have a legitimate product to sell," he said. "It's a violation of the Consumer Protection Act, it's fraud — it's a lot of things."

As fingers continue to point to frequent flyer brokers like The Coupon Bank, many airlines are trying to put a stop to the problem.



A preliminary injunction filed Oct. 15, 1986 in the U.S. District Court, Southern District of California, ordered The Coupon Bank to restrain from "issuing, selling, or causing to be issued or sold tickets for travel on TWA."

Two other major airlines have similar injunctions against The Coupon Bank, TWA's legal assistant said.

Now the airlines are waiting for a determination of the legalities of selling frequent flyer tickets.

"At this point, it's a matter of one of the attorney generals deciding that they want to push it against these people," said Jim Derr, attorney for TWA in Los Angeles. "It does violate at least three federal laws, including mail fraud."

Spotting nowhere airfares

The purchase price should be apparent — it should not have "free" in the amount area.

If "FF" and a three-digit number appears, it is most likely a frequent flyer passage.

The name of your travel agent should appear in the upper right-hand corner.

Vandross' latest album lackluster, uncreative

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

It's been quite a year for Luther Vandross. He contributed to both "The Goonies" and "Ruthless People" soundtracks, sang on "The Motown/Appollo Theatre Special," and produced an LP for Dionne Warwick as well as himself. However, by industry standards, he is still considered the most underrated rhythm and blues performer. His latest album, "Give Me the Reason," will do little to change that.

Music Review

The most notable aspect of Vandross has always been his ability not to rely heavily on orchestration, but that's not so on this album. It seems the maestro of magical melody has traded his wand for a synthesizer. Although he surrounds himself with an impressive array of background vocals (Cissy Houston, Alfa Anderson, Cheryl Lynn and Marcus Miller), the techno-pop clatter drowns most of the talent.

The title track "Give Me the Reason" and "Stop to Love" are almost indentical. Another cut, "See Me," sounds suspiciously like "The Night I Fell in Love" from his previous LP.

As usual, Vandross includes revamped or "Lutherized" (as fans call it) Bacharach and '60s standards. This time he tackles "Anyone Who Had a Heart" and ends up doing very little struggling. He cruises through the song without raising a vocal sweat. Though very easy to listen to, it doesn't even come close to his earlier renditions of "A House is Not a Home" or "Superstar." The intent is there, but unlike previous Vandross, no real passion exists.

Sometimes, when attempting to reach larger, broader audiences, black artists tend to dilute and simplify both lyric and style and often end up with lackluster results. Vocalists such as Jeffrey Osbourne, James Ingram and newcomer Freddie Jackson prove that soulful intensity doesn't have to be compromised for chart success, and this should hold equally so for Vandross.

Though he's credited for breathing life back into the careers of Aretha Franklin and Dionne Warwick, like many producers (Nile Rodgers, Jellybean Benitez and even Quincy Jones), Vandross has seemingly become myopic in terms of his own work. This album is substandard and has a lot of retread from his last one. The only real surprise is the engaging duet "There's Nothing Better than Love" with actor/singer Gregory Hines.

As far as this LP goes, there's no real stretch for Vandross, nor much new track- and vocal-wise. Even the Jacksons on their dismal "Victory" LP dropped all the studio glitz for an acoustic guitar and baby Michael's vocal "Always." Though lyrically it was a letdown, at least the Brothers Jackson tried.

Children to participate in campus music clinic

By The Collegian Staff

The Department of Music will bring 610 grade school and junior high students to campus this weekend as part of String Fling '87, a two-day clinic for string instrument students from various Kansas communities.

Warren Walker, professor of music and event coordinator, said this will be the 14th year for String Fling, which is sponsored by the Manhattan Youth Symphony Association. Students will rehearse all day Saturday and Sunday morning and give a short recital Sunday afternoon.

There will be five different orchestras with guest conductors for each one, Walker said. Students will be placed in them according to their level of study.

Guest conductors will be Elizabeth Carroll, Wichita; Gerald Kiger, Newton; David Littrell, Evansville, Ind.; Kimi Manji, Eureka, Calif. and Kansas State Orchestra director Adrian Bryttan.

Kansas State Orchestra string players helped set up the event, and will be on hand to assist with the large number of youngsters, Walker said.

"The biggest thing is tuning 92 violins in one orchestra," he said.

Rehearsals will be in McCain and the basement of Nichols Hall. The short recital will be at 1:30 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

Music to be played should pose a challenge to the young students and will include new songs as well as old favorites such as "The Candy Man," Walker said.

Besides rehearsals, String Fling organizers will have other activities, such as swimming and movies, for the students to do.

Hotline, office hours to aid senators

By TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

To improve communication between Student Senate and students, senators will maintain office hours and begin operation of a phone hot line Monday.

The Student Senate Hotline "has been designed to help retain students that we otherwise wouldn't be able to help," said Sally Traeger, senior in marketing and Senate chairwoman.

Student senators will be able to answer calls at 532-7777 from students and faculty with questions and feedback on Senate issues.

The telephone line will act as a "go-between" for students who are dissatisfied and student senators and administrators involved with retention, Traeger said.

"The phone will be providing incentives for senators in a positive and negative way," she said.

Information gathered will be organized by Senate interns and sent to Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, and William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, for evaluation.

They will direct the information to specific departments or services that can best deal with the problem, said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president of institutional advancement. When a problem arises requiring special investigation, a special committee could be assigned to study it, he said.

In addition to using the hot line, students can visit the Student Government Services Office to talk to student senators. In this way, students can talk to student senators from different colleges and obtain a variety of views.

A student senator will be in the SGS office from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday. Each student senator and member of the Senate Executive Committee will be required to answer the telephone at least one hour per week.

Information about the office hours of the colleges' student senators will be posted on campus and will be distributed at residence halls, greek houses and the deans' offices, Traeger said. Office hours should be available after student senators' course schedules have been made final.

Students who call will be asked to give their age, class status, living district and college.

Quit smoking.

Lady Cats deal Nebraska first Big Eight loss

5 players hit double figures as K-State seizes 12-3 mark

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

By defeating Nebraska 81-76 Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House, K-State's women's basketball team extended its home-court winning streak to nine games and evened its Big Eight Conference record at 1-1.

K-State's home-court winning streak dates back to the last two games of last season.

Sue Leiding scored 20 points and four other Lady Cats hit in double figures to pace K-State to the five-point win against the Lady Cornhuskers in a game extended by 49 foul calls.

"Our kids' defense was very good tonight," Lady Cat Coach Matilda Mossman said. "The key, of course, was stopping Maurtice Ivy. It's a shame that Ivy and Susan Green got into foul trouble early because it would have been a better game with both of them playing at full strength."

K-State's Green fouled out of the contest with 1:43 remaining and only tallied two points. Nebraska's Ivy, a preseason All-American, fouled out with 8:11 left in the game after registering 12 points. A total of four players fouled out of the contest.

The Lady Cats, 12-3 overall, are off to their best start since the 1983-84 campaign when K-State had an identical 12-3 record after 15 games. That team, coached by Lynn Hickey, finished the season with a second-place finish in the Big Eight Conference Tournament and sported a 25-7 overall record.

That season, K-State also advanced to to the final sixteen in the NCAA Tournament.

Against Nebraska, the Lady Cats drew first blood with less than a minute expired. By halftime, K-State had built a 39-30 lead.

Leiding had 12 of her game-high 20 points at the intermission. The 6-foot-2 senior center from Tulsa hit four-of-six attempts from the field and sunk a perfect four-of-four from the free throw line.

Less than half way through the second half, Nebraska closed to within three points but faltered, allowing K-State to build a 14-point lead with less than seven minutes left.

Nebraska fought back with some powerful free throw shooting as the 'Huskers hit 20-of-25 from the free throw line and tied the game at 69-69 with 2:19 left. The Lady Cats, not wanting to be outdone, then put on a free-throw clinic of their own and nailed 8-of-10 from the charity stripe and sealed the narrow victory.

"They definitely got back in the game at the free throw line," Mossman said. "If we had not put them at the free throw line so many times in the second half, I don't think it would have ever got that close.

"Nebraska got a lot of their points with no time running off the clock and that's what really hurt us tonight."

Five players scored in double figures for the Lady Cats. Leiding led the the team in scoring and hit six-of-eight from the field and 8-of-11 free throws for 20 points. Carlisa Thomas added 17 points, Tracey Bleczinski scored 15, Theza Fitzpatrick was good for 13 points and Elyse Funk chipped in 10.

As a team the Lady Cats shot 49.2 percent from the field — 30-of-61 from the floor — and hit 21-of-32 from the free throw line for 65.7 percent.

Top scorers for Nebraska were Amy Stephens with 20 points, followed by Stacy Imming and Angie Miller, each with 15 points. As a team Nebraska shot 46 percent from the field, hitting on 28-of-61 attempts.

Thomas, who led the team in every statistical category except scoring, paced the Lady Cats with 13 rebounds, while Bleczinski had six rebounds and Leiding was credited with four boards.

Thomas also led the team in assists with seven for the evening. She was closely followed by Fitzpatrick with six. Thomas also had three of K-State's seven steals.

K-State turned over the ball 16 times compared with Nebraska's 22 turnovers.

The Lady Cats will wrap-up a four-game home series Saturday against Iowa State in a doubleheader with the men's team. The game will start approximately one-half hour after the men's game.

Iowa State is 10-5 overall with a 0-2 conference record. The Lady Cyclones lost last night at home to Colorado 72-71.

"They have played very well and lost some close games and I think losing to Colorado at home has got to dampen their spirits a little bit," Mossman said. "They are a team that's trying to get their confidence back and trying to get something going and we just can't let them do that."

K-State forward Sue Leiding shoots the ball over Nebraska center Angie Miller (10) and forward Maurtice Ivy (30) during the first half of the Big Eight Conference game Wednesday in Ahearn Field House. Led by Leiding's 20 points, the Lady Cats won 81-76.

Pennsylvania offering attracts Steve Miller

By The Collegian Staff

Associate Athletic Director Steve Miller has resigned effective March 1 to become executive director of the Pennsylvania Special Olympics headquartered in Norristown.

In his new position, Miller will be the chief administrator and fund-raiser for the state's Special Oympics program, which conducts 600 events on an annual basis and involves approximately 20,000 athletes and 30,000 volunteers.

"We are very, very thrilled to have Steve Miller join our organization," said Ginny Kirkwood, chairman to the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Special Olympics program.

Miller, former K-State track and cross country coach before resigning to accept an administrative position, was earlier named as the head coach for the United States' men's team, which will compete in the 1987 World Indoor Track Championships.

"If it is possible to be happy and sad at the same time, then that's the way I feel," Miller said.

Athletic Director Larry Travis said Miller's appointment indicates the quality of employees within the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"Steve has done a great job in his coaching and administrative capacities," Travis said.

"It is always sad to see someone of his caliber leave, but...I am pleased that other organizations are recognizing the quality people we have in our department."

Travis said a search will begin immediately for Miller's replacement.

'Cat football coaches sign juco recruits

Parrish lures 'No. 1 rated quarterback'

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Head football coach Stan Parrish and his staff have been busy recruiting and signing athletes for the 1987 football campaign. According to Parrish, the early-signing period has been a successful one for the Wildcats.

Since the first day of the signing period in early December, 12 athletes have signed with the 'Cats. All the players who have signed are junior college transfers, with no high school players committing as of yet.

"The signings (so far) are part of a movement to increase our size on the team both offensively and defensively," Parrish said.

The most noticeable change will be seen on the offensive side. K-State has signed Gary Swim, a 6-foot-3, 195-pound quarterback out of Snow Community College in Ephraim, Utah; Leatrice Pickett, a 6-1, 225-pound running back from Northwest Mississippi Junior College and Darrell Wyatt, a 5-8, 160-pound wide receiver from Trinity Valley (Texas) Junior College.

K-State managed to lure Swim, who Parrish said was "our No. 1 rated quarterback all along." Swim was also recruited heavily by Illinois, Mississippi State and Kentucky.

"(Swim) is our biggest high-profile player which we have been able to sign at this point in our program," Parrish said.

This past season, Swim completed 146-of-243 passes for 1,601 yards and 11 touchdowns before suffering a broken collarbone in the team's eighth game. Despite the injury, he still finished eighth in the nation among junior college quarterbacks in passing yardage and eighth nationally in total offense, with just less than 300 yards a contest.

Snow finished first nationally among junior college teams in passing offense with an average of 282.3 yards a game.

Swim comes from the same junior college which produced former Big Eight Conference quarterbacks David Archer, who played at Iowa State, and Kansas' Mike Norseth.

The 'Cat coaches, looking to beef up their offensive line, have signed Mike Collins, a 6-5, 265-pound offensive lineman from Dixie (Utah) Junior College; Russ Stange, a 6-6 260-pound offensive guard from Fullerton (Calif.) Junior College; Alan Schwartz, a 6-5, 245-pound offensive guard from Garden City Community College and Paul Yniguez, a 6-3, 260-pound offensive lineman from Fullerton.

On the defensive side of the line three players have signed and one has made a verbal commitment to join the squad.

Those players are Mike Kniens, a 6-3, 225-pound linebacker from Orange Coast (Calif.) Junior College; Brandon Wackerly, a 6-4, 255-pound defensive tackle from Northeastern Oklahoma A&M and Emmett Bradford, a 5-11, 180-pound defensive back from Ranger (Texas) Community College. Verbally commiting is Alan Smith, a 6-4, 210-pound defensive lineman from Wichita State, which has dropped its football program.

K-State also acquired special teams player Ken Olson, a 6-3, 195-pound punter from American River Community College in Sacramento, Calif. Olson averaged 45.4 yards a punt his freshman season at American River which ranked him among the top five junior college punters in the nation.

He will compete for the No. 1 punting spot on the Wildcat roster, which was vacated after the graduation of two-year starter Troy Faunce.

Parrish said his staff will continue to recruit heavily through the remainder of the signing period, but as of yet have not announced who they are looking at. As for those who have signed, Parrish said he is quite pleased.

"We are very excited to have signed these athletes (early in the signing period)," he said.

New Chiefs' coach hires assistants

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — John Paul Young was named defensive coordinator and three other coaches were hired Wednesday by new Kansas City Coach Frank Gansz.

Young succeeds Walt Corey, who resigned after 20 years with Kansas City to take the position as defensive coordinator with the Buffalo Bills. Corey was passed over for the head coaching job by Gansz, who was named Saturday after John Mackovic was fired Thursday.

Gansz named former Chiefs player Ed Beckman to coach the special teams, Billie Mathews to coach the backfield and Don Lawrence to coach the defensive line.

Young, 47, coached the line this past season. He formerly was defensive coordinator at New Orleans and Oklahoma State and Texas A&M.

Beckman, 32, was special teams captain when Gansz coached the unit in 1981 and 1982. Lawrence, 49, was defensive line coach the last two seasons at Tampa Bay and was a member of Marv Levy's staff in Kansas City in 1980-82. Mathews, 56, was offensive coordinator the last two seasons with the Indianapolis Colts.

"I want Chiefs," Gansz said. "That's important to me. I want people who understand the city, the program and me. John Paul, for instance, is the ideal guy. He's a Chief. He's been through the situation."

Corey, who had been with Kansas City for 20 years as a player and a coach, said Kansas City General Manager Jim Schaaf did not meet his demands.

"The terms of the contract with Kansas City were not as good as the terms of the contract with Buffalo," Corey said. "What I was asking for I knew they probably wouldn't accept. But because there were a lot of pieces to pick up, regrouping of the players and all, I thought it would be only fair to be justly rewarded if that was how they felt about me."

Gansz was the coach of the special teams during the past season, the unit given much of the credit for the Chiefs success. He had resigned Wednesday to seek a job as an offensive coordinator. Some Chiefs players had met Thursday with Hunt and other Chiefs officials to urge them to bring back Gansz.

The Kansas City defense had also played a key role in the Chiefs success this past season, and players said at the meeting Thursday that they were worried that Corey would take the Buffalo job.

The Kansas City defense ranked eighth in the NFL last season in yardage allowed. The Chiefs gave up 4,934 yards, the fewest allowed since 1974.

"You have to anticipate with a guy considering another place that he'll leave," Gansz said.

Saberhagen working in offseason to return to award-winning form

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — If a whirlwind offseason was responsible for the downfall of Bret Saberhagen last year, it won't happen again.

After winning the Cy Young award in 1985 with a 20-6 record and a 2.87 earned run average, Saberhagen plunged to 7-12 and a 4.15 ERA last year.

"I must have made 25 to 30 appearances last year," Saberhagen said. "I flew to New York, I think, four times. It was incredible.

"The glory and the fame, I've never had before. It just seemed like the thing to do. I didn't know any better. I didn't have a chance to rest, and I didn't know it was wearing me out, but it was."

Saberhagen refuses to blame the busy offseason for his bad year last year. He felt tightness in his shoulder and also had a foot injury, eventually spending 19 days on the disabled list.

"That's all I've been thinking about and I still don't have any injuries," Saberhagen said. "If I could figure out what I did wrong, I'd do something about it. It's tough to pinpoint.

"The big thing was the injuries, that didn't help, that's for sure. I did so many different things, it's hard to say what went wrong. Maybe it was my vigorous schedule, running around, maybe that had something to do with it.

"I'm asking myself all of those questions. Did I try to throw too hard, too quick? Was I throwing too many curveballs and sliders instead of challenging hitters. Who knows? I just know I was expecting to win at least 20 last year, and I was very, very upset at the year I had."

Saberhagen has been working this offseason, running two miles a day and performing a regimen of situps and other exercises. He plans to go to Los Angeles Jan. 20 to begin throwing outdoors.

"I want to start my spring training a little early," he said. "I'm going to be prepared when spring training starts this time."

The Royals believe Saberhagen learned a lesson and will return to 1985 form this coming season.

Progress

feasible part of the project to eliminate.

Known as the "dungeon," the lower-level building protruding from the east side of Willard lacks good air movement and temperature control needed to store chemicals properly, Klabunde said.

In the event that there would be an event such as a fire, it would be extremely hazardous for firefighters because the flammable chemicals could emit toxic gases, Cool said.

"It's a bad situation, but we've done the best we can to avoid danger to personnel," Klabunde said. "It's a touchy situation, because we try to keep things as safe as we can."

University officials and the Board of Regents have presented a proposal to the Legislature requesting an additional $250,000 to erect a one-story chemical storage building east of King Hall, Klabunde said. But he said he doesn't know what progress the proposal has made.

While hazardous conditions were the main problem with Willard, a delayed schedule and outmoded facilities constituted major problems in Weber.

Even though work on the new addition to Weber is three months behind schedule, they want to finish by the completion date of Aug. 1, said Tony Zimbelman, president of Simpson and Son Construction Co.

Last January, the Wichita firm began remodeling the inside of Weber and building an addition east of the hall.

The lower floor of the 15,000-square foot addition will contain refrigerator space, while the second floor will contain laboratory space. A 6-foot space between the floors will contain refrigeration and cooling equipment for use by service personnel.

Finishing the $7.2 million project before the beginning of classes next fall is important because instructors will use the meats laboratory portion of the new building to teach the meats courses, said Don Good, head of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

In addition, the laboratories are important research facilities, he said. K-State has the only facilities in Kansas used to train people in meat processing and conduct research on meats.

"We're kind of out of business until we get back there (to Weber)," Good said.

Because of the construction, the animal sciences and industry department temporarily canceled courses taught in Weber and moved employees to other buildings.

Faculty offered accelerated meats courses through March 1986 before vacating the building, Good said. Next fall they will begin offering the courses so students unable to take the courses before last spring can enroll.

Tuition

vin Burris, assistant director for budgets in the Office of the Kansas Board of Regents in Topeka.

"What that means is that's applied on a systemwide basis. Out of $1 of budget expenditures, 75 cents would come from the state and 25 cents from student's tuition payments," Burris said.

This policy would have been taken into account in the Regents consideration of a tuition increase, he said, because "at the same time you would have been increasing tuition, you would be decreasing the state-funded budget" and throwing off the traditional balance of payment maintained between state and student.

However, Burris said the Regents were considering the increase as a "direct response to the 3.8 percent fund reduction. In that case, they probably would have waived consideration of the policy."

Mission

David Byrne, dean of the College of Education, said although the original version proposed by Regents' staff members did not state that some programs would not exist, the final mission statement gave strong support for continued teaching education programs at K-State.

Byrne said the proposed version drafted by Stanley Koplik, executive director of the Regents, originally identified K-State as a traditional land-grant university, which would not include strong emphasis on teacher education programs.

Byrne said two factors contributed to the addition of the College of Education to the mission statement: the firm support of University President Jon Wefald and the proven track record of the college.

"President Wefald took vigorous exception to (the version proposed at the November meeting). He told the Regents that the role and scope statement that did not include (the College of Education) was unacceptable," Byrne said.

Byrne said "the undeniable record of productivity of the faculty and students in this college," was the other key factor that spurred the revision in the mission statement.

"In my mind, (the College of Education) is the most productive college of education in the Regents' system."

Michael Holen, associate dean of the college, listed several key factors that confirm the productivity within the college.

K-State has the largest teacher education program in the state at all three levels — undergraduate, graduate and doctoral, he said.

"We are very clearly predominant in numbers (of students) of all colleges of education in Kansas," Holen said.

Holen also said the college averages more than $1 million a year for external research and development programs.

In addition, he said the college has taught off-campus course work to 30,000 Kansans during an 8-year period.

Byrne said the issue was more important than just the College of Education because students within the college still take many classes in the other colleges on campus.

The action taken by the Regents to emphasize the College of Education's importance at K-State and in the Regents' system will bring continued success to the college, he said.

"This college is in a strong position to hold the leadership in the state," Byrne said.

Koeppe said he was disappointed that the doctoral program in English will be discontinued, although he said the dance program may continue as part of a broader curriculum within the college.

Nominees

Washington, D.C. The two national winners will receive $2,500 scholarships.

The students were selected by an eight-member regional screening team, which includes Nichols and professors from other universities within the region. The team traveled the region viewing productions entered in the festival and had the option to select up to two actors from each production for the competition, Nichols said.

"The sponsoring school then has the option to nominate a third person," he said.

Four plays will also be selected from the region, which consists of schools from Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Iowa.

K-State's performance of Rogers and Hammerstein's "OKLAHOMA!" and Marsha Norman's "'night, Mother" are full entries in the competition, and students from these plays were selected by the screening team.

Shea and Sherby were nominated for their performances in "OKLAHOMA!" They portrayed the characters of Will Parker and Ado Annie.

Cullers was nominated for her character portrayal of Mamma in "'night, Mother," the story of a young woman's battle with the thought of suicide.

"The Constant Wife," by Somerset Maugham, is not a full entry in the competition, so students from this play were selected through auditions before speech department faculty. Sloan and Wondra were nominated from "The Constant Wife."

Each student performs a six-minute audition at the competition, including two different scenes. One scene must be with a partner and the other may be a solo performance or song, Nichols said. Nominees are allowed to select their own material for competition.

K-State has done "very, very well" in past competitions, Nichols said.

Carrying on the Spirit at Kansas State University

The second national observance of Martin Luther King, Jr., Day is Monday, January 19. In the week Monday, January 19, through Sunday, January 25, Kansas State University will observe its second Celebration Week saluting the spirit of the late civil rights leader. No other holiday serves as a focal point for encouraging improved race relations. This celebration can help unify America in the spirit of Dr. King's dream.

The appearance of Eleanor Holmes Norton, chair of the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission from 1977 to 1981 and now a professor of law at Georgetown University, at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium will be a highlight of K-State's Martin Luther King Week—a time of celebration, thanksgiving, and renewal for all of us. We encourage your attendance at Dr. Norton's address and your participation in the events being arranged throughout the University community.

A very special part and keynote of this very special week will be an ecumenical religious observance Monday from noon to 1 p.m. in All Faiths Chapel.

We urge you to participate in . . .

- A week to celebrate the life and dream of Martin Luther King, Jr.
- A week to reaffirm the American ideals of freedom, justice, and opportunity for all.
- A week for love, not hate—for understanding, not anger—for peace, not war.
- A week for the family: to share together, to reach out to relatives and friends, and to mend broken relationships.
- A week when people of all races, religions, classes, and stations in life put aside their differences and join in a spirit of togetherness.
- A week for our nation to pay tribute to Martin Luther King, Jr., who awakened in us the best qualities of the American spirit.
- A week for nations of the world to cease all violent actions, seek non-violent solutions, and demonstrate that peace is not just a dream, but a real possibility.
- If for only a brief time, each of us serves as a drum major for justice and peace, then we will bring life to the inspiring vision of freedom which Martin Luther King "dreamed."

Millions of Americans just watched the 1987 Tournament of Roses Parade on television, but one K-State trumpet player participated in the parade.

Timothy Baggerly, senior in music education, was chosen as one of 108 college trumpet players from across the nation who marched in the United Way parade presentation and who will also serve as "Musical Ambassadors" this year in honor of the United Way's centennial.

"It was the longest parade I have ever marched in," Baggerly said of the 6½ mile parade route. "I have never done anything like that before, and I never will again."

The 700-foot-long presentation was the largest in the 98th Rose Parade. Spanning 3½ blocks, the combination included 18 international mini-floats depicting architectural and cultural symbols from nations around the world, 175 precision flag and banner carriers and 232 marching college musicians. A floral replica of a globe mounted on top of a gigantic rainbow of flowers concluded the series.

The United Ways' participation in the parade was designed to celebrate 100 years of volunteer service and promote

House discusses death penalty bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After receiving Gov. Mike Hayden's blessing, a bill was introduced Thursday in the Kansas House that would make death by lethal injection a possible sentence for anyone convicted of first-degree murder in the state.

The bill has the best chances to become law of any capital punishment measure introduced in the Legislature during the last decade. Death penalty proposals have gotten as far as the governor's desk four times since 1978 only to be vetoed by former Gov. John Carlin.

However, Rep. Clyde Graeber, R-Leavenworth, a primary sponsor of this year's capital punishment bill, said the measure was introduced only after Hayden was given an opportunity to read it and approve its provisions. Graeber said Hayden approved the measure after he and his legal counsel, John D. Petersen, suggested minor technical changes.

Graber said after the bill was introduced that he has 65 House lawmakers committed to voting for the measure, two more than the 63 necessary for a piece of legislation to gain passage in the 125-member chamber.

The bill carried the names of 44 representatives as co-sponsors — 34 Republicans and 10 Democrats. It was assigned to the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, which is scheduled to begin hearings early next week.

The chairman of the committee, Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, said the panel will hear from death penalty supporters Tuesday and from opponents Wednesday. Miller said he hopes to put the bill to a committee vote next Thursday to send it on to the House floor.

House Speaker Jim Braden said he doubts there will be much delay before the proposal is brought up for debate and a vote on the House floor. Hayden has said he wants the bill to clear both houses of the Legislature by March or early April.

The proposal would end a 15-year era when life imprisonment was the strongest sentence available even for those convicted of the most heinous killings. Kansas carried out executions by hanging until a 1973 U.S. Supreme Court ruling struck it down with the capital punishment laws of all other states.

Since the Supreme Court reinstituted the death penalty in 1976, 37 states have put capital punishment back on the books.

Virtually identical to a death penalty bill the House passed on a vote of 80-45 last year, the measure requires two separate trials in first-degree murder cases.

The first trial would determine the guilt or innocence of a defendant, and if a person is found guilty, the second trial would determine whether the sentence should be the death penalty or life imprisonment. A death sentence would require a unanimous vote of the jury.

Before finding that a defendant should be put to death, a jury would have to determine that at least one of seven "aggravating circumstances" was established beyond a reasonable doubt. The jury also would consider whether a defendant met criteria of one of seven "mitigating circumstances."

The aggravating circumstances include situations in which the defendant:

— Was previously convicted of first-degree murder.

— Knowingly risked the lives of more than one person.

— Committed murder during a robbery or arson.

— Was hired to perform a contract killing.

— Killed to prevent an arrest or as part of an escape from custody.

— Committed a murder in an especially heinous or cruel manner.

— Murdered someone while serving a sentence for a felony conviction.

The jury would have to find the aggravating circumstances outweighed any of the mitigating circumstances. The trial judge could set aside the jury's decision and any death sentence would be subject to automatic review by the Kansas Supreme Court.

Other provisions in the bill prohibit the death penalty from being imposed upon anyone who was younger than 18 years old at the time a murder is committed.

The bill also would ban imposing the death sentence upon any pregnant female until after the baby is born or the pregnancy is otherwise terminated.

The Board of Indigents Defense Services has estimated the state's cost of providing public defenders will jump by $2.6 annually as a result of enactment of such a death penalty measure.

However, Hayden says he believes the figures are too high and has directed the Department of Corrections to develop its own figures on the cost of capital punishment.

Task force under pressure to conclude athletic fee proposal

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

The Athletic Fee Task Force is nearing the end of its mission.

And it may not be totally by choice.

"There are people that have said if we don't come up with a bill before election time, (a few senators) are going to go ahead and sponsor a bill in Senate proposing a referendum," said Doug Folk, task force chairman and junior in electrical engineering, who spoke to task force members Thursday night.

"I don't want this to affect what we do in here," Folk said. "On one hand, I don't want that to force us into rushing things, but on the other hand, we had talked about trying to wrap this up in the next couple of weeks."

Folk said he thought it would "be a shame" if Senate proposed a bill, and "we weren't ready for it."

The week of Jan. 26, he said, the task force should have "some sort of proposal to take to Senate floor." The bill would then be introduced for first reading in Senate Jan. 29, he said.

If plans go accordingly, he said, the bill would be voted on in a student referendum during Senate elections Feb. 11.

Folk said when the bill is proposed, "it would be best" if it were sponsored by individuals, not by the entire task force.

"There's obviously not going to be a concensus among the task force," he said.

As a means of informing students about the information gathered, the group decided to publish a fact sheet revealing its findings.

One point the task force failed to agree on was the issue of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics budget. Before the 1985-86 budget was audited, Mike Jones, athletic department business manager, reported an estimated deficit of $600,000.

"After the auditors looked at it, there was a $400,000 deficit," said Bill Majerus, task force member and graduate student in agronomy.

Majerus has been researching the budgets in detail for the past few months.

"The Senate is going to drill you on that budget," Majerus told task force members.

"We can't just say the athletic department had a $400,000 deficit and leave it at that," said Kirk Caraway, task force member and senior in political science and philosophy.

Majerus said there were more areas of the budget he would like to research.

"I don't think we can do a whole lot about it now," said Steve Ligon, task force member and senior in animal science and industry. He said he thought the task force had done its job.

"This issue has been publicized enough — if it passes, it won't be because of ignorance," he said.

When it comes down to it, Ligon said, students will consider the athletic fee a loyalty issue.

"It isn't going to be cut and dried in any way," he said. "It's going to be how much people want to vest their money in this. If they don't want it, then they don't want it."

Roger Haymaker, junior in business administration, said he thought some confusion existed as to the purpose of the athletic fee.

"We're not trying to get rid of the debt — we're trying to increase the budget so we can improve our pro-

Week's activities to honor civil rights leader

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

A week of events dedicated to the memory of Martin Luther King Jr. will be highlighted with a University convocation Wednesday by Eleanor Holmes Norton, former chairwoman of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Norton, a professor of law at Georgetown University, will speak at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium as part of events beginning Monday to commemorate the birthday of the civil rights leader, who was assassinated in 1968.

A graduate of Yale Law School and the recipient of 22 honorary degrees, Norton was the first woman to head both the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the New York City Commission on Human Rights.

As EEOC chairwoman, Norton has been credited for administering Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Equal Pay Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and Section 501 of the Rehabilitation Act covering handicapped individuals.

Monday, a religious observance recognizing the life and contributions of King will begin at noon in All Faith's Chapel.

At 7 p.m., a memorial candlelight walk, beginning at Waters Hall and ending at the All Faiths Chapel, will be led by members of the Black Student Union and other black student organizations. The evening memorial service following the walk will feature guest speakers President Jon Wefald and Hakin Salahu-Din, assistant director of admissions.

Tuesday's events include a noon forum, "Martin Luther King and Education for Non-Violence," sponsored by the College of Education in Bluemont Hall 016. A reception hosted by the College of Engineering in the Union Cottonwood Room precedes a 7:30 forum, "Equity in the Design Profession," sponsored by the College of Architecture and Design in the Union Big Eight Room.

Thursday the movie, "Ghandi" will be shown free in the Union at 6:30 p.m. "Martin Luther King Jr.: From Montgomery to Memphis" will be shown on Friday in Farrell Library, 502B.

The week of events will end with a potluck dinner on Sunday at the International Student Center, sponsored by the K-State Committee on Religion and other campus religious groups. Assistant to the President Charles Reagan will speak on "The Role of Religion on Campus."

David Stewart, chairman of the committee sponsoring Monday's religious observance, said the program in All Faith's Chapel will focus partly on who King was as a person.

Topeka march marks King's birthday

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Hundreds of school children and scores of state officials crowded the ground floor of the Capitol rotunda Thursday to observe the 58th anniverary of the birth of the late Martin Luther King Jr.

About 500 spectators watched and listened to sung and spoken tributes to the civil rights leader, who was shot to death in 1968. Some gathered around the railing on the second floor to watch the ceremony. The ceremony began with a march from the Judicial Center, across the street south of the Capitol.

Gov. Mike Hayden led the march, and the crowd included many legislators and officials, including Treasurer Joan Finney, Secretary of State Bill Graves and Attorney

Early figures forecast stabilizing enrollment

By The Collegian Staff

Preliminary enrollment figures show the number of students at K-State is stabilizing, said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

Completion of spring registration Tuesday showed enrollment of 13,465 students, compared with 13,529 last year, a decrease of less than 0.5 percent.

Since 1982, preliminary figures for the spring semester have amounted to about 94 percent of those in the fall, Krause said. He said he was worried the negative impact of current budget cuts would lower enrollment numbers but the numbers concurred with the trend.

"Historically, we expect to be at 94 percent, and we're right on target," he said. "I'm really pleased with it."

Now in progress is enrollment for evening and off-campus classes, which, along with late enrollment, is expected to raise figures between 4,000 and 5,000.

Last fall, 17,687 students attended K-State. Krause said he expects enrollment to be approximately 18,000 this semester after final counts are obtained next month. Final enrollment last spring was 18,185.

Pittsburg State University showed a 2.6 percent increase, to 4,753 students, Fort Hays State University went up 3 percent, to 3,540 and Emporia State University lost about 50 students, from 5,075 last spring.

Afghan guerrillas reject ceasefire

KABUL, Afghanistan — The leader of Afghanistan said Thursday his Communist government's unilateral cease-fire was a gesture of good will. The crowd he addressed shouted that government troops should shoot back if attacked by guerrillas.

Guerrilla commanders, speaking in neighboring Pakistan, said Thursday their forces attacked several government positions to underscore their rejection of the cease-fire. The Kabul regime made no report of fighting. Early Thursday it said the cease-fire, which took effect Thursday, appeared to be holding.

An Afghan army official, who identified himself only as Col. Fakri, said all Afghan troops had been pulled back to their permanent bases.

It was not clear whether the estimated 115,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan were observing the cease-fire.

Moscow-based reporters flown into Kabul for a government-sponsored visit saw soldiers out in force on the streets of the capital. No fighting could be heard in the capital Thursday.

Afghan leader Najibullah, who uses a single name, has said the truce would remain in effect for six months if the guerrillas agree not to fight.

But spokesmen for the seven main guerrilla groups, which are based in Pakistan, all said their forces were conducting military operations as usual and some said their forces had increased operations.

'Worst' winter envelopes Europe

Europe's worst winter in decades claimed at least 216 lives by Thursday, with hundreds of thousands of people isolated by snow-clogged roads and troops in France and Germany blasting through ice to head off flooding and keep two nuclear plants operating.

Freezing temperatures continue to envelop the continent, prompting the Common Market to grant $2.75 million to charities providing fuel, food and shelter to the elderly and homeless.

Farmers' welfare requests increase

TOPEKA — Farmers are seeking welfare assistance in increasing numbers and Robert Harder, director of the state welfare agency, said Thursday the continued economic depression in agricultural communities is expected to force even more Kansas farmers to seek help.

However, Harder's Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services can't offer a wide range of services to farmers, generally, even if they have no income at all. The problem stems from the nature of the farming business and the fact most farmers have equity in their land and equipment.

"We're seeing quite an increase in activity in our area offices from farmers," Harder told the Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee. "Generally, all we are able to provide is food stamps. It's extremely difficult for farmers to meet eligibility requirements for cash grants because of the unique kinds of problems farmers present."

Harder said there are about 200 farmers currently receiving food stamps, an unusually high number because farm families rarely seek public assistance.

"They are about the last group to seek help and I think it's because of a combination of their independent nature and the complications of eligibility."

EPA studies western acid rain level

WASHINGTON — There are practically no acidified lakes in the western United States, but about two-thirds of lakes studied in sensitive areas have little ability to handle much more acid rain, according to an Environmental Protection Agency study released Thursday.

The results were broadly similar to the agency's study of eastern lakes in 1985. It found that 60 percent of the lakes in the Northeast could be considered vulnerable. Four percent of Northeastern lakes could be considered acidic already.

In the West, EPA said it found only one lake that could be considered acidified, a lake in Yellowstone National Park fed by a natural hot spring. Environmentalists fear acid rain will kill aquatic life by acidifying lakes.

The agency studied 719 western lakes selected according to statistical techniques from 10,363 in suspected vulernable areas — generally the Rocky, Cascade and Sierra Nevada mountain ranges.

The sampling techniques yielded an estimated 6,927, or 66.7 percent, that contain less than 200 microequivalents per liter of alkalinity, a common measure of how much alkalinity is available to neutralize further inputs of acidity.

U.S. lifts Soviet oil equipment ban

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration, in a major relaxation of export controls, announced Thursday it was lifting a 9-year-old ban on the sale of non-strategic oil and gas drilling equipment to the Soviet Union.

The move was hailed by industry officials as offering a much-needed boost to hard-pressed oilfield drilling companies. The Soviet Union is the largest market for drilling equipment outside the United States.

Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said the action was being taken "despite our dissatisfaction with Soviet human rights efforts."

The Carter administration imposed the controls in 1978 for foreign-policy purposes to protest Soviet human rights violations, including the jailing of Soviet dissident Anatoly B. Shcharansky, who last year was permitted to emigrate to Israel.

Baldrige said the controls had "lost their impact" because of the widespread availability of the equipment from foreign suppliers, while having a "debilitating effect on our oil and gas industry."

The equipment at issue — including drilling rigs, bits, blow-out preventers and mud systems — are not viewed as having direct military applications.

A ban on exports to the Soviet Union and other Eastern bloc nations of military and sensitive high-technology equipment remain in place, Baldrige said.

Audi orders recall of 250,000 cars

DETROIT — A quarter-million Audi 5000-series cars made before the current model year were recalled Thursday for installation of a device designed to eliminate sudden accelerations which critics blame for five deaths.

Letters will be sent to owners asking that they take the vehicles to Audi dealers so a shift-lock device can be placed on the transmission and so an engine idle stabilization valve can be checked and replaced if necessary, company and government officials said.

"This is a total recall" of 1978 through 1986 model, said Audi spokesman Joesph Bennett from company headquarters in Troy, a Detroit suburb. "If it's an Audi 5000 with an automatic transmission, it is involved in this."

The average price of the recalled cars is $23,000, said Bennett.

Navy launches new missile; authorities arrest protesters

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A Trident 2 missile roared off a land launch pad Thursday in a successful maiden test flight of a submarine weapon said to be powerful and accurate enough to destroy nuclear-hardened missile silos and command centers.

About 25 anti-nuclear protesters who had vowed to stop the test wailed, beat their heads and fell to the ground as the 44-foot missile blasted off at 10:25 a.m. and hurled a dummy warhead to an Atlantic Ocean target several thousand miles to the southeast.

Nineteen people were arrested in protests, and one demonstrator suffered a seizure that may have been a heart attack, authorities said.

A Navy spokesman, Lt. Cmdr. Bob Prichard, said the missile scored "a complete success. It operated as advertised."

Security was extremely tight because of the protesters, many of whom had pledged to reach the launch area and halt the countdown. Sixty-six have been arrested for trespassing and other violations in the last week, including the 19 Thursday.

Although the launch was not announced in advance, about 75 demonstrators gathered at the main Cape Canaveral gate Thursday morning, and some tried to block traffic by linking arms in the middle of the road. The Air Force closed the gate and diverted workers to an entrance at nearby Kennedy Space Center.

U.S., Soviet envoys return to arms talks

By The Associated Press

GENEVA — Superpower nuclear arms talks resumed Thursday with a luncheon meeting between U.S. delegation head Max Kampelman and his new Soviet counterpart, Yuli Vorontsov.

The two delegation leaders met privately at Soviet request, instead of heading a meeting of all three top negotiators from each side, which normally marks the beginning of a round.

The talks have been bogged down from the start by disagreement, among other things, over U.S. Strategic Defense Initiative research for a space-based defense against nuclear attack, popularly called "Star Wars."

U.S. spokesman Terry Shroeder said he had no information on when the next session in the seventh round of arms talks would be. "I have nothing for the news media on this as yet," he said.

Asked about the results of Thursday's session, which was the two men's first meeting, he said, "It went fine." He declined further comment.

The luncheon lasted just over two hours.

In a separate development, the Soviet ambassador to Switzerland, Evgeny Makeyev, and the State Department in Washington announced that U.S.-Soviet talks on nuclear weapons testing would resume Jan. 22 in Geneva.

When Kampelman arrived at the Soviet mission, he and Vorontsov greeted each other warmly in front of reporters. They declined to say what they planned to discuss.

At a news conference later, Alexei Obukhov, deputy head of the Soviet delegation, said the two men planned to discuss substantive and procedural questions and to get to know each other during the lunch.

Vorontsov, a first secretary in the Foreign Ministry, holds a higher rank than his predecessor at the arms talks, Viktor Karpov.

The announcement of Vorontsov's appointment was made Tuesday, one day after President Reagan announced that Kampelman, in addition to continuing as chief U.S. arms control negotiator, had been nominated for the post of State Department counselor, a job which required Senate confirmation.

Obukhov, responding to a question, said the higher ranks of the delegation heads "should help give the negotiations an impetus, should accelerate the negotiations to make the current round the breakthrough round."

Obukhov spoke at a press conference called to mark the first anniversary of Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev's proposal to eliminate nuclear weapons by the year 2000.

The Soviet news agency Tass on Thursday quoted Vorontsov as saying the Soviets see their principal task in Geneva as making progress in the talks.

He said the two sides should proceed from the tentative understandings reached at the U.S.-Soviet summit in October in Reykjavik, Iceland, the report from Moscow said.

Kampelman on Tuesday also said the U.S. side sees "opportunities for progress in the common ground developed at Reykjavik" and during the previous round of arms talks.

The two sides tentatively agreed at Reykjavik to drastic reductions in nuclear arsenals during the coming decade. But a concrete accord was blocked by Soviet insistence that Washington limit its Strategic Defense Initiative research.

President Reagan rejected the Soviet proposals for limits on development of "Star Wars."

Liverance resigns as personnel director

Staff/Brad Fanshier

Darwin Liverance, director of personnel services at K-State for seven years, will resign his position Feb. 16 to assume a similar job at Auburn University.

By CHRIS DOLL
Staff Writer

Darwin Liverance, director of personnel services at K-State for seven years, will resign his position for the "challenges and opportunities" at Auburn University in Auburn, Ala., effective Feb. 16.

"At Auburn, I'll be much more involved in the structure in all of the programs," Liverance said of his new position as director of personnel services at Auburn.

His responsibilities at K-State include employment of staff, position management, employee relations, staff training and employee benefits.

The state of Kansas operates under a civil-personnel system dictated by the state's department of administration, which sets specific guidelines that must be followed. Program directors must follow those guidelines in developing their program.

In contrast, Alabama has more flexible guidelines than Kansas, Liverance said.

Liverance said Kansas' state personnel system was restrictive because the guidelines were prepared for all Kansas civil employees to follow and not structured to fit the needs of a specific group of employees.

"Requirements are the same throughout Kansas," Liverance said. "This can be restrictive."

For instance, the procedure for disciplining employees requires action to follow a timetable. This causes such actions to take longer than if only the University was involved, Liverance said.

"It takes much longer to bring about disciplinary action than it really should," Liverance said.

Despite the restrictive guidelines, Liverance and the department have had good working relations with the state agency during his tenure, he said.

"A well-defined state structure can be beneficial. In other instances, it can be limiting," Liverance said.

He said, however, that he is not leaving K-State because of the state system, but because he foresees new opportunities in his job at Auburn University.

"I'll be much more involved in the structure and implementation of all the programs, and that's very challenging," he said.

The personnel service department, under the direction of Liverance, initiated a number of programs. One was the employee assistance program.

The program is designed to help employees handle personal problems that might contribute to poor work performances.

Local man pleads guilty to rape, abducution

By The Collegian Staff

A Riley County man pleaded guilty in Riley County District Court Thursday to one count of rape and one count of aggravated kidnapping after being arrested for the alleged abduction of two K-State women on Oct. 28.

Nordell F. Glover, R.R. 1 Box 28, was charged with five additional counts including another count of rape and kidnapping, aggravated battery, aggravated sexual battery and aggravated sodomy, an official at the Riley County Court House said.

Glover agreed to plead guilty to the two charges in return for having the remaining five dropped.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said a plea bargain was arranged because the penalty for rape and kidnapping is sufficient to keep Glover in jail for a life sentence.

"These two crimes together made up 50 percent of the state's case, and the potential sentences on these cases are as high as the penalty for (all of the counts)," he said.

Kennedy said by pleading guilty, Glover gave up his right to a trial.

Glover's attorney, Chris Biggs, said Glovr decided to plea guilty to eliminate putting his family, the victims or himself through the pains of a trial, according to the Manhattan Mercury.

Glover allegedly abducted and raped the 19- and 21-year-old women near Tuttle Creek Dam and Reservoir.

After being released on a nearby road, the women walked to a rural home and called a friend who took them to Lafene Student Health Center. Police were notified that evening.

Glover will be sentenced March 2 by District Judge Jerry Mershon.

Resignation of Stamey signals end of an era

The decision by William Stamey to resign as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences will leave the college hard-pressed to find a successor of equal ability. Not only has Stamey been an ever-present fixture of the college for nearly two decades, the improvements made in the college during his tenure are impressive.

As he noted in an interview earlier this week, the college has gained prestige, especially in its research and graduate programs. The advances made by K-State's largest college have had a profound effect on the entire University, since every student will have gone through the college by the time he or she receives a degree.

However, as Stamey cautioned, the college will have to fight to make sure members of the faculty don't go elsewhere in light of the current financial crunch. Indeed, maintaining the college's high standards will be the greatest challenge facing Stamey's successor.

An ailing budget cannot be counted upon to replace the exceptional faculty members who may depart. Conversely, exceptional faculty cannot be counted on to remain in a staid environment when there are vibrant academic institutions searching for the best faculty healthy budgets can buy. The budget crisis is no one's fault, but the University should be prepared for its possible effects.

Sadly, the budget situation may have had some impact on Stamey's decision to retire, although he said it had only a "minimal" effect. However, that it had any effect at all is unfortunate.

As the University begins the process of naming Stamey's replacement, it should strive to find someone of comparable ability. Moreover, it should strongly consider Stamey's warnings regarding the financial crunch.

We wish the University — and William Stamey — the best of luck.

Hayden should funnel tax refund to agencies

Despite his campaign promise to return money from an expected tax windfall to taxpayers, Gov. Mike Hayden should abandon that promise and funnel the windfall directly into budgets for state services.

Most state agencies are scrambling to stay financially afloat in lieu of Hayden's 3.8 percent cut in spending, and some — including most notably the welfare department — are forced to implement a severe cutback in services. A windfall would better aid the state in these areas.

In fact, a recent poll conducted for The Kansas City Times indicated 57 percent of the 514 Kansans who responded said the state should keep the money to fund services that are suffering financially under the administration's budget cuts.

Only 38 percent wanted the money returned to tax payers and another 5 percent were unsure.

State legislators may soon be discussing the fate of the windfall, which could amount to as much as $120 million in 1988. Hayden has appointed a task force to look into uses for the windfall, and he is considering using part of the money to create tax breaks for the ailing Kansas oil industry and Social Security recipients.

Another area that could benefit from windfall dollars is welfare funding. Wednesday the House Appropriations Committee began its review of Hayden's proposal for an $11.7 million reduction in welfare. Recommended cuts will affect aid to dependent children and general and medical assistance for the poor and unemployed.

With the fiscal emergency facing many state agencies and industries, windfall money should be used to help them pull through this most difficult time. Kansans would be much better served by this action than if they received a few extra dollars.

Appointment of alum impressive for K-State

Marlin Fitzwater's appointment as assistant to the president for press relations is a significant one. Fitzwater, appointed by President Reagan on Monday, will replace Larry Speakes, who is resigning Feb. 2.

Fitzwater graduated from K-State in 1965 with a bachelor's degree in journalism. In 22 years, Fitzwater has worked his way from the Kansas plains to the Washington, D.C. political pool. It has been an impressive journey.

He is entering the position during one of the worst crises the Reagan administration has faced. The Iran-Contra issue has shaken up the White House, and the job of press spokesman is precarious.

As a spokesman for the White House, Fitzwater will be expected to disseminate the truth and have the integrity to know when he's not been given the truth by the White House. It will be a difficult responsibility to fulfill, yet it is one he will be expected to uphold.

K-State can now watch those White House press conferences with a little more interest.

Perceptions of a new semester

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

Here we go again.

Another semester has actually begun. It's hard to believe, isn't it? Finals seem like yesterday, and as for remembering it's January and 1987...How many of you have been writing the correct date on your checks? Nice to know I'm not the only one.

I needed the break, but I was glad to get back into a routine. My two weeks off were just about right: I did nothing but sleep, eat and read. It was great.

The stack of fiction books which had been collecting dust last semester were finally dusted off, opened and finished. It's ironic that just when I finish books which have been waiting patiently, another stack appears. So now there is another stack gathering dust until I find the time to read for fun.

So much for break. Now the real fun begins — my last semester at K-State. Although I enjoy school and like Manhattan and K-State, I can hardly wait to return to the real, (in)sane world. I'd forgotten all the things we students have to cope with and all the demands placed on us. But it has been and is fun. I just need the sanity of one job, one career, instead of being pulled in so many different directions.

More to follow on the real world, graduation and the case of senioritis I'm sure to develop.

I've been thinking about topics for this column. There are a list of things I'd like to write about, a rather diverse group, but they might be interesting from both sides — yours and mine. Bear with me while I struggle with my choices and if you have any suggestions, let me know.

I'd like to write more on the topics like the PLUS Literacy project or depression. They're issues we all need to be aware of. I'll try not to make them too dry and boring.

I'll undoubtedly still write about family and friends because they're important to me. I don't know that everything I'll write will be great or even interesting for most of you. But I'll try my best to have at least one column you'll enjoy or be able to relate to.

This column tends to be cathartic for me. You hear all my problems and I don't have to worry about you falling asleep where I can see you. So enjoy the naps.

Unfortunately, this semester has started out too easily. I went through registration too quickly, nothing was wrong with my class schedule, I received my financial aid checks and everything just went too smoothly.

A friend remarked that he and his daughter had been through registration, done some moving and a few other things within the space of a few hours. His daughter asked if they'd forgotten anything since they couldn't have possibly finished everything.

I feel the same way. It went too easily — I'm sure something is fouled up somewhere. I mean, everything can't be running that smoothly. Or am I actually getting the hang of all this?

I can see one of my first challenges will be to write this column. They don't write themselves (at least not every week), so I'm really going to have to work at getting them researched and written.

It will be a challenge to try to manage my time more effectively. I haven't learned the technique yet, but that doesn't stop me from trying. Someday I may get it right.

Some of the problems I'm going to try to solve this semester include finding a job — a big problem at this point but I hope it won't be for long. I've looked for jobs before and surely I can do it again. It's a scary thought, though.

As much as I talk about returning to the real world, it would be much safer and easier to stay in school. But it's time to move on and take some risks. So, real world, watch out.

Two related problems I'm faced with are losing weight and getting more exercise. I've been swimming in the mornings this week (we'll see how long it lasts this time) but it is NOT fun getting out of bed that early. So far my body is protesting dramatically. But if it will help shed pounds then I guess the saying "no pain, no gain" is true.

I really need to lose weight, though. Maybe I'm just too self-conscious about it but I know I'd feel better if I did. Losing weight is another thing I've done before. Too bad I didn't keep it off. Another topic for this column, so stay tuned for further adventures.

Another reason I'm looking forward to this semester, besides the challenges, is the K-State Players. The three productions scheduled for this semester promise to be as entertaining as previous productions. "Check your local newspaper for theater and showtimes."

The Players also have at least one special performance scheduled, "Late Night with the K-State Players," Saturday at 8 p.m. in Nichols Theatre. It's to help defray the expenses of those attending the American College Theatre Festival in Iowa City next week. There are five actors participating in the audition competition of the Irene Ryan Scholarship. Donations will be accepted at the door with a suggested $2 for students and $3 for the general public. A lot of great talent will perform, folks. You shouldn't miss it.

We are lucky to have a variety of cultural events on this campus and they shouldn't be ignored. Why don't you try something new this semester? If you've never seen the K-State Players in action, buy a ticket. If you've never heard the band, orchestra, glee clubs, the jazz ensemble, etc., attend a concert. If you've never been to a McCain event or a UPC presentation, go. Believe me, it won't hurt. And you might even like it, and wouldn't that be something?

Enjoy the semester, enjoy the leisure time and enjoy being who you are. But most of all, just enjoy.

Skiing is not always believing

RON HONIG
Collegian Columnist

"Need some help, mister?" asked the sandy-haired boy. I looked up from my fetal position at the edge of the snowbank. The boy, who couldn't have been more than 9 or 10, was standing over me wearing a tiny ski jacket and miniature skies. He looked like a sawed-off John Denver.

"No, I think I've got it," I answered. What I was thinking was more along the lines of, "Get lost, you runny-nosed little smurf."

The boy stood behind me as I tried to stand up, the ski boots cutting into my calves. He watched for a moment and then sped off down the slope. I got to my feet and snapped my skis back on, mentally preparing myself for another try. I used the same mental preparation employed by Japanese kamikazes.

It was my first attempt at snow skiing and it was quickly becoming my last. I had heard many stories about skiing, and I carried with me to the slopes a sack full of advice, some wanted and some not. Most of the stories were related to crashing down the mountain or bruises and sore muscles.

The positive advice I received made me anxious to get into the mountains and go after the moguls, but the negative advice made me yearn for a rough game of badminton.

It's the positive comments — like, "You're doing a lot better than I did my first time," and "Once you learn to snowplow, the rest is easy" — that carry you through the learning process. Whether they are true is irrelevant. Incidentally, it wasn't until my second trip down the mountain that I realized snowplowing is accomplished with the skis and not one's elbows.

However, along with positive comments come the negative ones, including "You're going to be totally frustrated the first time" and "You might as well plan on falling down a lot."

People are always willing to give advice, even if they have never skied. Strangers even offer helpful hints on the slopes. I was skiing along (I guess you could have called it that) trying to learn to snowplow, when this lady went around me and offered, "Don't watch your feet." That made reasonable sense to me, so I looked up from my feet and quickly looked down. I looked up, looked down, looked up, looked down, looked up, looked down, looked up, fell down.

After receiving plenty of advice, I decided against ski lessons. Instead, I asked a friend to try to teach me. Luckily, she had more patience than I did, staying with me despite my intermittent temper tantrums on our way down the mountain. She didn't even laugh at me when I fell getting off the ski lift. However, I did detect a snicker when I slipped getting on the blasted thing.

Riding the ski lift was a great way to see the mountain range and watch other skiers maneuver below us. I was, however, somewhat disappointed to learn there was no chair to ride down the mountain. I glanced over my shoulder for an instant and then returned my eyes to my hands, which were gripping the ski poles and the arm of the chair.

"Ease up a little, Ron," my friend said.

"If it's not too much trouble, would you mind not rocking the chair?"

"What's the matter? You aren't scared are you?" she asked in a surprised tone.

"No, I'm not scared, just a little uncomfortable, that's all."

After getting off the lift, my friend waited as I brushed off the snow and put on my left ski. I started on a green slope, considered the easiest of the three color-coded runs. I would soon find out that, for a beginning skier, the only difference between a green, blue, and a black slope is the color of the sign.

Black slopes do tend to get the pain over more quickly. The trick is not getting down the slope — that part is easy. The trick is getting down the slope in a manner nondisruptive to body function or dangerous to one's mental health.

Once I had learned to stop myself, there came the problems of changing directions and staying out of the trees. I usually accomplished changing directions by crashing and realigning myself before I stood up. I finally caught on after a while and did some actual skiing, but there were other times when I wasn't skiing. Instead, I was just falling — slowly.

So, I wasn't surprised when I was approached by a talent scout for the Stuntmen's Association. I'm sure someone with more coordination would have a much easier time than I did. Even as a small child, I had to have training wheels on my teddy bear.

When the frigid nightmare finally came to a close, we headed down a long bunny slope leading back to the lodge. I fell once more for luck and then we went home. Of course, in the spirit of Chevy Chase and "Vacation," we stopped to take pictures — pictures I'll probably never see because my film is stuck in my camera and it will not rewind.

Despite some mishaps, skiing was easier than I had anticipated. It's difficult to explain skiing to someone and even harder to imagine what it's like unless you actually try it. Now that the soreness and sunburn are gone, I don't have as many reminders of my trip. However, I wear my lift ticket like a medal, and I can't wait until time, money and I come together again for another skiing trip.

Organization brings artworks to campus

By BARRY STEFFEN
Contributing Writer

Several of the prints and paintings often on display in McCain Auditorium and the K-State Union are brought here compliments of the K-State Friends of Art, an organization in support of artwork in the campus community.

Jessica Reichman, assistant curator of the University Permanent Art Collection, said Friends of Art was established in 1934 by John Helm, an instructor at K-State in the College of Architecture and Design. Helm directed the organization until his death in 1972.

After Helm's death there was little organization, and membership numbers declined substantially until Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art, took interest in the group in 1980.

"When Professor Stroh came to K-State in 1980, he revitalized Friends of Art and has served as a guiding force ever since," Reichman said.

Stroh said the group had 45 members in 1980, compared with 150 this year.

"We have a hard core of members, about 75, that are very loyal to the group and often donate more (money) than is required," Stroh said.

"This group is made up of University faculty and staff and community citizens," Reichman said. "We even have a few out-of-state members."

Anyone interested can become a member by paying an annual fee of $20. All members receive an annual newsletter and free gift print by a notable regional artist.

The main focus of Friends of Art is to select and obtain artwork from the Midwest region of the United States for display at K-State.

The number of art selections made in a year depends on the funds received from members and the cost of the artwork, Reichman said.

"We limit most of our choices to graphic work, primarily prints. These are not as expensive as oil paintings or sculptures and they're easier to properly store," she said.

Stroh said prints can vary anywhere from $200 to $1,000 and paintings can easily cost $5,000.

Friends of Art, on the average, is usually able spend $3,000 to $5,000 each year to obtain five to 10 works of art.

The group often receives a substantial number of gifts, Stroh said. Last year, it received 175 pieces but have only accumulated six this year.

Friends of Art recently acquired nine works of art for around $5,000.

KSDB gains power increase approval

By DERON JOHNSON
Collegian Reporter

KSDB-FM, K-State's student-operated radio station, received approval from the Federal Communications Commission Dec. 30 to increase the power of its signal, said Leroy Buller, faculty adviser to KSDB.

Buller said the station will increase its power from 125 watts to 1,400 watts, and its broadcast tower will be moved from McCain Auditorium to a location east of Manhattan. KSDB's studios, however, will remain in McCain Auditorium.

In addition to the increase in power, the station will move from 88.1 to 91.9 on the frequency dial. Buller said the reason for the change in frequency is to avoid possible broadcast interference with television Channel 6, a Junction City station, scheduled to begin operation soon.

There is no guard band between the 88.1 frequency and Channel 6's frequency, he said, and that left KSDB "vulnerable."

"Changing frequencies was done to get away from a possible future problem we would have with Channel 6 television," Buller said. The change in frequency will not affect KSDB's coverage range.

However, the increase in wattage and the rural location of the station's transmission power will triple the coverage area of the station. Buller said the station will be able to broadcast in a 15- to 20-mile range. Currently, the range is five to six miles.

The project to increase the station's transmission power will begin sometime in March.

"We're hoping to start the project around spring break," Buller said. The work, expected to take 45 to 60 days, will include the raising of the antenna, changing power and changing the station's frequency.

An allocation of $25,000 from the Student Governing Association will pay for the work that needs to be done, Buller said. KSDB's new antenna was donated in 1985 by Wichita television station KAKE.

In addition to the increase in wattage, the station's new antenna will aid in the transmission of the signal. Buller said the antenna at the McCain site is 38 feet below the average terrain. When the station moves, it will be 290 feet above the average terrain.

When the effects of the increased wattage and the higher terrain are combined, KSDB, the second-oldest non-commercial FM station in the United States, will experience a notable increase in its coverage range. The range of an FM station is determined by the height of the tower plus the power of its signal.

Committee endorses corporate law bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate Judiciary Committee Thursday endorsed a measure designed to help Kansas corporations keep or attract highly paid officers.

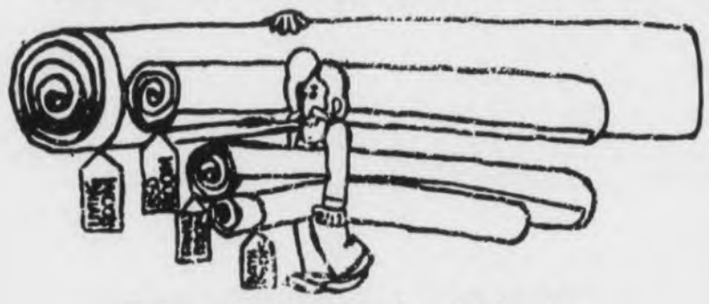
The bill would allow stockholders of a corporation to change the company's bylaws to limit or even eliminate the liability members of a board of directors would face if the stockholders sued the directors. The proposed change is also designed to modernize the state's corporate laws.

The committee's endorsement came on a unanimous voice vote after a brief hearing, and quick action is expected in the Senate.

Sen. Robert Frey, R-Liberal and committee chairman, said he had not heard of much opposition to the measure. At the hearing, no one spoke against it.

"I don't think you could expect any change, or dramatic change, in the availability or price of your (directors') insurance," Frey said. "I think the thrust of the bill is to provide some security."

Under the measure, stockholders could not vote to eliminate or limit a director's liability in certain cases, such as willful misconduct or a breach of loyalty to the company.



Committee members were also spurred to fast action on the bill by the testimony of a telephone company executive, who told them his company hoped to see the law changed in time to allow stockholders to vote on a provision to limit such liability in its bylaws.

Richard Crocker, vice president and associate general counsel for United Telephone Co. of Kansas, told the committee delaying the change in the law would mean that the provision legally could not be voted on at the company's spring meeting. Another stockholder's meeting would cost the company between $175,000 and $200,000 he said.

Crocker and lobbyists appearing before the committee also touted the measure as an economic development bill. They said it would help calm fears of possible lawsuits against directors by stockholders.

"It permits Kansas corporations to obtain and retain the best possible private directors," Crocker said. "It would encourage corporations to stay and to come to Kansas."

Colleges cut back operating expenses, consolidate courses

BUDGETS on the block

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

Although no spring semester class sessions were eliminated in the College of Engineering due to the budget cuts, Donald Rathbone, dean of the college, said it may be a possibility in future semesters.

Low enrollment was the cause of some spring class closings in the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering, but Donald Hummels, head of the department, said they might not have been so quick to cancel the classes if there hadn't been budget cuts.

Rathbone said the college is able to keep all classes this semester by cutting into other operating expenses including travel, photocopying, long-distance phone calls and equipment purchase and repair.

The only equipment that may be purchased this semester will be for professors and researchers who have grants that do not come from the state and are therefore not affected by the mandated cuts, he said.

Paul Miller, head of the Department of Mechanical Engineering, said there is no doubt they will run out of money before the year is up.

"Right now we are cutting down on things like phoning and photocopying, but by the end of the (fiscal) year we may not have any phones," he said.

Miller said not only are they cutting expenses this year, but also they are planning for the same type of cuts in the next fiscal year. The mechanical engineering department lost more than half of its operational expenses budget for fiscal year 1987.

Graduate student support will also be cut in the College of Engineering. Rathbone said no additional graduate students have been hired for the spring semester.

Several requests had to be turned down for graduate teaching positions in the electrical and computer engineering department, Hummels said.

Although the college did not find the need to lay off any full-time faculty, some already vacant positions have been frozen in many departments.

The Department of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science has reduced its two student secretarial positions to on-call status. This means they will not be called unless they are desperately needed, said Robert Dahl, head of the department.

Dahl said he made changes like this to keep from cutting faculty salaries.

"We are trying to cut down in the department as much as possible without hurting the people," he said.

Rathbone said some cuts were made in student salaries.

Miller said although no faculty or staff members have been laid off in the mechanical engineering department at this time, he doesn't know about the future.

While the College of Human Ecology tried to make it a priority to keep all classes open, it was still necessary to close two lab sessions, said Virginia Moxley, associate dean of the college.

The departments of Foods and Nutrition, and Dietetics, Restaurant and Institutional Management each closed a lab that had been listed in the spring semester line schedule.

Marian Spears, head of the dietetics, restaurant and institutional management department, said the department hopes to place the students enrolled in the closed lab into other sessions.

The foods and nutrition department, however, has no other lab sessions open.

Other departments have consolidated classes in order to save money. Mary Peterson, head of the Department of Clothing, Textiles and Interior Design, said although the department is saving money by consolidating classes, the larger classes put pressure on the faculty.

Moxley said that in addition to consolidating classes and cutting the two lab sessions, dramatic cuts were made in other operating expenses.

Photocopying and telephone calls have been completely cut in the dietetics, restaurant and institutional management department, Spears said.

Spears also said they have cut back on class items including videotapes and films.

The clothing, textiles and interior design department will not be able to purchase resource materials this semester that are vital to the design classes, Peterson said.

The foods and nutrition labs will also be hurt by the budget cuts. The other operating expense budget of the foods and nutrition department was cut by 50 percent, said Jane Bowers, head of the department.

Bowers said the department has no travel money left for the remainder of the fiscal year.

In addition to the other reductions, the College of Human Ecology had to cut back on graduate assistant support. Although no one in the college was laid off, some departments were unable to hire additional graduate assistants as planned.

"Without this additional assistance, the faculty is overloaded and won't have time for things like research," Spears said.

Spears is also concerned that graduate student enrollment may be down in future semesters because of the department's inability to support them.

The College of Human Ecology will also be reducing the money spent on recruitment and correspondence. The foods and nutrition department will not be able to advertise in the Peterson Guide as it has in the past, Bowers said. The Peterson Guide is a publication that lists university graduate programs in the United States.

The foods and nutrition department will also be cutting down on the number of letters and brochures about course offerings sent to prospective students. Bowers said the department will be unable to send additional brochures when the current supply is gone.

Looking in the future, Moxley said the department has already planned on reducing summer school class offerings, and Barbara Stowe, dean of the college, said if the cuts continue, the hotel and restaurant management program may be hindered.

Editor's note: These two stories are the second part in a series on the impact of budget cuts on K-State's colleges.

'Wizard of Oz' star Ray Bolger, 83, dies

From Staff and Wire Reports

Ray Bolger, who as the brave but stumbling Scarecrow helped lead Dorothy back home in the 1939 movie "Wizard of Oz," died Thursday of cancer. He was 83.

Bolger, the last survivor of the troupe that marched down the Yellow Brick Road, died at a Los Angeles nursing home, said family spokesman Barry Greenberg.

The lean, loose-limbed Bolger preferred to think of himself as a comedian rather than a dancer, and his stage, screen and television career spanned six decades. But he was best known for his role as the Scarecrow.

Bolger said in later years he had no idea the movie would become a Hollywood classic.

But Tod Machin, of Kansas City, Mo., said he has been a lifelong fan of the movie and has collected Oz memorabilia since 1980.

A 1984 graduate in fine arts from K-State, Machin said he met Bolger in 1985 at KCMO radio station when he was in Kansas City for a convention sponsored by the Arthritis Foundation.

"Meeting Ray Bolger was an incredible thrill," he said. Bolger autographed a 1939 Oz ad Machin owns.

Machin, who makes life-size Oz costumes, said he wrote Bolger, asking him for the measurements of the Scarecrow costume he'd kept upon finishing the movie. Within two weeks, Bolger mailed him a sketch with the measurements.

Company assists Costa Rican students

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

An agreement between the Department of Agricultural Engineering and a Costa Rican grain company provides Costa Rican students with the opportunity to further their graduate work at K-State.

Coordinated by Do Sup Chung, professor of agricultural engineering, this program has brought two Costa Rican students of agricultural engineering to K-State in the last two years.

Eduardo Arce-Diaz and Carlos Benavides, graduate students in agricultural engineering, are currently participating in the program.

"This memorandum of understanding facilitates the coming of our people here, and this is very important to us," Arce-Diaz said.

In Costa Rica, Arce-Diaz works in the maintenance department at the National Council of Production, a company in charge of the handling and storage of grain in Costa Rica.

"We buy all of our wheat that we use from the United States, because we do not grow wheat in our country," he said. "We buy around 110,000 metric tons of wheat from the United States every year, and it is distributed throughout the country."

Through the company's agreement with the University, Arce-Diaz said he is able to work on his research assistantship and will also be able to utilize his education in Costa Rica once he graduates.

"This program means that I will have the chance to raise our capacity in the regular tasks that we currently have in Costa Rica," Arce-Diaz said. "Most of all, the technology that we use is from the United States, so it is important to be close to the source.

"The most important thing to me is that I will be able to attain knowledge in the areas of grain storage and handling while at K-State," he said.

In Costa Rica, it is not possible to acquire a master's degree in agricultural engineering. Having international experience, exchanging information with classmates and meeting people from all over the world has made Arce-Diaz's stay in the United States a pleasant experience, he said.

The main requirement for assistantship applicants is that they pass the "TOEFL" exam, an English test given by the University that requires a minimum grade of 550 points, he said.

"Fortunately, I got more than that score on the test and no one else in the company reached the required grade," Arce-Diaz said.

Arce-Diaz said the contract he signed with the National Council of Production will ensure him a job in Costa Rica for at least six years upon graduation from K-State.

"I wish that we could send more people here to K-State because the experiences that I have received so far are extremely worthwhile," he said.

A look at the 10 best films of 1986

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

1986 wasn't a bad year for movies. It wasn't a great year either, but there were plenty of examples of well-crafted Hollywood entertainment.

The movies on the following 10 best list aren't necessarily the most entertaining of the year — you won't find "Back to School" or "Star Trek IV" (although I enjoyed both) — but you will find those movies which seem to me the best examples of imaginative, inspired filmmaking.

1. "Hannah and Her Sisters" — This may well be Woody Allen's finest film to date. It's the story of three sisters — Hannah (Mia Farrow), Holly (Diane Wiest) and Lee (Barbara Hershey) — the men in their lives, and their actor parents (Lloyd Nolan and Maureen O'Sullivan). Hannah has always been the stabilizing factor in the family, but now her own marriage is in trouble. Her husband (Michael Caine) is chasing after Hannah's sister Lee. In contrast to many of Allen's past films, the mood this time is gentle. It's clear Allen likes these people and wants them to work out their problems. He also provides some hilarious comedy in a supporting role as a hypochondriac searching for the meaning of life. The excellent cast also features Max Von Sydow, Sam Waterston and Carrie Fisher.

2. "Aliens" — Sequels are usually vastly inferior to the original films, but not so in this case. "Aliens" (a sequel of sorts to Ridley Scott's "Alien") is a great sci-fi film. In his first film since "The Terminator," director James Cameron has fashioned one of the most tension-filled movies ever made. The movie starts off deliberately, but gradually the pace quickens until, by the movie's end, the suspense is nearly unbearable. Sigourney Weaver reprises her role as Ripley, the sole survivor of the mining ship Nostromo. After drifting in space (in suspended animation) for 50 years, she's finally discovered by a cargo ship. But remember all those eggs back on the alien planet? They've hatched. Along with a platoon of "grunts," she heads back to the planet to destroy those bug-like creatures that use humans as incubators for their offspring. The most interesting development comes when Ripley, against her own better judgment, becomes the surrogate mother for an orphan, the lone survivor on the alien planet. Ironically, the creature laying all the eggs has strong maternal instincts as well. This makes for one nasty war between two females protecting their children.

3. "The Official Story" — Although released in most parts of the country in 1985, "The Official Story" didn't make it to the Midwest until this past year. In his first feature film, Luis Puenzo has created a harrowing tale of a mother (in a poignant performance by Norma Aleandro) searching for the true identity of her adopted child. Her husband, a government official in Argentina, provided his wife the child on a no-questions-asked basis, but now the mother begins to wonder if her child is the offspring of a political prisoner. This movie is one of those rare ones which manages to tell a good story and convey a political message at the same time.

4. "Mona Lisa" — Possibly the best performance of the year was delivered by Bob Hoskins in this film. He plays a small-time hood released from prison and now earning a living driving a high-priced call girl from one trick to the next. Director Neil Jordan takes us into the slimy underbelly of London where human dignity always has a price. In her first movie role, Cathy Tyson is a compelling mixture of strength and vulnerability as the call girl.

5. "A Room with a View" — I've never been a fan of director James Ivory's films, but this one is a marvelous adaptation of E.M. Forster's novel about British manners. In one of her finest performances ever, Maggie Smith plays a chaperone diligently protecting the honor of a young woman, Lucy Honeychurch (Helena Bonham Carter). But Smith, despite her stuffy exterior, is actually a hopeless romantic. She sees that Lucy isn't really in love with her stuffy fiance but rather with a forthright, working-class young man she met while vacationing in Florence, Italy.

6. "Manhunter" — In this vastly underrated film, director Michael Mann breaks away from the limitations of his work in television ("Miami Vice") to create a compelling story of a detective's search for a killer. Mann's fondness for flashy visuals is still present, but this time the visuals take on a hypnotic aura that perfectly complements the action.

7. "Children of a Lesser God" — In his first role after his Academy Award-winning performance in "Kiss of the Spider Woman," William Hurt turns in a wonderful, energetic performance as a teacher of the deaf. And Marlee Matlin, in her first role, is excellent as the angry young deaf woman he tries to befriend. She doesn't want to be part of a society which insists she's handicapped.

8. "Ruthless People" — The same nuts responsible for bringing us "Airplane!" — Jim Abrahams, David Zucker and Jerry Zucker — brought us this year's most bizarre comedy. It's about a husband and wife team (Judge Reinhold and Helen Slater) who kidnap a business executive's wife (Bette Midler) and demand ransom. Danny DeVito is deliriously nasty as the business exec who'd rather the kidnappers kill his wife than get away with any of his own money. The kidnappers keep lowering the ransom as if it were a firesale. DeVito plays a genuinely despicable guy, but he enjoys being despicable so much that (in the same way that Daffy Duck enjoys being greedy) he's endearing.

9. "Brazil" — The story itself is familiar — part "1984," part "A Clockwork Orange" and part "Metropolis" — but this is one of the most visually imaginative movies ever made. Director Terry Gilliam, of Monty Python fame, has fashioned an amazingly bleak but funny view of the future. It's not the future of "2001: A Space Odyssey": Nothing is streamlined. Everything has become bulky and textured. Jonathan Pryce plays an understandably bemused worker who has erotic visions of his dream girl. Robert DeNiro, Bob Hoskins and Michael Palin co-star.

10. "Little Shop of Horrors" — This film may even have "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" beat in terms of strangeness. Rick Moranis plays Seymour, the whimpy owner of a "mean green" plant from outer space. And Ellen Greene is his girlfriend who dreams of Tupperware parties and white picket fences. The finest touch of all is the three women dressed like the Supremes who act as a chorus, occasionally stepping forward to dance and sing. In supporting roles, the movie features Steve Martin (singing a demented song about being a dentist — "People will pay you to be inhumane"), Bill Murray (as a masochist pleading for a "long, slow root canal") and John Candy (as a crazed disc jockey). Director Frank Oz (of Muppet fame) has given this visually brilliant musical a wicked sense of humor.

There are several other films that just missed making this list. These include Akira Kurosawa's "Ran," Francis Coppola's "Peggy Sue Got Married," Bruce Beresford's version of Beth Henley's Pulitzer Prize-winning play "Crimes of the Heart," David Lynch's insane "Blue Velvet" and Oliver Stone's "Salvador" (his new film, "Platoon," is getting rave reviews).

Iran scandal hurts Reagan's image, poll says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Iran-Contra controversy has damaged the public perception of President Reagan, although only one-fifth of the American public is following the complicated story closely, a poll released Thursday said.

Some 42 percent of people surveyed by the Gallup Organization said they considered the Iran-Contra case so serious that it has hurt Reagan's ability to run the country. Fifty-three percent disagreed.

Moreover, the poll said 46 percent of Americans say Reagan is generally "not believable;" 38 percent say he is holding back information on the Iran affair to protect himself and others.

All told, 61 percent gave Reagan an overall job rating of very favorable or mostly favorable, compared with 83 percent in July 1985 and 69 percent in June 1985.

The Gallup poll, commissioned by Times-Mirror as part of an ongoing examination into attitudes toward the press, also said the public's perception of the news media has become less favorable.

Andrew Kohut, Gallup's president, commented that "when the public loses confidence in its leadership, all institutions are affected."

Only 19 percent held a "very favorable" opinion of their daily newspaper, down from 28 percent six months ago, the poll showed.

And the "very favorable" index for television has dropped from 30 percent in July 1986 to 19 percent.

The Gallup survey was based on telephone interviews with 1,500 adults from Dec. 27 to Jan. 4.

Officials arrest man in 1985 hijacking

By The Associated Press

FRANKFURT, West Germany — West German police have arrested a suspected sky pirate who vanished in Lebanon after the 1985 hijacking of a TWA jetliner, a state prosecutor said Thursday.

Security officials in Bonn identified the suspect as Mohammed Ali Hamadi, 22, a Lebanese citizen. He was the first suspect arrested in the hijacking in which a U.S. Navy diver was shot to death at Beirut airport before the 38 other American hostages were freed after 17 days of captivity.

Hamadi was arrested at Frankfurt airport Tuesday upon arrival from Beirut on a Middle East Airlines flight, the security officials said.

In Washington, Justice Department spokesman Patrick Korten said the United States will ask for the man's extradition to the United States for trial.

Hamadi was arrested after customs agents discovered that three wine bottles in his carry-on luggage contained methyl nitrate, a fluid similar to nitro glycerin and sometimes used in making explosives, security sources said.

Hamadi was one of the three suspects indicted in the United States on counts of murder and air piracy after the hijacking of the TWA plane, which was en route from Athens to Rome before the Shiite Moslem hijackers diverted it to Beirut. The hijackers, who were demanding the release of Lebanese prisoners held by Israel, shot U.S. Navy diver Robert Stethem to death.

The West German television network ZDF reported Thursday night that officials were also investigating whether Hamadi might have been involved in the June 1985 bombing of a Frankfurt airport departure hall that killed three people and injured 42. ZDF gave no further details and cited no source.

A high-ranking Interior Ministry official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Hamadi was traveling under an alias with a forged Lebanese passport.

"He was positively identified by his fingerprints," the official said.

After the TWA hijacking ended, the Reagan administration offered a reward of up to $250,000 for information leading to the capture and prosecution of the hijackers.

Interior Minister Friedrich Zimmermann told reporters in Bonn on Thursday that Hamadi was "a big fish."

Jochen Schroers of the Frankfurt prosecutors' office said authorities believed Hamadi was preparing a terrorist bombing, but it was unclear whether the attack was to have been carried out in West Germany.

The suspect was believed to belong to an extremist Shiite Moslem group, said security sources who declined to be identified.

The Frankfurt arrest came a day after Italian authorities stopped a Lebanese man allegedly carrying more than 20 pounds of plastic explosives and detonators through the Milan airport.

Italian authorities said Bashir al-Khodr, 26, was arrested Monday night when customs officials found the explosives and detonators hidden in chocolate Easter eggs and in picture frames.

Frankfurt authorities said the man arrested at Frankfurt airport was in investigative custody and had not been charged.

Zimmermann said authorities had found "material" on the man that could help in other investigations, but he declined to elaborate.

The TWA hijackers freed their captives after Syrian mediation.

After they released the hostages, two of the hijackers, hooded and carrying handguns, read a lengthy statement to reporters at the Beirut airport terminal.

Waite fails in attempt to contact kidnappers

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Anglican Church envoy Terry Waite met Lebanese leaders Thursday in his latest effort to win freedom for American and other hostages, but militia escorts said he had made no contact with the kidnappers.

"I think we are on the way to having a resolution to a longstanding problem," Waite told reporters after an 80-minute conference with Parliament Speaker Hussein Husseini, a Shiite Moslem. He did not elaborate on the remark.

Waite, who has been credited with helping obtain the freedom of three American hostages in the past 16 months, also met separately with Sunni Moslem religious leader Sheik Hassan Khaled.

The emissary of Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie arrived in Lebanon on Monday. It is his fifth visit to Lebanon since November 1985.

Two more foreigners have been kidnapped since Waite's arrival: a Saudi Arabian Embassy staffer and a French journalist. No one claimed responsibility for the abductions, which brought to 18 the number of foreigners missing in Lebanon.

Sources within the Druse militia protecting Waite said he has not contacted any hostage-holding group since arriving.

"The work is going ahead well. I am not saying anything further," Waite told reporters when asked if he has been in contact with the kidnappers.

After seeing Waite for 45 minutes, the white-turbaned Khaled told reporters, "Lebanon as a whole is a hostage and no one in the world is lifting a finger to release it from its bondage."

Waite said, "I think that the plight of the people of Lebanon needs to be brought to international attention and needs to be seen in a fair and balanced way."

When asked whether he was prepared to negotiate for the release of more than 200 Lebanese in Israeli jails, Waite said: "Yes, yes."

Coliseum ahead of schedule

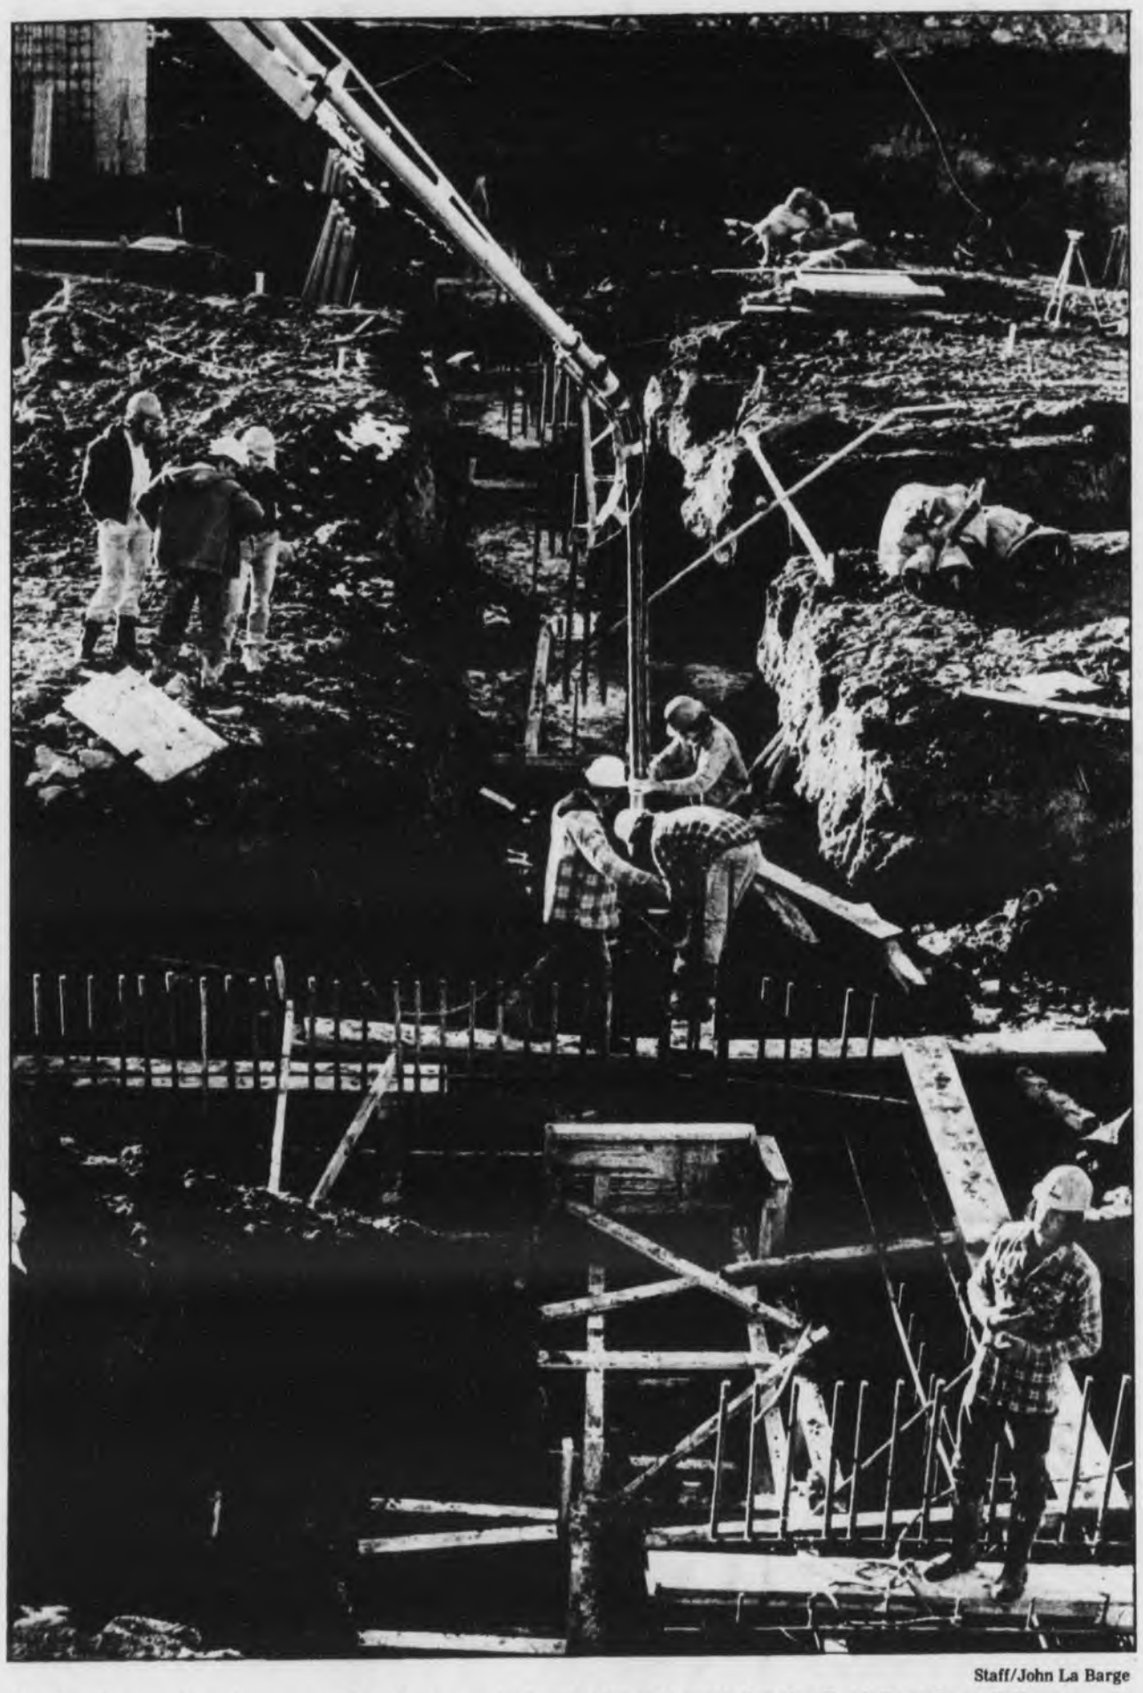
By The Collegian Staff

Winter thus far has not slowed the progress of construction on the Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

Vince Cool, associate director of facilities planning, said that the construction, primarily in the structure's foundation, is going extremely well due to excellent weather conditions and lack of ground frost.

Currently, the project is one month ahead of schedule, but Cool said, "There hasn't been enough winter yet to be sure things won't be slowed down.

"It just depends on what the weather gets like. If we get the snow we're supposed to, we could wind up a month behind schedule because right now we're out in the open with no way of protecting what is being constructed," he said.



Cool said many aspects of construction are going smoothly, including the movement of earth to support the structure, which is almost 75 percent complete, and work on the pilings, which is 25 percent complete.

Concrete work on columns to support the second level on the southern part of the arena has also begun, he said. This area will house the coliseum's administrative offices and locker rooms.

"Right now we're in the process of drilling the friction pile foundations, which will vary in length from 40 to 45 feet into the ground. These are 14 to 16 inches in diameter holes which are filled with concrete. That's what the large crane with the auger bit people see at the construction site is used for."

The original contracts for the coliseum state that its completion date will be in the summer of 1988. Cool said if construction continues at its present rate, that date can be met.

"Our first major goal is the start of the erection of steel around June 1. At that time people will begin to notice the building as its skeleton takes form," Cool said. "We hope to have the structure closed in around a year from now."

Construction workers began pouring the concrete foundation this week for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, one month ahead of schedule. The project began in October 1986 and is scheduled for completion in the fall of 1988.

Environmentalist slams waste disposal efforts

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — A five-state commission, seeking a place to store low-level nuclear waste, was criticized Thursday as a charade which was compiling a report that was inadequate and totally unacceptable.

"If you proceed...I promise to press this issue nt only within this state, but with my counterparts in each of your states," said Myron Katz, speaking for the Sierra Club in Louisiana.

He said that apparently only a few state officials were notified of the hearing, being held by the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact Commission. He said he was present because he happened to have found out about it.

The commission is required by federal law to select a disposal site by January 1988 for low-level nuclear waste, such as that produced in hospitals and in research.

Arkansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Nebraska and Kansas comprise the commission.

"Let's make it quite clear," he said. "The Sierra Club has a vital role to play in your process. If you include us, you might be able to change the force that drives your decisions from one of politics to one of reasoned scientific decision-making.

"Clearly...if you proceed in a manner which can be criticized for its process or even-handedness on the scientific aspects of your decisions, then you are forced to hope to derive your authority to proceed via political realities alone."

He called the compact fragile and said:

"If you act capriciously now, or at any time in the near future, you have doomed this process irrevocably."

He said he had been conversation chairman for the Sierra Club in Louisiana for two years and had never received notification of these meetings.

Therefore, he said, it was all invalid and the testimony that was gathered should not be considered.

He did not comment on the merits of the proposed storage sites, saying the Sierra Club had not had a chance to review them.

Robin Wynne, an Arkansas state representative from Cleveland County, claimed to be speaking for 26 state legislators as he voiced "strongest concern and disapproval" for all the sites in Arkansas.

He said they were all opposed politically and said the area is not suited geologically or environmentally for nuclear storage.

Tom Wynne, Robin Wynne's brother who is legal counsel for Cleveland County, said the $1 million bond required for storage is insufficient and any contract should include a clause requiring that land at any storage sites be returned to its original state.

He said counties in Arkansas are considering passing misdemeanor legislation to hold the commission accountable.

"We will do everything we can to keep it from being there," Tom Wynne said.

About 100 people attended the morning session, during which 10 speakers criticized the plan to store waste in the area.

Economics govern local drug market, police, dealer agree

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Staff Writer

In the illegal drug marketplace, the two sides of the law rarely agree. But neither side denies the economic factors which influence drug availability and popularity.

For the dealer, supply and demand determine how much he sells. For the police, it determines which drugs they confiscate.

"Dave" (not his real name) has been selling cocaine and marijuana since the beginning of the 1986 fall semester. A user of drugs since high school, he said availability is a matter of forecasting the market.

"The supply of pot depends on how well it is selling. If I'm having trouble selling it, there is too much on the market," "Dave" said. "My supplier will then hold back a month's supply, which should create a lack of pot on the market. Hopefully, this will create a demand and possibly drive the price up a little bit."

As the marijuana harvest season begins, police investigations concentrate on destroying the drug before it can be sold on the market.

Capt. Larry Woodward of the Riley County Police Department said the marijuana harvest season is in the late summer and early fall. When the department destroys the fields, the supply of marijuana is decreased.

The supply and demand for cocaine fluctuates less than that of marijuana. "Dave" said there is no need to create a demand for cocaine. Most suppliers have a "rotation" of people expected to sell a required amount of the drug each week. But, due to the large demand for cocaine, most dealers have no trouble meeting their quotas.

Although he is not in the rotation, "Dave" said his business is doing well.

"I have no trouble selling coke. I move about two grams a week. But I have access to more. I could get as much as six grams if someone wanted it and gave me the money up front."

The price of cocaine has come down in recent years, he said. One gram (1/28 of an ounce) of cocaine costs $100. But most of "Dave's" customers buy one quarter of a gram at a time, which costs $25. Some people prefer an "eight ball," 3.5 grams for $300.

The prices may vary, he said, but that is the average price list.

This law of supply and demand for cocaine also influences police investigations.

Woodward said supply and demand predicts availability and, in turn, affects their investigations.

Rather than concentrate their efforts on one drug, the police focus on "locations of activity," or places where drugs and money are changing hands. The drug that is popular on the market is what they usually confiscate, he said.

Woodward said their main technique in drug enforcement is observation by either watching a location of activity or listening to telephone conversations. However, a court order is required for the latter.

They also conduct some covert operations, he said. Undercover police officers contact dealers, purchase the drugs and then arrest the suspects.

Woodward said there is no specific narcotics division in the Riley County Police Department. The Criminal Investigations Division is in charge of drug enforcement.

However, he said, if the circumstances are right, the RCPD may receive help from the Kansas Bureau of Investigations or the Drug Enforcement Agency of the federal government.

"It all depends on the situation. If we don't have to work quickly and it is important enough, we can request the help of the DEA or the KBI. However, they decide if they want to help or not," Woodward said.

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, warns that the danger in cocaine is not in addiction alone.

"Dr. Mark Gold, founder of the 1-800-COCAINE help line, told me that there is no known antidote for an overdose of cocaine. If someone overdoses with some other drug, the doctors may be able to save them. But all you can do with cocaine is watch someone die. That scares the hell out of me," he said.

Police say K-State freshman died from cocaine overdose

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Staff Writer

Buffy Larsen, freshman in psychology, died of a cocaine overdose on Dec. 12, 1986, at about 4 a.m., according the Riley County Police Department.

The 18-year-old woman was from Salina. Her parents are Oscar and Ruth Larsen, 1025 Gypsum St. She had two brothers and four sisters.

According to police reports, she was attending a party at 2233 Sloan St. She began having seizures about 2 a.m. after using cocaine. An ambulance took her to Memorial Hospital where doctors attempted to revive her.

Larsen's mother described Buffy as a happy-go-lucky person who was very cheerful and loving. One of her strongest traits was her thoughtfulness.

"(Buffy) was the type of person who would think for a long time before she bought you a birthday gift. She was just that thoughtful.

"If she came home late, she would come in and wake me up," Larsen said. "She didn't want me to be up worrying all night."

Larsen said when her daughter wasn't working she enjoyed reading, especially Stephen King novels. But her favorite hobby was drawing.

"(Buffy) loved her art very much," she said. "She loved to draw, especially people. Her pictures were always full of bright colors."

As to her daughter's use of drugs, Larsen said Buffy had voiced her displeasure about people using them. This past summer Buffy and one of her sisters were at a party where cocaine was in use.

Larsen said Buffy turned to her sister and said, "Let's get out of here. These people are stupid."

"I'm sure that Buffy never thought this would happen," she said. "If she would have known the danger, I'm sure she never would have done it."

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug and Education Services, said he hopes people realize this is not a stereotypical drug-related death.

"This is not a case of a habitual drug user dying. This is someone who drank a little bit, and experimented a little bit. Unfortunately, she did too much," he said.

"Sometimes I think this isn't happening, but I know it is," Larsen said. "I don't think anybody would do drugs if they knew the pain and anguish they can leave behind."

All-terrain vehicles becoming commonplace on area farms

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

For some farmers, selecting an all-terrain vehicle for farm use is similar to selecting another piece of farm equipment.

"The farmers are whom I basically sell to around this area, and most of them are turning to the four-wheelers," said Ralph Brooks, owner of Brooks Yamaha, 701 Enoch Lane on east Highway 24.

Because of their many uses on the farm and their automation, ATVs are replacing some traditional equipment. Farmers are using ATVs for a utility vehicle, viewing this as a more convenient means of transportation than walking, said David Pacey, extension agricultural engineer.

ATVs are also replacing some of the duties of the pickup — traveling short distances, carrying tools and other farm-related jobs.

"The ATVs can maneuver in places where a pickup would be obsolete. Farmers are using the four-wheelers in jobs like fixing fence and spot-checking irrigation units when they have to be out in the fields several times a day," Pacey said.

"The farmers are now showing interest in the four-wheel drive models. I don't know if this will become very popular because of the expense factor. The four-wheel drive will increase the current price of four-wheelers by $800 to $1,000, so you can see there is a big difference," Brooks said.

Yamaha will be introducing a new model this spring which will feature a Power Take-Off shaft. This will provide the farmer with a very useful piece of farm machinery that can be attached to a PTO mower or other farm equipment. The new PTO model should be available sometime in April and will also increase the price by $1,000.

Another improvement that falls into the category of new features is a better-equipped reverse. The manufacturers are designing the new reverse to make it more convenient for shifting and still have the safety aspect.

"In some ways, the manufacturers want to make it a hassle because they don't want you to accidently shift the ATV into reverse without knowing it. They want you to do something deliberate to get in reverse," Pacey said.

Farmers are turning to the four-wheel models over the three-wheelers because of the added stability of the extra wheel. Four-wheel ATVs are also better suited for straddling growing plants in row crop production.

"But talking from the farm-use standpoint, there are quite a few more four-wheelers than in the past," Pacey said.

Even though three-wheel ATVs are generally less expensive, lighter and take up less space for hauling and storing, for the agriculture use, the four-wheeler is more popular, Pacey said.

There is still a mind-set among consumers that ATVs, in general, are dangerous.

"I don't agree with this," Pacey said. "I think it is the operator that determines how safe the machine will be, but this is true about all machines."

Pacey's area of research is machinery, but he said the operator cannot overlook the safety of ATVs.

"The No. 1 problem with all-terrain vehicles used on the farm is that safety precautions are not observed," Pacey said. "The No. 1 abuse, I see, is the use of helmets. Rarely do you see farmers wearing helmets, and yet a survey conducted looking specifically at use of ATVs on the farms showed that 40 percent of fatalities were caused by head injuries that a $20 helmet might have prevented."

"There has been a lot of material on safety distributed, and a few films have been produced on the safety of all-terrain vehicles," Brooks said. "We've even put on a few demonstrations for Farm Bureau at one time, but the bad publicity has really killed the three-wheelers."

'Cats gearing for 13th win in ISU match

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

Looking to record its fourth-consecutive victory since a 70-47 loss to Oklahoma on Jan. 6, K-State's women's basketball team will host Iowa State Saturday at Ahearn Field House in the final contest of a four-game home stand.

K-State, 12-3 overall and off to its best start since the 1983-84 season, evened its Big Eight Conference record at 1-1 Wednesday with an 81-76 home court win against Nebraska. In the process, the Lady Cats extended their home-court winning streak to nine games.

Iowa State, 10-5, dropped its conference mark to 0-2 with a heartbreaking 72-71 loss to Colorado Wednesday in Ames. The Lady Cyclones' other conference loss was a 71-68 defeat by Missouri in Columbia.

"They (Iowa State) have three of their five starters back from last year's team," Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman said. "They've played very well and lost some close games, and I think losing to Colorado at home has got to dampen their spirits a little bit."

Starters returning for Iowa State include 6-foot-1 senior center Stephanie Smith, 5-7 junior guard Etta Burns and 5-9 senior guard Sandy Hafner.

Last season, Smith led the Lady Cyclones in scoring (17.2 points for game), rebounding (10.6 boards per game), and blocked shots (46 for the season), and was selected as a honorable mention on the All-Big Eight Basketball Team. Mossman said Smith once again is a key player on the Iowa State squad.

Orr attempts to snap Ahearn jinx

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Iowa State Coach Johnny Orr and his Cyclones will attempt to put a halt to the Wildcats' undefeated record at home this season when Iowa State faces K-State Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

K-State, 11-3 overall and 1-3 in the Big Eight Conference, is 7-0 at home this season. Game time is set for 3:10 p.m. and will be televised by the Kansas State Network.

Orr, in his eighth year at Iowa State, recorded his 100th victory at the school Wednesday night when his squad defeated Colorado 66-52 in Ames.

"We'd like to do anything we can to slow down that win record," Coach Lon Kruger said.

Iowa State is 9-5 overall and 1-0 in conference play.

Last season, the Cyclones finished second in the Big Eight Conference's regular-season standings and postseason tournament. Iowa State set a school record with 22 wins including victories against Kansas, Iowa, Michigan State, Oklahoma and Big Ten Champion Michigan — all were ranked among the nation's top 20.

Iowa State went on to finish as one of the nation's final 16 teams in the NCAA Tournament, losing 70-66 to North Carolina State in the third round of the Midwest Regional.

This season, though, the team has been weakened with the loss of first team All-Big Eight Conference guard Jeff Hornacek and key players David Moss and Ronnie Virgil. This weakness has particulary been tested early in the season with a schedule that pitted the Cyclones against six teams that participated in postseason tournaments last year.

From that group the Cyclones are 3-3, posting victories over Drake, Texas and Dayton, with losses to Michigan State, Iowa and Auburn. Other ISU losses were to Creighton and Illinois State.

In scoring, 6-foot-5 senior forward Jeff Grayer and 6-7 senior forward Tom Schafer lead the way for Iowa State. Both average in double figures.

Grayer, in three seasons of play, ranks 44th in Big Eight career scoring with 1,343 points and was also a preseason All-American pick. He leads the team in scoring averaging 21.4 points a game.

Grayer suffered a sprained ankle in practice last week, which led to some speculation of his condition for play against Colorado and K-State. He ended all speculation, though, in leading Iowa State with 22 points in their 14-point victory against Colorado.

"Yeah, there was no indication of an injury," said Kruger, who attended the Iowa State-Colorado game. "He played about 37 minutes of good basketball."

Schafer is second in scoring for the Cyclones, averaging 16.5 points per game.

Supporting roles in the Iowa State contingency for Saturday's game are expected to come from 6-9 senior center Sam Hill, who is averaging 7.8 rebounds a game and ranks 49th in Big Eight career rebounding with 627. Freshman guard Terry Woods and junior guard Gary Thompkins are expected to start as well.

On paper the 'Cats appear to be considerably stronger. With five players averaging in double figures, coupled with the return of standout Norris Coleman, a victory would seemingly be at hand. But

See CYCLONES, Page 12

Staff/Andy Nelson

Iowa State University forward Jeff Grayer has led the Cyclones to a 9-5 record with a 21.4 scoring average. K-State and Iowa State clash Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

Las Vegas offers offbeat bets

By The Associated Press

The New York Giants are favored by 9½ points over the Denver Broncos in the Super Bowl. They're favored to outscore Denver by three points in the first quarter, three points in the third quarter and three points in the fourth.

But the second quarter is pick 'em.

Las Vegas odds-makers, never at a loss for figuring out ways to take a bettor's money, have come up with their annual list of offbeat wagers for the Jan. 25 spectacle in Pasadena, Calif.

You can get 7-5 that Raul Allegre, New York's placekicker, will score the game's first points and 8-5 that it will be Rich Karlis, his Denver counterpart. The Giants' Joe Morris is 3-1 and the Broncos' Sammy Winder 5-1.

Nobody has run successfully against the Giants this year, so Denver's John Elway is 7-5 to pass for more yards than Phil Simms. But it's even money as to who will have the higher percentage.

If you like the Giants, ignoring the points, you have to bet $380 to win $100 straight up. If you like the Broncos, you can wager $100 to win $300.

A lot of things are even money.

Like who will get the first first down; who will have the longest kickoff and punt returns; who will kick the first field goal and who will miss the first field goal.

You can bet over-under: over 40 points or under for both teams; over or under 24 points for the Giants; over or under 14 for the Broncos; over or under six sacks or three interceptions combined; over or under a total of three field goals in the game.

And if you don't like Allegre, Karlis, Morris or Winder, you can wager on some other guys to score the first touchdown.

Like Simms at 7-1; Elway and New York tight end Mark Bavaro at 8-1; wide receivers Lionel Manuel of the Giants and Steve Watson of the Broncos at 12-1 and someone named Mark Johnson (presumably either Mark Jackson or Vance Johnson of the Broncos) at 15-1.

The field, meaning everyone else, is 12-1.

Oh, yes, the coin toss is even money.

As for the players' reaction to the point spread, the word out of Denver is that Super Bowl XXI will be a close game because the Broncos weren't blown out in their visit to New York during the season.

Well, the Giants have heard the word and the message heading West Thursday is: "We're a lot better team now."

And it's being said by a lot of players.

"We were in a little bit of a down cycle offensively when we played them the first time," Giants guard Chris Godfrey. "It was a struggle for us. I think they are an excellent club, but we're playing better now."

Fellow guard Billy Ard said the Giants were a team in transformation in November.

"We're not the same," he said. "We were going through change then. We were developing into a fine team. We're an excellent team now."

There is no doubt the Giants struggled on offense in posting a 19-16 victory over the Broncos Nov. 23. New York was outgained on offense 405-262 and failed to score a touchdown, with defensive end George Martin returning an interception 78 yards for the Giants' only TD.

"They didn't let us move the ball on the ground," said Giants Coach Bill Parcells, whose team gained 143 yards on 36 carries. "We got down close, but we didn't score TDs."

One of the major weapons missing from the Giants' offense in November was wide receiver Lionel Manuel, who was reactivated for the San Francisco playoff game after recovering from a knee injury.

"He definitely opens things for me," said wide receiver Bobby Johnson. "He runs routes like nobody in the NFL."

OU buries Hawks on late field goal

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Tim McCalister made a jump shot with eight seconds remaining and teammate Ricky Grace blocked a last-second shot as No. 16 Oklahoma defeated 20th-ranked Kansas, 76-74, in Big Eight Conference basketball Thursday night.

McCalister, who finished with 21 points, hit his fading jumper from left of the key after Oklahoma twice got offensive rebounds in the final minute to keep possession of the ball.

Kansas, which had to go the length of the floor following a timeout, got the ball to reserve guard Mark Turgeon. But Turgeon's three-point jumper was cleanly blocked by Grace as the buzzer sounded.

Oklahoma, 11-3 overall and 1-1 in the conference, trailed 61-56 with 6:50 remaining after Kansas went on a 9-0 run, six of the points coming from guard Kevin Pritchard.

But the Sooners went on a run of their own, with David Johnson coming off the bench to score five points in just over a minute as Oklahoma went ahead 64-61, with 5:39 left.

From then on the two teams traded baskets. Kansas, 9-5 and 2-1, took a 74-72 lead with 1:54 to play when Mark Randall made two free throws. Oklahoma then missed three shots and Kansas missed one before McCalister's game-winning shot.

All-Americans, top recruits will pace K-State's track teams

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

Track coach John Capriotti looks to tone his teams for future competition when K-State's men's and women's track squads open the indoor track season Saturday at the Nebraska Invitational in Lincoln.

With All-American performers on each team, K-State is a top contender for a Big Eight Conference title in the women's division and will challenge for a top-three finish in the men's race.

But just like he did in cross country, Capriotti will save his best athletes for key meets.

"This week in Nebraska just happens to be a scoring meet, but we're not going to worry about the score," Capriotti said. "We're going to go there and run some quality races and that's it."

Injured athletes could hamper the teams' performance early, but Capriotti said scores aren't important because he coaches conservatively at this stage of the season.

"I'm very cautious about it because (in early meets) you're more apt to run kids who are not ready," he said. "Our goals are the Big Eight meet and getting as many people to qualify for the national meet as possible."

For the women, Capriotti said All-American field performer Pinkie Suggs, who was redshirted last year to train under then new coach Scott Bennett, has an excellent chance to qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships slated for March.

"Pinkie Suggs would have to be one of our top women," Capriotti said. "She's a former Big Eight champion and she has already thrown 52 feet in the shot put, which is good enough to qualify. She should qualify for the national meet this weekend."

Capriotti listed sophomore hurdler Kim Kilpatrick, freshman sprinter Joy Jones, senior sprinter Anita Isom and junior sprinter and jumper Felicia Carpenter as the women who should lead the speed corps in scoring this year.

Distance scoring should be absorbed by Chris Vanatta, Betsy Silzer, Alysun Deckert, Anneli Edling and Angie Barry, Capriotti said.

"There's just a host of girls who are going to help us to be very strong in that area," he said.

All-American Jacque Struckhoff will be redshirted for the indoor season to give her more time to train, Capriotti said. Another All-American, Anne Stadler, has just started training and is five or six weeks away from being able to compete.

"The women's team has a lot of real good athletes on it, but our depth is hurting in a few places," Capriotti said. "We're looking good, but I'm very cautious at this point because we've got some key people who are still a little bit injured."

Capriotti said Jones, Deckert, Silzer and Barry are all coming off minor injuries.

K-State's women should finish in the top two of the Big Eight, Capriotti said, with the biggest challenge for the conference title coming from the University of Nebraska.

"They've won the Big Eight indoor and outdoor meet in track every year that it's been held. We've been second to them for the last three years," Capriotti said.

"Our up-front people are as good as theirs, but I don't know if we have the depth to beat them," he added.

All-American jumper Kenny Harrison should lead the men's squad in scoring this year, according to Capriotti.

"Kenny Harrison is the top gun we have," Capriotti said. "He was an NCAA champion last year indoor and outdoor (in long jump and triple jump, respectively) and he's one of the best track and field athletes in the country."

In addition to Harrison's scoring, several other performers will help the Wildcats including last year's Big Eight high jump champion Brad Speer and last year's conference discus runner-up Dan O'Mara.

Distance runners Ron Stahl, Pat Hessini, Jim Knudsen, Jan Jonsson, David Warders and David Keller will also tally points for the 'Cats, Capriotti said.

Recruitment of new talent will greatly improve the sprint area. In the off-season, Capriotti signed Harold Williams, Missouri's high school hurdles champion, along with junior college transfers Jeff Reynolds and Sean Banks. Reynolds and Banks ran times in their respective juco events fast enough to win the Big Eight last year.

"The men are looking good. We have good depth in the sprints and distances, but we don't have a lot of depth in some of the field events," he said. "We have good people there, but we don't have depth, so we're goingto have to keep everybody healthy."

Capriotti said preseason favorites in the Big Eight men's division are Nebraska and Iowa State.

"The rest of the teams, including us, are a toss-up," he said. "We'd like to be in the top two or three and possibly have a shot at winning, but it just doesn't look like we'll have the depth to win the conference."

At the Nebraska Invitational meet at 2:30 p.m. Saturday, K-State will compete with Drake, Wichita State, Wyoming and Nebraska.

"Even though we will not be at full strength, we're anxious to get the season under way," Capriotti said.

Staff/John La Barge

Discus thrower Dan O'Mara, runner-up at the Big Eight Conference Championship last year, works out Thursday in the Brandeberry Indoor Complex for the Nebraska Invitational. K-State's men's and women's squads will compete against teams from four universities Saturday meet in Lincoln.

Construction workers report stolen explosives

From Staff and Wire Reports

Sometime between Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning, explosives and construction equipment were stolen from a Manhattan construction site.

Workmen discovered the burglary of the trailers when they arrived Wednesday morning, said Capt. Larry Woodyard, commander of the Riley County Police Department's investigative division.

He said the RCPD is investigating a few leads about the burglary at Kimball Quarry.

Items stolen from the Bayer Construction Co. site included several sticks of dynamite, several bags of ammonia nitrate, blasting caps, wiring and a "sequential timer shooter," an instrument used to control multiple settings of detonations, Woodyard said.

Other construction equipment, including acetylene and oxygen tanks, were also taken. Police said they didn't know if all the items were taken at once, or if there were two separate burglaries.

The total estimated loss from the burglary is nearly $6,000, with the control box accounting for $3,000 of the total.

"We're concerned that if it's in the hands of someone familiar with (explosives), what do they intend to do with it?" Woodyard said.

Burke Bayer, president of Bayer Construction Co., said the use of the explosive materials depended on the skill and knowledge of the possessor.

"If you don't know how to use it, it isn't extremely sensitive," he said.

Normally used as a fast-acting fertilizer, Woodyard said ammonia nitrate is "capable of being an explosive medium."

To act as an explosive, the substance requires "something that gives a sharp crack" to ignite it, said Cliff Meloan, professor of analytical chemistry. If the substance becomes too hot, it could ignite by itself.

A stick of dynamite could act as a detonator for the ammonia nitrate, Meloan said.

Woodyard said the RCPD has taken precautionary measures and notified the Manhattan Fire Department, area law enforcement at Fort Riley and Junction City, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Kansas courts continue camera testing

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Cameras and recording devices are being tested in Kansas courtrooms until March 1, 1988, by order of the Kansas Supreme Court. The order was delivered on Feb. 13, and allows news media and educational television stations to photograph and record public proceedings before Kansas District Courts.

The order was a result of a 1981 U.S. Supreme Court case, Chandler vs. Florida, which stated that cameras in the courtroom did not necessarily result in unfair trials because of publicity. It allowed each state to make its own decisions concerning cameras in courtrooms.

Kansas began its process of deciding how cameras should be handled in the courtrooms by first testing cameras and recording devices in selected courts around the state, said Al Singleton, Riley County court administrator. After a successful trial in these courtrooms, access was extended statewide, Singleton said.

"There will be extensive evaluation of this trial effort for the Supreme Court to make its decision at the expiration of this order, just as there was before the decision was made to go statewide," Singleton said.

He said, "I believe the order most undoubtedly will be extended after the expiration date. There has been no problem at all."

"It will be a whole new thing for the court. We will have to move slowly into it. Eventually, it will be good," Singleton said. "The court is the least understood of the three branches of government. As we move into this more, the media will be more involved in taking pictures and recording and providing the public with information from court proceedings.

"We haven't had that much experience with it yet," Singleton said.

"The media usually looks for sensational cases. We haven't had that many cases of this type yet," he said.

Under this same order, the administrative judge for each district designates a media coordinator who works with the administrative judge, the trial judge and the media in implementing the privilege conferred. In the Riley County District, Harry Marsh, professor of journalism and mass communications, was designated as the media coordinator.

"The major benefit of the media coordinator positon is to allow the courts to function without being deluged in requests from the media for access to courtrooms," Marsh said.

Singleton said the process implemented has been working very well. He explained how the media was involved from the start to ensure that the program worked.

"They were all (media) invited to come in and meet with the judges, Marsh and myself at the start of the program," Singleton said.

Marsh said there has only been about "a half-dozen" requests for camera and recording access to Riley county courtrooms since March 1, 1986, when the Riley County policy was adopted. Only one request has been turned down, Marsh said.

KMAN-KMKF was refused permission to tape-record proceedings in the trial of Sam Samarrai, a Manhattan businessman who was later aquitted.

Jerry Mershon, administrative judge for Riley County District Court, refused permission in a letter sent to KMAN-KMKF because, "this case started prior to the effective date of the Supreme Court rule and because tape-recording was not available for most of the case."

Marsh said, "I have seen a couple of photographs taken in court. Although they are not the best news pictures I have ever seen, this access could be of real value. The courts need to be covered more photographically because people don't get to see this type of thing very much."

Most people only read about what takes place in the courtroom. They don't have many opportunities to see what takes place, he said.

The conditions and procedures listed under the order state, "The privilege...does not limit or restrict the power, authority or responsibility of the trial judge to control the proceedings before the judge. The authority of the trial judge to exclude the media...at a proceeding...extends to any person engaging in the privilege authorized."

The order also states that the trial judge must prohibit the audio recording and photographing of a person involved in a court proceeding if the person requests it and is a victim or witness of a crime, a police informant, an undercover agent or a relocated witness or juvenile.

Audio recording and photographing will also be prohibited if a participant so requests and it is a divorce proceeding, a case involving trade secrets or an evidentiary suppression hearing.

Lady Cats

"We've got to come in here Saturday afternoon and take advantage of them early on," Mossman said. "They are a team that's trying to get their confidence back and trying to get something going. We just can't let that happen at home."

K-State leads the series 18-2, with the Lady Cats' last loss to the Cyclones coming at home, 75-65, during the 1984-85 season.

Iowa State coach Pat Wettig, now in her third season at Ames, led the Lady Cyclones to a 19-9 record — the best single-season record in the history of the team — and was selected the Big Eight Coach of the Year. The team finished 8-6 in the Big Eight.

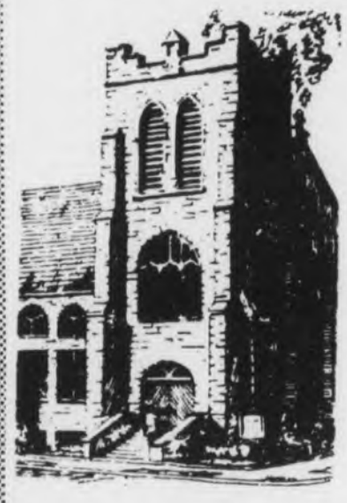
Lon Kruger takes nothing for granted.



"They are a good, quick ball club who had a bit of a slow start. They're a tough team," he said.

NOTES: The Kansas State athletic ticket office has announced that the men's basketball game with Kansas at Ahearn Field House on February 4th is a sellout except for a few student season tickets that remain unsold...K-State leads the overall series with the Cyclones 105-55...Iowa State has won four of the last five meetings...Iowa State is 0-3 on the road this season...ISU is 1-7 in its last eight trips to Manhattan and each of the last seven meetings were decided by 10 or fewer points.

Suspended professor ends efforts to teach

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Suspended theology professor Charles Curran Thursday ended his efforts to teach at Catholic University of America this semester, saying that to keep pushing could hurt his students and Catholic education in general.

But Curran, a priest, said he would continue his fight for eventual reinstatement.

The university on Wednesday, just before the beginning of the school's spring term Thursday, canceled the three courses he normally teaches.

Curran said Thursday that if he conducted the classes anyway while appealing the suspension, as he had said earlier he would do, students would not know whether they eventually would get credit.

In addition, Curran provided copies of a letter to him in which the university's chancellor, Archbishop James Hickey of Washington, threatened to invoke a Roman Catholic canon law provision that Curran said could spread the controversy to other Catholic institutions.

Curran's suspension, announced Monday, was not based on that canon but on a ruling in his specific case last summer by the Vatican, which pronounced him unfit to teach as a Catholic theologian because of his dissenting views on issues of sexual ethics.

That pronouncement was important in Curran's case because Catholic University, the only Vatican-chartered university in this country, requires a church-sponsored "canonical mission" — or theologian's license — for teachers in its theology department.

Similar requirements do not exist at independent Catholic universities, such as Notre Dame, Georgetown and others, and the canon law cited by Hickey has not been invoked at any U.S. school.

Curran's comments were included in a letter to Hickey that he released Thursday.

Curran said Monday that Hickey lacked authority for a total suspension, and he said he would teach his courses anyway.

Among Curran's points of dissent from church leaders' teaching are his views that contraception and sterilization "are not intrinsically evil," that for a "genuine homosexual, homosexual acts in the context of a loving relationship striving for permanency can in a certain sense be objectively morally acceptable" and that "in certain circumstances" the church should allow divorce.

Parade

future volunteer activity.

The parade was viewed via satellite and cable television by approximately 150 million people in the United States and 40 other countries.

Baggerly said it was the most exciting marching group in which he had ever performed, and he would rather it be his last.

"To tell you the truth, I really don't want to march again...it was the epitome of eveything I have ever worked for," Baggerly said of the event.

Baggerly said he has marched in several bands, including the world's largest marching band, formed during Band Day two years ago at K-State.

But, he said, "I had never done anything like this...it was rad!" — a California colloquialism meaning something similar to "great."

Baggerly, who is a member of the KSU Marching Band and the Kansas State Orchestra, is one of three United Way representatives from Kansas. Wichita State University and Washburn University also sent representatives.

The Musical Ambassadors were selected for their scholastic achievement, civic leadership and musical talent from colleges and universities across the country.

Baggerly said the 108 Musical Ambassadors made up the trumpet section, and the rest of the band comprised California students. Altogether, more than 400 United Way volunteers participated in the presentation.

"I didn't know anybody when I left for California, and I didn't want to know anybody. I wanted to get out there and make friends, which is what I did," Baggerly said.

He said that on the day they were leaving to return home, many of the participants "stood around crying and trying to find something else on the radio besides the sad songs they were playing that day, such as 'Breaking Up Is Hard to Do.'"

To prepare themselves for the role of volunteer ambassador, representatives attended workshops on how to improve communication skills and motivate volunteers to participate in activities on campus and in their community.

Yamaha International donated instruments for the players to use during the parade. Baggerly said receiving the instruments before dinner one evening was a problem because no one wanted to eat dinner.

"Everyone was too busy trying out their new instruments," he said. "They finally had to tell us to put the horns away.

"The first time we practiced in the auditorium with all those horns, the sound was just memorable."

Baggerly said he didn't experience the anxiety of the selection process through which most of the participants went.

"I guess I was just the logical choice because of my position as section leader (in the K-State Marching Band) and other activities I have been involved in," he said. "They told me if the Riley County chapter of the United Way could afford to send me, I would go.

"Dr. (Paul) Shull, (professor of music), asked me into his office one day. He asked what I was doing on New Year's Day and if I would like to represent Riley County in the United Way presentation in the Rose Bowl Parade."

Baggerly said he joked with Shull about accepting the offer at first, but when Shull jokingly said they could give the opportunity to someone else, Baggerly immediately accepted the offer.

Baggerly said the KSU Marching Band Foundation helped the Riley County chapter of the United Way pay for his trip.

King

General Robert T. Stephan.

Although King's birthday was Thursday, the federally-designated holiday will not be observed until Monday.

"My dream as governor is to make Kansas a place of greater equality," Hayden said during brief remarks. "Let us commit ourselves by living the dream."

Hayden presented the Governor's Martin Luther King Jr. Award to Emmett J. Tucker Jr., a longtime Kansas City, Kan., community activist. Tucker has been active in the United Way and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Tucker cited King's legacy of nonviolent activism in accepting the honor.

"Injustices and inequalities still seek to erode our creativity," Tucker said.

Chester C. Owens, a Kansas City, Kan., city councilman, urged the crowd to use King's philosophy to confront social problems such as poverty and the nuclear arms race.

"The words of King rang loudly when he stated, 'We must learn to live together as brothers or perish as fools,'" Owens said. "We must commit ourselves to seeing that poverty and the conditions that create poverty can and will be eliminated."

Owens also urged the crowd to action.

"As we celebrate, we must be resolved that this day does not become a day of speeches," Owens said. "History will record whether we pick up the gauntlet thrown down by King."

Weinberger hints for early SDI deployment

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Campaigning in Congress this week for a $2 billion boost in Star Wars spending, Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger tantalized some lawmakers and alarmed others with hints that he favors deploying the shield against nuclear attack far earlier than originally envisioned.

President Reagan last August cautioned Star Wars boosters not to get "antsy," but Weinberger, responding to pressure from conservatives on Capitol Hill, said several times this week that he would like to see some elements of an anti-missile defense deployed "just as soon as we can."

Since Reagan launched the Star Wars program in 1983, his aides have said the research was designed to allow officials to decide in the early 1990s whether to build and deploy an anti-missile shield. But Weinberger's remarks suggested that the cornerstone of the system could be put in place sooner.

"I am very fearful that the patience of Congress is very thin," Sen. Dan Quayle, R-Ind., told Weinberger during a meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee on Monday.

"It will also focus on some of the continuing concerns that involve King's efforts still today," said Stewart. "The reflection of the observance will be in terms of how do we continue the work he (King) so effectively initiated."

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services and chairman of the committees for the week's events, said the campus activities reflect the national recognition of the civil rights leader.

"This is the second year of the national holiday dedicated to Martin Luther King Jr.," Sutton said, "and it's important that we as a university environment take part, so we're putting forth a series of programs for people to get the feel of King's work and his spirit.

grams," he said.

Ligon agreed.

"(Athletic Director Larry Travis) did not come to us because of the debt," he said. "I don't think it was a bail out."

No matter what its intentions, the athletic department needs money, Folk said.

A state mandate will force the department to raise classified employees' salaries "in the near future," Folk said.

In addition, the department will have to come up with about $70,000 this year as part of the 3 percent institutional support fee recently mandated by the administration.

The task force meets Tuesday at 5 p.m. in the Student Government Services office.

Regents OK pay cuts, construction

Regents order salary reductions

From Staff and Wire Reports

Using a failed legislative amendment as an impetus, the state Board of Regents decided at its Friday meeting to cut the salaries of the Regents schools' presidents by 3.8 percent over the next five months. The largely symbolic gesture comes as the state's agencies are reeling from a nearly $60 million budget cut passed Thursday by the Senate and signed Friday by Gov. Mike Hayden.

Last week, the House Appropriations Committee proposed an amendment to the $60 million cut, one which would have dealt a 3.8 percent salary reduction to every state employee earning more than $50,000 annually. Although the amendment failed, the Board of Regents decided it would follow the "legislative intent" of the amendment and mandate the cuts.

"The board indicated it would comply with the legislative intent that the presidents reduce their salaries by 3.8 percent," said Stanley Koplik, Board of Regents executive director. Koplik said the cuts are mandatory.

He said he has heard no indication of disagreement with the board's action.

"There's no strong outcry," he said.

In addition to the salaries of the presidents of the six Regents universities, Anthony Tilmans, the head of Kansas Technical Institute in Salina, Koplik, and Warren Corman, Regents director of facilities, will absorb a cut of 3.8 percent over the next five months. The officials make between $54,444 and $110,393 in salary and benefits.

Corman makes the least, and University of Kansas Chancellor Gene Budig earns the highest of the affected salaries. The cuts will save the state $11,428.

The salary cuts were endorsed by President Jon Wefald, who called them "fair and appropriate." However, he said the cuts should not be extended to faculty and staff.

"I am not in favor of anybody else at K-State (including) faculty or staff being decreased by 3.8 percent," he said. "We've already come up with our 3.8 percent cut for the University, which was over $3 million. My feeling is that as an institution we've already reduced. I think it ought to stop right there."

Wefald said if the cut was extended to faculty and staff, the University would be in jeopardy of losing valuable employees.

"I think that would be really counterproductive," he said. "For any of our staff and faculty to be cut would be a disaster. It would be demoralizing."

Wefald, who termed the presidents' salary reductions as "symbolic," said the approximately $11,000 shaved off the state's budget by the cuts would have little affect on the state's financial crisis.

Koplik agreed.

"I don't think it will have an impact on the state's financial crisis," Koplik said. "Certainly, it is a gesture of popular good will."

Wefald said he believed most university presidents would go along with the Regents action.

K-State receives funds for center

By CHRIS DOLL
Staff Writer

The Kansas Board of Regents Friday approved K-State's request to spend $4 million in federal money to build an educational communication center.

Plans for the center include three studios and a satellite dish enabling the University to produce programs that students could take for credit, said Robert Lowman, associate dean of the graduate school.

"For some students, it's not convenient to come to K-State," Lowman said in an interview after the Regents' meeting in Topeka.

"K-State is the only university in the United States that offers a master's in food science. This type of program will appeal to people all over the United States — even the world," he said.

The system will have one-way video and two-way audio so users will be able to see a program on television, and also call the instuctor with questions or comments, Lowman said.

Currently, when students take correspondence courses they must provide their own video cassette player and get the video cassettes from the University.

When the new system is operational, people with C-band or KU-band satellite dishes (common frequencies used in satellite dishes) will be able to receive programming from the University, Lowman said.

"There's a significant number of people out there with KU-bands," Lowman said. Most new dishes can be converted.

The University had originally requested $5.4 million in state funds which would pay for operational and personnel costs. The money would have been phased in over a four-year period. The building money, $3.2 million, would have come from federal funds, Lowman said.

The University has not decided whether to build a new building or use Van Zile, a residence hall not in use.

Van Zile may sound cheaper, Lowman said, but it may not be cheaper because of special building requirements needed for the center.

In October, the University was guaranteed $4 million from the federal government for the project. In addition, $2 million more in federal money could be sanctioned the following year, Lowman said.

"There is an excellent chance to get the $2 million," he said.

The state's cost will be less because of the federal grants. Because the federal grants are so large and will be able to be used so quickly, the University may complete the building before it has enough money from the state to pay for operational and personnel costs, Lowman said.

"We could get started, but we would not be able to go too far," he said.

In other business, the Board of Regents "strongly recommended" all Regents schools' presidents to take a 3.8 percent pay cut over the next five months.

The Kansas Senate considered a bill last week that would cut the pay

Governor appoints 4 regents

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden Friday announced four appointees to the state Board of Regents to replace four Democratic members who resigned or whose terms expired Dec. 31.

Three are Democrats and one is a Republican, giving the GOP a majority of five on the nine-member board for the first time since the late 1970s.

The Republican appointed by Hayden is Linwood Sexton of Sedgwick, which is on the Sedgwick-Harvey County line northwest of Wichita.

The three Democrats picked by Hayden are Atchison attorney Richard P. Senecal, Fort Scott school teacher Shirley Palmer and Hays lawyer Norman W. Jeter.

The new board members attended their first meeting of the regents here Friday.

The four Hayden appointees replace Sandra McMullen of Hutchinson, Patricia Caruthers of Kansas City, Dr. William Roy of Topeka and John G. Montgomery of Junction City. The terms of McMullen, Caruthers and Roy expired at the end of December, while Montgomery resigned last year to run for lieutenant governor with Tom Docking. Hayden defeated Docking in the November election to win the governorship.

Senecal, 51, organized Democrats for former Republican U.S. Rep. Jim Jeffries in 1978 when he unseated Democrat Martha Keys in the 2nd District congressional race.

None of the appointees did his or her undergraduate work at the University of Kansas or Kansas State University, the state's two biggest institutions although one received a law degree from KU.

Sexton is a graduate of Wichita State University, Senecal of St. Benedict's College, Palmer of Pittsburg State University and Jeter of Ottawa University. Senecal received his law degree from Washburn University of Topeka and Jeter got his law degree from KU.

Hayden told a news conference announcing his regents selections that he picked these four people mainly for geographical balance, but also because he wanted people with "toughness" to make hard decisions which lie ahead on such issues as governance of the regents' system and admission of Washburn into that system.

Panel investigating NSC meets with frustration

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A White House panel examining the National Security Council's role in the Iran-Contra affair has been frustrated in obtaining some of the information it needs and may ask for more time, sources said Sunday.

Herbert E. Hetu, spokesman for the Special Review Board headed by former Republican Sen. John Tower of Texas, did not know whether the board would ask for an extension of its Jan. 29 deadline. But Hetu conceded that there are "compelling reasons why we might need one."

In other news involving the Iran-Contra affair, Secretary of State George Shultz on Sunday reiterated his position that he thought the policy of selling arms to Iran had been derailed and said he was unaware of a presidential order, known as a finding, signed in January 1986 by President Reagan that spelled out the policy.

"I did make my views known, periodically," Shultz said on NBC-TV's "Meet the Press." "The finding that was read out was not known to me. Nobody told me that."

The three-member panel examining the NSC has been especially frustrated in its work by the refusal to testify of Adm. John Poindexter, who resigned as national security adviser because of the Iran-Contra revelations; Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, the NSC aide who was fired for his role; retired Air Force Gen. Richard V. Secord, who was involved in the arms shipments; and Albert Hakim, an Iranaian-born business associate of Secord.

"That's tough," Hetu said. "They're the big players."

Hetu said difficulties have also been caused by the illness of CIA Director William J. Casey, who is recovering from an operation for a malignant brain tumor.

The board has not yet been able to interview Reagan, although it has asked for an interview and the White House says it will be granted.

"We didn't expect, and I guess he didn't either, that he would have to go in the hospital for a while," Hetu said. The president is recuperating from a prostate operation performed Jan. 5.

Hetu said the board expects to interview the three living former presidents, Richard M. Nixon, Gerald R. Ford and Jimmy Carter, within the next week. He said some of the interviews would be in Washington and some elsewhere, and all would be conducted by the panel members, accompanied by key aides.

Hetu said the panel had also been unable to obtain records of Swiss bank accounts through which funds from secret arms sales to Iran are said to have been diverted to aid rebels fighting the Marxist-led government of Nicaragau.

To further complicate matters, the panel's frustrated efforts come on the heels of former national security adviser Robert C. McFarlane's testitimony to Congress Friday that Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger "knew what was going on" during the decision to sanction arms sales as part of a bid to forge ties with moderates in Iran.

McFarlane also said President Reagan was warned "very emphatically" by his advisers that if the dealings became public, it would look like he was simply trading U.S. arms for the release of Americans held hostage in Lebanon.

McFarlane testified to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as the White House was denying that Reagan has distanced himself from the controversy surrounding the clandestine arms sales and alleged diversions of sales proceeds to Nicaraguan rebels.

Not long after a Reagan spokesman was quizzed by reporters about the president's attention to the problem, David Abshire, the retired NATO envoy brought in to coordinate the White House's handling of the various Iran-Contra investigations, issued a statement saying:

"The president is continuing to follow closely the efforts to compile all the facts regarding the Iran issue currently under investigation. The president met with me Monday and will be meeting with me on a regular basis."

Abshire said Reagan "wants to be absolutely certain" that Congress, an independent counsel and a presidential investigative panel looking into National Security Council operations, "are receiving all the materials and information they need for a comprehensive and expeditious review of the issue. The president remains committed to his pledge to the American people that they get all the facts."

McFarlane's Capitol Hill appearance, in which he did not testify under oath, coincided with the Senate committee's unusual step of releasing an internal administration memo. This document ordered the National Security Council to stay out of covert operations or other "special activities" unless Reagan orders otherwise.

The memo, written by new national security adviser Frank Carlucci, states that, generally, only the CIA or armed forces may conduct covert operations.

In the memo, Carlucci wrote that he wanted to make sure the National Security Council's role within the adminstration was confined to supervision and guidance of covert operations, but not their actual conduct. Administration officials had signaled the change of policy last week in a series of background briefings given to news organizations.

In his testimony before the Foreign Relations panel Friday, McFarlane strongly defended Reagan's decision to try to establish ties with moderate elements of Iranian society, whatever the risks.

Cold wave eases, leaves 284 dead

LONDON — Europe's record-breaking cold wave loosened its grip in several regions Sunday, but the punishing temperatures took more lives and many communities remained cut off.

Known deaths reached 284, 14 of them reported Sunday.

In Soviet Georgia, an avalanche killed three people and forced evacuation of about 2,000 people, a Soviet newspaper said. Sovietski Sport said the avalanche occurred Tuesday in Khakmati village in the Dushati region.

It also reported a 12-hour helicopter airlift evacuated 500 vacationers from Gudauri after the Georgian ski resort was cut off by an earlier avalanche.

Eastern Europe has suffered some of the worst of the arctic conditions, but Moscow was warming up toward the freezing point and last week's snow was turning to slush.

New chief issues first statement

PEKING — Premier Zhao Ziyang, in his first comments since replacing the disgraced Hu Yaobang as Communist Party chief, said the campaign against liberal ideas will not victimize intellectuals or alter China's commitment to reform, Xinhua reported Monday.

Zhao's comments were made Sunday in a meeting with a Hungarian party secretary, Ferenc Havasi, and reported by the official news agency. Also on Sunday, the Chinese press gave prominent play to comments by Vice Premier Li Peng, a 58-year-old technocrat mentioned as a possible premier if Zhao relinquishes the post.

It is not clear, however, how power-sharing in China's highest circles might be altered with the changes.

Zhao, 67, was appointed acting general secretary of the 44-million member party on Friday after Hu, 71, resigned. Chinese sources have said China's top leader, Deng Xiaoping, forced him out for not cracking down on the student "pro-democracy" demonstrations and other behavior deviating from the party line.

Searchers find body of policeman

RYAN, Okla. — The body of a Ryan police officer was found Sunday about a quarter mile from where his car was found in a creek, authorities said.

Searchers on horseback found the body of David Williams, 30, in a field about 3 p.m. Sunday, according to Paul Renfrow of the Oklahoma State Bureau of Investigation.

He said there were no signs of trauma on the body and the cause of death will not be known until the medical examiner's report is completed.

"There are no apparent signs of foul play but we just don't know until we hear from the medical examiner," Renfrow said.

"One theory, obviously, is that his car went off in the creek and he tried to hike back to town wet and collapsed," Renfrow said, adding that there were conflicting reports about Williams' last transmission on his police radio.

A dispatcher for the Oklahoma Highway Patrol in Lawton reported earlier that Williams radioed about 8:45 p.m. Saturday that he was checking out a man covered with paint at a senior citizens center in Ryan, and minutes later, radioed for help.

But Renfrow said there also were reports that Williams was on the police radio still later, arranging to meet someone for coffee after checking road conditions outside of town.

Crowded prison releases inmates

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Texas prisons, which stopped accepting new inmates after exceeding court-ordered population limits, released about 250 inmates over the weekend and may resume admitting inmates this week, officials said Sunday.

Under a state law passed in 1983, the nation's second-largest prison system is restricted to 95 percent of its capacity. That law was passed after U.S. District William Wayne Justice, as part of a prison reform order, mandated steps to reduce overcrowding.

"With the number we released today and yesterday there's a good possibility we'll be below 95 percent, but by how many I just don't know," Department of Corrections spokesman Charles Brown said Sunday.

Authorities reported 38,414 inmates in the state's 26 prison units as of midnight Thursday, 38 over the 95 percent limit of 38,376, and the prison system closed its doors to new admissions Friday.

Eighty prisoners were released on parole Saturday and an additional 135 inmates were freed Sunday, Brown said.

In 1982, the prison halted admissions for a week because of overcrowding.

Interim prison director Jim Lynaugh said that if the prison system is allowed to reopen Monday, it may initiate an admissions system to strictly regulate the number of convicts the largest counties send.

NY commuter railway shuts down

NEW YORK — The nation's busiest commuter railway shut down Sunday when contract negotiations failed between the Long Island Rail Road and 11 unions, idling 6,600 workers.

"Operations on the railroad are now shut down," Long Island Rail Road spokesman Jim Burns said shortly after the strike began at 6:01 a.m.

The effects of the strike were minimal Sunday, a light ridership day, and were not expected to be fully felt on Monday, the federal holiday honoring the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Picketing was not planned until Tuesday, but if the strike lasts until then, it will force nearly 150,000 passengers between the Long Island suburbs and New York City to seek alternate transportation. The passengers' total trips on the railroad average 272,000 per weekday.

Officials urged commuters to use car pools, set up an information hot line and planned special express buses.

"There is a very good possibility it's going to be a long strike," said John Caggiano, business manager of Local 589 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Man convicted of felony murder

SOMERVILLE, N.J. — An avowed revolutionary was convicted Sunday in the slaying of a highly decorated New Jersey trooper, but the jury was unable to agree on a verdict for his co-defendant who the state claimed pulled the trigger.

The jury convicted Thomas W. Manning of felony murder, which is committing homicide while committing another felony, but found him innocent of the separate charge of murder. He also was found guilty of robbery and escape.

Superior Court Judge Michael Imbriani declared a mistrial for co-defendant Richard C. Williams after the jury reported for the fifth time since Friday that it was deadlocked. The jurors deliberated 45 hours over five days.

Manning, who with Williams already faces a lengthy prison term for bombing convictions, shouted "Venceremos!" — "We will conquer" in Spanish — as he heard the verdict.

Organizer to restart walk halted by Klan

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — The white organizer of a biracial civil rights march halted by violence in an all-white county vowed Sunday to return, and black leaders on the eve of Martin Luther King Day condemned the attack.

Civil rights leaders discussed taking part in another march in Forsyth County north of here, where Saturday's "brotherhood anti-intimidation march" was stopped by Ku Klux Klan members and supporters.

"There's definitely going to be another march in Forsyth County," said Dean Carter, the white resident of nearby Hall County who took over the planning for Saturday's march after it was abandoned by a Forsyth County man who had received death threats.

About 75 people, black and white, who marched Saturday became the target of rocks, bottles and racial jeers from hundreds of Klan members and supporters. Several marchers were hit but no serious injuries were reported.

Eight people from the hostile crowd — seven of them Forsyth County residents — were arrested on charges including obstructing officers, terroristic threats and weapons charges. All were released on bond.

Carter, who was hit in the face by a rock, said he would welcome the continued help of Atlanta City Councilman Hosea Williams, who helped organize Saturday's march, or other civil rights leaders.

"But with or without anyone else, I'm going back," he said. "I still haven't made my statement. There's a lot of good people in Forsyth County who are being hampered by this kind of threats and intimidation."

Williams indicated following the march Saturday that he planned to return. "This is not the end of marching in Forsyth County," he said.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery, president of the King-founded Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said Sunday that he and other civil rights activists would decide whether to stage a second march, and if so, when.

"We're not prepared to lay out the details of our strategy at this time," Lowery said.

And Coretta Scott King, widow of slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., called on supporters to be prepared to march again.

"We call for all peoples of good will to hold in readiness for mobilization and future marches in Forsyth County if it becomes necessary," she said in a statement issued late Saturday.

Lowery blasted state and local law enforcement officials as "negligent" in failing to provide enough officers to prevent the violence. "It's a sad commentary on their vigilance and their understanding of Forsyth County," he said.

Forsyth County Commissioner James Harrington Jr. said the eight arrested — seven of them county residents — should be "prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law."

Envoy meets hostage's wife

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Anglican Church envoy Terry Waite met Sunday with the wife of a kidnapped Italian businessman in Lebanon as his mission to free American and other foreign hostages was reported nearing an end.

Waite met Susan Molinari, wife of Alberto Molinari, for an hour at his beachside hotel in Moslem west Beirut.

Mrs. Molinari, also Italian, emerged in tears and declined to talk to reporters. Waite, personal emissary of Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie, also refused to comment.

Molinari worked in insurance and import-export for 20 years in Beirut. He was kidnapped Sept. 11, 1985. No group claimed responsiblity for his abduction.

Waite flew to Beirut a week ago on his fifth trip to the Lebanese capital in 16 months. He met with Moslem religious and militia leaders to discuss ways of ending the hostages' captivity.

Finalists selected for Truman Award

Two students advance to final round

Staff/Greg Vogel

Janice Norlin, sophomore in political science, and Jeff Wing, sophomore in business, have advanced to the final round of the Truman Scholar competition.

By BILL LANG
Collegian Reporter

Two of the three K-State students nominated for the Truman Scholarship have advanced to the final round of competition.

Janice Norlin, sophomore in political science, and Jeff Wing, sophomore in political science, were nominated by the K-State Truman Scholarship committee.

A third student, Janelle Larson, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, was nominated by the committee but did not reach the finals.

Wing and Norlin are among the five Kansas finalists who will be interviewed March 10 in Kansas City. The national winners will be announced in mid-April.

Both Wing and Norlin said they were surprised they had made it this far into the competition.

"I was surprised and happy to learn that I had made it as finalist," Norlin said, after receiving word from Nancy Twiss, chairwoman of the Kansas State University Truman Scholarship Committee.

"I'm not going to count on it, but it would be nice if I won it," she said.

"I didn't put it all into perspective when I first received word from Mrs. Twiss," Wing said. "When I sat down and thought how much it could help me, I realized what a fantastic benefit it could be.

"I'm not going to expect it, but it's a tremendous feeling knowing that I've made it this far," he said.

Twiss said colleges and universities from throughout the nation nominated up to three candidates from their respective universities.

Overall, 100 people will be selected as Truman Scholarship winners. One person from each state will be named, and 50 nominees at large will receive the scholarship, Twiss said.

Only students in their sophomore year can apply for the Truman Scholarship, which provides up to $26,000 for four years of study leading to careers in government and public service.

The actual amount to be received by the students who win the Truman Scholarship is adjusted to each student's respective tuition costs.

Center begins fee for alumni

By the Collegian Staff

For years, K-State's Career Planning and Placement Center has provided assistance to alumni at no cost. Now the center has decided to follow the footsteps of other universities, including Kansas Regents' institutions, by implementing an annual fee of $25 for its planning and placement services to alumni.

The annual fee will cover six basic services: 1) current file maintenance for employer access; 2) 15 sets of credentials to employers without further charge; 3) eligibility for vacancy bulletins, which includes mailing and handling charge; 4) handout materials such as a prospective employer list, annuals and resume guides; 5) job search advisement; and 6) three months of any one JOBS bulletin with other bulletins available at additional cost.

"We take no joy in imposing the $25 fee," said Director Bruce Laughlin. "The recent budget cuts have taken their toll on our department just like other departments."

Many institutions have previously imposed alumni service fees ranging from $20 to $45, he said.

Laughlin said during these times of economic stress, the center has been expected to provide greater levels of service. During this period, however, funding and staffing have not escalated at the same rate as enrollment.

"Our resources have not increased substantially for many years," Laughlin said. "In fact, we have lost positions. The last professional position was added to our office in 1966."

Laughlin said the center operates with three placement officials. In comparison, the University of Kansas' Placement Center staffs nine placement officials.

"I think most alumni will understand the need for a fee," he said. "By collecting this fee, we can sustain the high level of services we have been providing."

Low U.S. expectations jeopardize education

A recent study concerning the mathematics abilities of students around the world indicates the United States is severely lacking in this area while Japanese students rate first.

The study shows that at the eighth-grade level American students answer an average of 43 percent of standardized international algebra test questions correctly, and the number remains the same for students in the 12th grade. But in Japan, eighth graders answered 60 percent of the items correctly, and 12th-grade students increased to more than 75 percent.

The United States repeats concepts needlessly and does not build on them, the study states. The result is a nation of underachievers.

This country relies too heavily on the idea of "natural ability." Children who "don't have it" are put into lower-level classes with no incentive to work at correcting their deficiencies.

And American parents have been no help. While they try early on to teach their children by, for instance, reading to them, parents in the United States turn the responsibility for educating their children over to teachers once the child reaches school age.

Japanese parents and teachers, however, believe hard work breeds achievement, and this concept is apparent in the motivation and skills possessed by Japanese students. Homework is not dreaded but instead is used as a tool for the student to better himself or herself.

The one drawback to this "Puritan ethic" method of teaching is Japanese students have become highly specialized in certain areas and have not had a full educational experience. Conversely, American parents have stressed that their children obtain a well-rounded education, learning a little bit about everything and participating in a number of activities.

The two nations can learn from each others' shortcomings: Americans should instill in their students the idea that progress can be made in almost any area if the individual tries hard enough, while the Japanese should provide their children with the opportunity to gain many different experiences during their educational years.

By modifying current beliefs concerning education, both the United States and Japan can expect to produce adults capable of not only solving intellectual problems but understanding one another as well.

Americans owe much to King's ideals, hope

Today is the second national observance of Martin Luther King Jr. Day, the only holiday that focuses on improved race relations and the efforts undertaken to achieve those improvements.

This is a week to reaffirm our American ideals — a week for people of all races, religions and classes to put aside their differences and join in the fight for justice and peace.

It is a week for love and understanding — a time for families and friends to share together and mend broken relationships.

As a means of saluting the late civil rights leader, K-State organizations are sponsoring a second annual Celebration Week with events scheduled daily. A special part of the celebration begins with an ecumenical religious observance from noon to 1 p.m. today in All Faiths Chapel.

Students of every race and religion should participate in the celebration.

The memory of King "should serve not just as an inspiration to black Americans, but to each and every one of us, to stand firm for our principles and to strive to better ourselves and our country," President Reagan said Thursday in a television address. Let us not forget, on this day of innumerable speeches and gala events, that the ideals of freedom and justice apply to all Americans every day of the year.

King was a man of non-violence and peace, thrust into leadership at a crucial moment in the history of the United States. To some, his rise to world renown was an accident; to others, it was his destiny.

Regardless of the reasons, the fact remains that after nearly 20 years, King's legacy continues to offer a challenge for Americans to unify in a spirit of togetherness to continue the work he initiated.

Injustices and inequalities still abound.

It is up to all of us to accept King's challenge to ensure the dream becomes a reality, not a nightmare.

King's dream remains elusive

PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Columnist

Americans have designated today as a day to honor one of the greatest persons to ever live — Martin Luther King Jr. When King was assassinated on April 4, 1968, the world lost a selfless servant of humanity. America lost a dream and inspiration it so desperately needs. And me? I lost a hero.

What King hoped the world would achieve in his lifetime, I also hope for in my lifetime and the generations to come. His work is my hope for peace in all the nations of the world. But King is also my sadness when I see my fellow man hating and hurting each other because they are of a different color or religion.

When the great nations of the world seek war as a means to peace, I cringe with fear, as King did, at the thought of the lives that will be lost. King dreamed of love bonding the future's children, rather than a common cause of hate and prejudice leading them into war together.

Of the many aspects of life that King believed in, prayed and struggled for, he was especially inspiring when he spoke of non-violent resistance as the only way for social change to occur. Love for one's fellow man, though, was always the basis of his words on all matters. On non-violence, for example, King said, "Non-violence means avoiding not only external physical violence but also internal violence of spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a man, but you refuse to hate him."

On this subject of love, King was, for me, a sage of insurmountable wisdom. The person who allows hate into his heart — no matter what the reason — makes his heart hard and is very alone in this world. Of this, King said:

"The hard-hearted person never truly loves. He engages in a crass utilitarianism which values other people mainly according to their usefulness to him. He never experiences the beauty of friendship, because he is too cold to feel affection for another and is too self-centered to share another's joy or sorrow. He is an isolated island. No outpouring of love links him with the mainland of humanity."

Has America taken heed of the great words of King since his death? I think not. Though no man can be legally discriminated against on the basis of color, people of color continue to be subjected to lower wages, less job opportunities and less respect than their white brothers and sisters. Perhaps it is not as evident in Manhattan, where the feeling is that everyone is treated quite neighborly.

But the evidence of discrimination against people of color is especially glaring in our nation's larger cities. White supremacy groups run rampant with hate and prejudice in many of these cities and are more organized and sophisticated than ever. Though murdering solely on the basis of color by these groups is far less frequent than during King's days, murders of this type do continue.

King spoke of war as the path to eventual annihilation, but beyond this he spoke of the roots of war:

"We say that war is a consequence of hate, but close scrutiny reveals this sequence: first fear, then hate, then war and finally, deeper hatred. Were a nightmarish nuclear war to engulf our world, the cause would be not so much that one nation hated another, but that both nations feared each other."

If King were alive today, I think he would plead with his fellow Americans on this subject of war the same way he did in the 1960s:

"There is an element of urgency in our redirecting of American power. We still have a choice: non-violent coexistence or violent coannihilation. It is still not too late to make the choice."

Indeed, America's position of aggression has not changed since the days of King. America still wars in the traditional methods of bombings and the infiltration of armed troops on foreign soil.

The only difference today is that we're not bothering to sign official declarations of war. If King is watching now, I hope he will find a way to inspire us through the lives of other Americans who can lead this nation out of its aggressive, hateful state of being.

King had a dream, and so do I. I dream that people will pause in their daily dealings with people and love someone instead of lashing out at them for something that doesn't matter, such as the color of one's skin or one's religious beliefs.

I dream that this holiday of King's birth will motivate people to study the work of this great man and apply it to their lives. I dream that people of color will remember and always know that they are people, too, no matter what the ignorance of other people dictates, and to walk with dignity in the shadow of that ignorance.

In all the glory of love that King represents, no one matches his inspiration:

"I still have a dream today that one day war will come to an end, that men will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, that nations will no longer rise up against nations, neither will they study war any more.

"I still have a dream today that one day the lamb and the lion will lie down together and every man will sit under his own vine and fig tree and none shall be afraid...it will be a glorious day, the morning stars will sing together and the sons of God will shout for joy."

Letters

Reagan's garbage

Editor,

Re: Randy Repp's "Iranian arms sale." From beginning to end, Repp's letter is chocked full of right wing cover-up propaganda typical of most conservatives today. Instead of the "Iranian arms crisis," which is what it obviously is to any open-minded spectator of world politics, the title of Repp's piece — "Iranian arms sale" — is the first attempt to bury Reagan's garbage as if it didn't exist.

To hear and read about the inept band of terrorists known as the Contras, to know about their basic methods of terrorizing innocent civilians through torture and death to force them on to their side (as Repp must), and yet still equate them with the founding fathers of the U.S. revolution is asinine. The true revolutionaries in Nicaragua are the Sandinistas, who were elected to power after throwing off the domination of a ruthless U.S.-backed dictator.

The people of Nicaragua as a whole are not "crying out to us for help," as Repp wants you to believe. This is a blatant lie. The vast majority of the Nicaraguan people are crying out that the Yankees no pasaran (do not enter) — neither by surrogate terrorist forces, nor directly.

Let Repp praise lawbreakers like Oliver North and Ronald Reagan in the name of Republican fascism. Indeed, let him echo the foolish ultraconservative cries of Pat Buchanan. If Repp wants to put Vietnam, Iranian-held hostages, the Iranian arms crisis, etc., into the vault of the past and rush ignorantly into the utopian conservative future with guns blazing, let him.

Others of us have minds of our own. We will not follow.

White House lies

Editor,

Re: Randy Repp's "Iranian arms sale." Ronald Reagan is being called a liar because he is a liar. The latest example of blatant lying by the president is his contention that arms were sold to Iran with the sole purpose of approaching moderate elements in the Khomeini regime, and that those arms sales were not made in order to buy the freedom of hostages in Lebanon. If Repp has read the latest news, which he is so afraid of, he knows that a White House memo has been found that was signed by Reagan 12 months ago in which he gave explicit directions to sell arms for hostages.

This crude lying and hypocrisy of the administration has been termed a crisis by Congress and the press because their authority has been stepped on. But Reagan's lying reflects a deeper crisis in our government than whether or not a lieutenant colonel is deciding foreign policy. The deeper crisis, the more obscene lie, is that Reagan's militarism represents national strength.

Even Reagan would say that peace and not war is the good to be achieved. But just as a pusher says that he wants his junkies to feel good when he actually lives on their destruction, Reagan is literally taking innocent lives by forcing people to see their problems in childlike cold-war terms, and then offering them the simple narcotic of weapons.

Our trillion dollar debt is not the product of social spending, but of cold war ideology. That ideology has made our own economy, and the economies of dozens of other countries, dependent upon the sale and manufacture of weapons. We can neither spend our wealth on real social goods, nor can we make the sacrifices which are necessary for being free. Like pushers and junkies, we can only do business as usual.

Drug education

Editor,

I feel that is it important to inform K-State students, faculty and staff about some of the circumstances surrounding the death of Buffy Larsen. The cause of her death has serious implications for any person who has used or is considering using cocaine or crack.

Buffy M. Larsen, Salina, a freshman psychology major, died at Memorial Hospital Friday, Dec. 12 of a cocaine overdose. She collapsed at a friend's house and was taken to Memorial Hospital shortly after 2 a.m. Physicians attempted to revive her for about two hours before she was pronounced dead.

Cocaine can induce a feeling of anxiety, euphoria, violent mood swings, hallucinations of touch, sight, taste or smell, skin disorders, ulcers, kidney damage and strokes. Multiple seizures followed by respiratory and cardiac arrest are the most common cause of cocaine-related deaths. Unfortunately, as in the case of Larsen, there is no antidote for cocaine overdose.

Song of silence

Editor,

We buried our Buffy yesterday (Dec. 15, 1986). I have to write this down. One of the songs they sang was "The Sound of Silence."

We'll never know the joy of having our little girl call out "Mom, I'm home. What do you have to eat? Do you mind if I go out with my friends tonight?" Did I mind? Oh yes, I did. She was away at college all week and I didn't get to see her much, but she was my baby.

Do you hear the sound of silence? I do.

We'll never see her perfect smile; we'll never see her beautiful brown eyes that sparkled when she talked — never know again that warm feeling of hugging her close and saying "I love you."

Do you hear the sound of silence? I do.

She died doing drugs at a party. Her friends say she really didn't like doing drugs, but she wanted to be like everyone else. She had made a pact with God that night that she would never do drugs again after this party. God kept her to her promise. She died that night.

Do you hear the sound of silence? I do.

God always picks the perfect rose.

Ruth Larsen,
Buffy's mother

Page's changes

Editor,

Re: Deron Johnson's column, "Editorial page to undergo some changes," in Wednesday's Collegian.

It was with mixed feelings that I read your column, regarding changes in the content and style of the Collegian editorial page. I am heartened to hear that letters to the editor will be given increased priority this semester, and that you hope readers utilize the opportunity to tell the Collegian staff "what we're doing right and — most importantly — what we're doing wrong." I hope you follow through with this noble resolution.

I am a faculty member in the biology division, and I have been at K-State for six years. During this time, I have written four letters to the Collegian editor, and not one of them has ever seen the light of day. These letters were not obscene, were not vindictive and were not libelous.

The only thing that they had in common was that they all disagreed with either an editorial or a guest column on the editorial page. Apparently, former editors did not like being told what they were doing wrong, or perhaps they were afraid that a divergent opinion might make their opinion seem a little bit less compelling.

I am not aware of many other journalistic endeavors in this country which exercise censorship of letters to the editor; I hope that you will not continue this shortsighted and ludicrous policy.

David A. Rintoul
assistant professor, biology division

Luck of the draw

Editor,

I feel so helpless, and there is apparently nothing that I can do about it. I was happily settled into a new class, as I had so chosen on my line schedule, when a "new" attendance list was brought to the classroom. It stated, in no uncertain terms, that I and three others were to be extracted from a class that we had chosen and were quite enthusiastic about to be placed into another class which we had no desire to be in. When we discussed the situation with our department head, we were told, politely, that there was nothing to discuss — we had no choice in the matter.

This class is our major class of study, architectural design studio, and I do not take lightly my being forcibly removed from a class I have chosen and paid good money for. The other three unfortunate students and I were told that someone had to lose and we were it! LOSE? We are simply trying to get the best education we are entitled to but end up in a paper-shuffle and told "better luck next time in getting a quality education." Education shouldn't be dependent on the luck of the draw.

In all fairness, the head of our department, Robert Burnham, is not an evil ogre bent upon sadistically disrupting our academic progress. But that progress has been disrupted nonetheless. As most students know, it's hard enough to "make the grade" without having to do it in a class which you have no desire to be in, working on projects which you have no interest in and working under a professor who can't speak English well enough to be understood even the second time around. It's no wonder K-State is experiencing declining enrollment.

Strung up on strings

Students experience K-State performance

By ERIN EICHER
News Editor

Chocolate chip cookies outnumbered musicians six to one in McCain Auditorium this weekend as snow took its toll on attendance of the 14th annual String Fling.

Out of an expected 620 stringed instrument players in the fifth through the eighth grades, only 250 traveled snow-covered roads to Manhattan from schools across Kansas. However, the students benefited from more individualized attention, said Warren Walker, professor of music and String Fling coordinator.

String Fling is a clinic sponsored by the Manhattan Youth Symphony Association set up with the help of K-State stringed instrument students.

Walker said the Fling has proved a great recruiting effort during the past 13 years for the Kansas State Orchestra.

"Nearly 80 percent of our orchestra played in a String Fling when they were younger," he said.

Early Saturday morning, intense rehearsal began in preparation for a Sunday afternoon performance. Empty chairs in rehearsal rooms were filled when the five originally planned orchestras were reduced to three, and students got their first look at the music they would perform the next day.

"We call it a happening. We call it a gathering. We get together, play the songs, clean up, eat the cookies and go home," Walker said.

For some students, the event offered a first opportunity to play in an orchestra, but the five conductors provided advice and guidance.

Kimi Manji, guest conductor from Eureka, Calif., unraveled the "secret code" of conducting for the intermediate group of fifth graders.

"When we're going to speed up or slow down, nobody knows but us, but if you guys don't watch, nobody will know but me," she said.

David Littrell, K-State music graduate and associate professor of music at Evansville University, Evansville, Ind., expounded on the role of the conductor in a morning practice for about 30 junior high musicians.

Staff/Jim Dietz

Gerald Kiger, Newton high school orchestra director, directs advanced intermediates Sunday while preparing for the concert.

"What's the rule when you are playing in an orchestra, and the baton is up? That means your instrument is up and your mouths are quiet," he said.

"Let's hold our violins up so they're parallel with the floor," advised Gerald Kiger, director of the string program at Newton, to an advanced intermediate group of sixth graders. "You viola players watch. You're trained players. You're not a bunch of tuba players."

The event was a source of pride for parents who waited and watched during rehearsals.

Gerald Collie, Lawrence, set up his video camera to capture the concert on tape. His daughter Vicki was playing her violin in the intermediate orchestra for the first time.

"She's doing OK. She seems to be moving her bow right," he said.

Sonja Cotitta drove up from Olathe with her seventh-grade son, Dominic, for his third year of playing viola in the String Fling.

"It's tough on kids now to stay in strings," she said. "They get labled. There's more peer pressure. Kids in band are 'cool.' They can play their rock 'n' roll. Kids that play the violin don't talk about it as much.

"When Dominic came home and told me he wanted to play the viola, I said, 'What's that?'" Cotitta said. A few years later when Dominic was ready to quit his lessons, "I said, 'Son, what do I have to do to get you back into strings?' I believe in bribery."

Staff/Rob Squires

After two days of preparation, the work pays off in a McCain Auditorium performance.

Amy Chang, Manhattan, practices one of the orchestral pieces for her group, the advanced intermediates, prior to peforming Sunday in the String Fling '87 concert.

The rage of Nancy Sloan, an Irene Ryan Scholarship nominee, illicits indifference from Brad Atchison during their scene Saturday in Nichols Theater.

Theater patrons treated to 'Late Night' with scenes from Shakespeare, Simon

By PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Reporter

The works of William Shakespeare, Sam Shepard and Neil Simon came to life for local theater buffs during the "Late Night With K-State Players" benefit talent show Saturday evening.

Playing to an audience of about 60 people in Nichols Theater, some 30 K-State students acted, sang and danced throughout the two-act talent show.

"We rehearsed together only one time," said Paul Honigs, senior in journalism and mass communications and member of Theta Alpha Phi, theater honorary. The show went well, though, he said, and all involved were pleased with the large crowd turnout.

The show was put on to bring in money to cover the expenses of five K-State actors nominated to compete in the regional Irene Ryan Scholarship Competition at the University of Iowa, Iowa City.

The competition was set up by Irene Ryan, primarily known for her role as Granny on "The Beverly Hillbillies." The five K-State actors, as well as about 100 other regional student actors, are to attend the competition Jan. 21-25.

The student actors who win regionally and nationally can acquire $3,500 in scholarships for their talents.

"We needed between $400 and $500 to go to the competition," said Nancy Sloan, senior in theater and Irene Ryan nominee.

The trip will be expensive, Sloan said, and the student actors would not have the money to go if not for the talent show proceeds.

"We collected $344 (Saturday night) and there's been more donations called in over the phone," Sloan said.

Some of the food expenses should be the only thing the students will have to pay for due to the generous amount of donations, she said.

Four of the five Irene Ryan nominees performed in the talent show. Sloan acted in a humorous scene titled "Self-Torture and Strenuous Exercise," by Harry Candolean. She then performed the touching monologue titled "Glass Marbles," by Jane Martin.

Another Irene Ryan nominee, Beth Sherby, junior in theater, made the audience laugh in the scene "Lu Ann Hampton Laverty Oberlander," by Preston Jones. She then brought a serious hush to the audience with her rendition of the monologue "Later," by Corrine Jacker.

Dan Shea, Irene Ryan nominee and senior in journalism and mass communications, also left the audience pensive, then laughing, when he performed Sam Shepard's "Savage Love," followed by the humorous scene "Sexual Perversity in Chicago," by David Mamet.

Irene Ryan nominee Kelli Wondra, graduate student in speech, performed a serious piece "Plenty," by David Hare.

Penny Cullers, senior in theater and another Irene Ryan competitor, did not perform in the talent show.

Other highlights of the benefit performance included a reading by Thayne Emrich, sophomore in theater. Emrich recited three poems which he wrote. Another original piece was performed by Jeff Schrag, sophomore in history. Schrag kept the audience laughing throughout a Shakespearean scene, "The Five-Minute Shakespeare."

While playing guitar, Tim Ahlenius, freshman in theater, sang a song of love and friendship, "Double J.T.," which he wrote. More original work came from Miriam Climenhaga, junior in theater, who shared two of her poems with the audience.

Candy Ward, freshman in speech, also gave an original dramatic performance of "Father."

Rounding out the show was Janet Harman, junior in theater, who sang and danced her way through a scene from "A Chorus Line" titled "Music and the Mirror."

Business shuffles salaries; arts and sciences trims expenses

BUDGETS on the block

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

Most of the mandated cuts made in the College of Arts and Sciences were in other operating expenses, said William Stamey, dean of the college.

Because of the lack of funds, course-related activities such as field trips will be eliminated. Stamey said he fears the absence of these special activities will diminish the quality of the courses.

In addition, the new budget includes fund cuts for equipment purchase and repair.

"If an instrument breaks in a lab, they'll probably have to find a new experiment," Stamey said.

Stamey also said students this semester will notice a greatly diminishing number of photocopied handouts given in classes.

"If a teacher gives a handout, he probably paid for it out of his own pocket," he said.

The Department of English had a 30 percent cut in its other operating expense budget, said Henry Donaghy, department head. He said the department will not be able to buy new equipment, make long-distance phone calls or rent sufficient films for the classes until fiscal 1988.

The Department of Economics has no travel money left for the fiscal year because of the budget cuts, said Jarvin Emerson, department head.

Stamey said cuts were made in other operating expenses to avoid canceling classes and laying off staff.

The economics department, however, found it necessary to cut one graduate-level class to save money. This particular class was chosen because it has traditionally had low enrollment, Emerson said.

The Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work made dramatic cuts in travel and equipment purchases in an attempt to offer all classes as listed in the spring semester line schedule, said Marvin Kaiser, department head.

"We had enough staff for all the classes this semester, but that's not to say what will happen next semester," Kaiser said.

Stamey said although most classes have been offered as scheduled, the college is not in the position to open additional class sections, as they have in the past, if enrollment exceeds the anticipated numbers.

The college also cut back on graduate assistance support and part-time faculty and staff positions.

The Department of Political Science laid off two of five graduate teaching assistants because of the cuts. William Richter, department head, said this cutback affects the ability of the professors to teach, especially in the larger classes.

The economics department laid off one graduate teaching assistant and one part-time instructor in order to save money, Emerson said.

The arts and sciences office eliminated one secretarial position. Stamey said this lack of help means the students have to wait longer to get assistance, and the phones don't get answered as quickly.

The English department originally had to lay off 18 temporary employees, but was able to rehire them because of additional funds allocated to the department by the dean, Donaghy said.

Stamey said the money came from a fund he had reserved for operational expenses that he distributed to all of the departments. There is no more money in the fund.

The College of Business Administration shuffled resources to keep from cutting spring semester classes due to budget reductions, said Randolph Pohlman, dean of the college.

Pohlman said changes were made in each department so the instructional aspects of the college would not be hurt.

Unlike many colleges, the college did not have to cut into its other operating expense budget, which includes travel, long-distance telephone calls and equipment purchases and repair.

Robert Hollinger, associate dean of the college and head of the Department of Finance, said most of the money was saved in the college by reshuffling faculty salaries. This does not mean, however, that anyone had a cut in pay.

"We generally have some slack in the amount allocated for faculty salaries," Hollinger said. "We just used the slack."

Other departments within the college found different ways to deal with the budget reductions.

One professor in the Department of Accounting will be going on leave without pay this semester, said Maurice Stark, department head.

"His salary took care of most of our problem," he said.

Stark also said the department receives several donations from certified public accountant and industrial firms that hire accounting graduates from the University.

Although the accounting department has always depended on these donations, they will be appreciated much more because of the budget cuts, he said.

The finance department saved money by reallocating funds and cutting items not related to classes or graduate assistants, Hollinger said.

One area in the College of Business Administration hasn't been affected by the budget reductions at all. Kay Stewart, director of Student Services, said she has not yet been asked to make any cuts.

"I have a plan," she said, "so if I am asked, I know what will go."

Stewart said recruitment and services to students are two areas that will be hurt.

Editor's note: These two articles are the third part of a series on the impact of budget cuts on K-State's colleges.

Speech team receives third at competition

By The Collegian Staff

Speech Unlimited, K-State's speech team, placed third out of 49 schools at the Red River Swing over Christmas break.

The tournament is so-named because schools begin competing at Southeastern Oklahoma State University in Durant, Okla., then "swing" down to the University of Texas at Arlington to finish the competition.

Those competing from K-State's 15-member squad were: Jon Mertz, senior in speech, first in communication analysis; Brad Atchison, junior in speech, first in poetry, second in prose; and Trudy Burtis, senior in radio and television, fifth in after-dinner speaking.

Atchison competed against 80 students in prose and more than 60 students in poetry, said David Dunlap, assistant coach.

The tournament qualified Atchison for national competition in prose and "put Mertz one step closer," he said.

The University of Alabama at Birmingham and Bradley University in Peoria, Ill., placed first and second, respectively, Mertz said.

With schools from 15 states attending, the Red River Swing is "one of the largest tournaments in the country," Dunlap said.

The squad will compete at four more tournaments before attending the district qualifying tournament in late February, Mertz said. Kansas' district includes Missouri, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana.

Those qualifying for a national tournament will go to San Diego in mid-April to the American Forensics Association's tournament.

Up to 10 squad members could qualify for the national tournament, but Atchison said they would be pleased if five or more people qualified.

Assistance program serves employees

By TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

In an effort to help faculty and staff solve problems affecting job performance, the University began the Employee Assistance Program last semester.

The purpose of the program is to help workers efficiently carry out responsibilities, said Joe Younger, personnel officer and EAP coordinator. The program helps employees confront their problems, whether they be financial, mental, chemical, social, marital or work-related.

The response has been encouraging, he said. Last semester Younger conducted 20 seminars for University supervisors and employees to explain the program's objectives and how to become involved. He said he has scheduled eight more seminars during January.

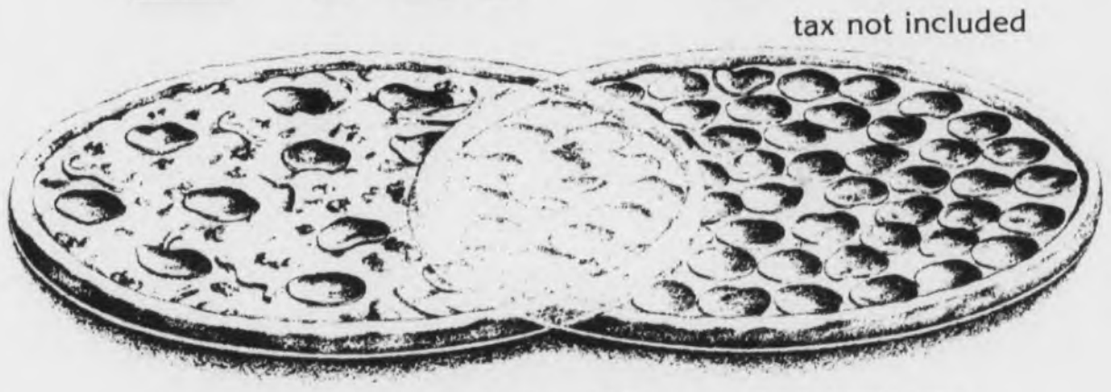
To determine the extent and origin of employees' problems, Younger said counselors interview the clients, and then refer them to community resource centers and campus services that can best solve the problems.

Throughout the process, clients' names are confidential, Younger said.

Prospective clients may contact the Office of Personnel Services for assistance. Additional counseling assistance on campus is available at the Family Center, Lafene Health Center and the Counseling Center.

The personnel office sent brochures containing the seminar schedules to targeted employees on campus, Younger said.

Convenience is another aim of the program, he said. Its fluid structure makes it more accessible to K-State employees.



If a person doesn't want to meet during working hours, counselors are willing to set up interviews at the client's convenience, he said.

Clients may receive aid outside of Manhattan, Younger said. For example, the personnel office has requested financial assistance for clients from banks in a four-county area around Manhattan, he said.

FINAL VERSION OF THE KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY MISSION STATEMENT AS ADOPTED BY THE KANSAS BOARD OF REGENTS.

Students enrolled at Kansas State University can receive a broad and balanced education from the associate through the doctoral level. All graduates may experience the substance and methods of the natural sciences, the social behavioral sciences, the humanities, the fine arts and the mathematical disciplines. Kansas State University will continue to support bachelor's, master's and doctoral programs in education, with major emphases in rural education, science and mathematics education, elementary education and educational administration. The major thrust of the institution is guided by its land grant tradition, embodied in agriculture, architecture, business, computer science, engineering, veterinary medicine and human ecology/home economics, and those disciplines necessary for the support of these fields: the natural and physical sciences, mathematics and the social sciences.

The University has a major and unique role in research related to its land grant tradtion. Through the Agricultural Experiment Station, the Engineering Experiment Station and the Bureau of General Research, graduate students and faculty carry out fundamental and applied research, scholarly inquiry and creative endeavors which advance their fields and contribute to the solution of economic development issues.

As the state's land grant institution, public service plays a vital role in shaping the institution's purpose. Significant expectations are placed on Kansas State for extension, correspondence and off-campus study and a close relationship with business and government to undertake research on social problems. The University is responsible for the statewide Cooperative Extension Service, which provides informal education programs to citizens in all 105 Kansas counties. County extension staff are supported by University specialists in agriculture, human ecology/home economics, engineering and veterinary medicine. To further enhance its service capacity, the institution has been designated as the major recipient of state funds for the development of electronic technology for delivery of instruction through telecommunications.

Regents amend University's objectives

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

After several revisions in the proposed K-State mission statement, University officials agree that the final version adopted by the Kansas Board of Regents is an adequate representation of K-State.

The Regents approved mission statements for the six public universities and one technical institute in the Regents system during the Dec. 19 meeting in Topeka.

Owen Koeppe, University provost, said he and other university officials were upset by the proposed mission statement for K-State, which was discussed at the Regents November meeting. Koeppe said the November-proposed statement did not make reference to the College of Education, and he added that "this was a very serious omission."

"During the November meeting, President (Jon) Wefald made several strong statements in regard to this omission," Koeppe said. He said he believed this was part of the reason a sentence was included in the final mission statement that gave major emphasis to the College of Education.

The sentence — referring to the College of Education, which was added to the final mission statement — read: "Kansas State University will continue to support bachelor's, master's and doctoral programs in education, with major emphases in rural education, science and mathematics education, elementary education and educational administration."

University President Jon Wefald said the omission of the College of Education in the proposed mission statement was detrimental to K-State.

"Our College of Education trains more teachers than any other school in the state. It is an excellent college...this college will go on to even bigger and better things," Wefald said.

Stanley Koplik, executive director for the Regents, said, "I think the original statement for the University was somewhat narrower in terms of crucial emphases."

Koplik said originally the College of Education at K-State was not deemed as vital. He said he thought the December accommodation is a "fair representation" of K-State.

In addition to K-State officials, Koplik said several Regents board members pushed to include the College of Education in the statement because they thought it was a better way to recognize the importance of the College of Education. He said board memmbers also received evidence from November to December indicating how the College of Education's role had changed.

Koplik said because of this evidence, the board was comfortable with the increased priority given to the college.

"I think it's a very good statement for K-State as it allows K-State to follow a land-grant mission for the traditional land-grant programs," Koplik said of the overall adopted statement. "The mission statement is indicative of some of the strengths of Kansas State University, and I hope it will allow the University to get stronger."

When asked whether the adopted mission statement for the University of Kansas identified that institution as the flagship school, Koeppe said the statement has given priority to KU.

"The statement appears to say that they (KU) can do anything they want. Kansas University is a fine school, but they (KU) know they can't emphasize everything," he said.

Koplik said that KU's mission statement does indicate it is the state's flagship school, although Koplik said he wouldn't necessarily use the word "flagship."

"I think KU is the school that (most) fits the label of a comprehensive university (in the state)," he said.

Koeppe said a second change was made in the statement which referred to K-State's importance in the economic development of Kansas.

The sentence, which was added to the statement referring to this change, states: "Through the Agricultural Experiment Station, the Engineering Experiment Station and the Bureau of General Research, graduate students and faculty carry out fundamental and applied research, scholarly inquiry and creative endeavors which advance their fields and contribute to the solution of economic development issues."

Wefald said this statement had been "inadvertently left out."

Beirut police investigate abduction

By The Associated Press

Bonn, West Germany — A West German businessman was kidnapped in Beirut, the Foreign Ministry said Sunday. Two newspapers said the kidnappers apparently hope to trade him for a Lebanese jailed as a terrorist in West Germany and wanted in the United States.

West German authorities said it was too early to say if Saturday's abduction of Rudolf Cordes, 53, was linked to the arrest of Mohammad Ali Hamadi Tuesday at Frankfurt airport.

Hamadi, 22, who was carrying a fluid used to make explosives, was later identified as a suspect in the 1985 hijacking of a TWA airliner to Beirut. In that hijacking, the terrorists killed a U.S. Navy diver and held 39 other Americans hostage for 17 days.

Police in Beirut said Sunday they could not confirm that a West German had been kidnapped. The West German Embassy in the Lebanon Capital was unstaffed.

The Foreign Ministry in Bonn said an anonymous telephone caller told its embassy in Beirut that Cordes had been taken hostage.

Cordes is Beirut manager for Hoechst Ag, a major West Germany chemical company. A company official, commenting on condition of anonymity, said Cordes does not live in Beirut, but travels there frequently from his Frankfurt base.

West German newspapers said Cordes arrived in Beirut from Frankfurt Saturday evening, went through passport control and has not been heard from since.

The Foreign Ministry said in a statement that the telephone caller told the embassy Cordes and three Lebanese accompanying him were kidnapped. The three Lebanese were later released, the caller said.

The caller did not identify himself or make demands, the ministry said.

Minstry sources, insisting on anonymity, said Bonn authorities last week warned West Germans living in Beirut or traveling there to take extra precautions following Hamadi's arrest.

About 200 West Germans live in Lebanon. Most are married to Lebanese citizens.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Reinhard Bettzuege told The Associated Press: "We cannot assume the two (Hamadi and Cordes) are linked because the (kidnappers) have not identified themselves or placed any demands on us. It could be a criminal act, or someone looking for ransom."

But Bild and Die Welt newspapers, of Hamburg and Bonn respectively, said senior government officials fear the kidnapping is aimed at blackmailig West Germany into releasing Hamadi. The papers did not identify the officials.

West German Justice Department spokesman Juergen Schmid on Sunday indicated Hamadi could be extradited to the United States "relatively soon" to stand trial for murder and conspiracy to commit air piracy.

Maternal cocaine use retards brain growth

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Animal experiments suggest that cocaine use during pregnancy can produce infants with long-term abnormalities in the brain systems that control sensation, movement and emotions, a researcher said Sunday.

This occurs despite the frequent absence of physical defects in the offspring, said Diana Dow-Edwards, a researcher at the State University of New York Health Science Center in Brooklyn.

In a separate report, a researcher said he has found that cocaine use by pregnant women may retard the brain growth of their children.

Dow-Edwards found, in studies with about 30 rats, that rats exposed to cocaine during early development mature into adults with marked hypersensitivity in the brain's motor system, its sensory system and in the limbic system which governs emotions and such functions as eating and sleeping.

The evidence suggests "that cocaine exposure during pregnancy produces long-term and perhaps permanent alterations in brain function activity," she said.

The hypersensitivity is apparently due to the excessive buildup of certain chemicals called neurotransmitters that are used by brain cells to communicate with one another, she said at a symposium sponsored by the Greater New York Chapter of the March of Dimes.

Ira Chasnoff, a pediatrician at Northwestern University Medical School in Evanston, Ill., and one of the nation's leading authorities on the effects of cocaine use in pregnancy, said Dow-Edwards' research could explain some of the defects he is cataloging in the infants of cocaine-using mothers.

For example, Chasnoff said, "it appears that these infants are probably having an increased rate of seizures in the neonatal (newborn) period." That could be related to a hypersensitivity in the brain similar to what Dow-Edwards has observed in rats, he said.

He also reported that infants of cocaine-using mothers have a significantly smaller head size than normal infants, suggesting a retardation in brain growth and possible future brain deficits.

Chasnoff said cocaine-affected infants are excessively jittery, experience rapid changes of mood, and are extremely sensitive to noise and other external stimuli.

He has previously reported that pregnant women using cocaine are more likely than others, even heroin users, to have spontaneous abortions and that the infants of cocaine-using mothers have an increased risk of sudden infant death syndrome.

Dow-Edwards said her studies are the first to look for subtle signs of cocaine-associated brain deficits in the offspring of laboratory animals.

For 10 days after the rats were born — a period that parallels the third trimester of human pregnancy — she gave the rats a daily dose of cocaine equivalent to a human dose of slightly more than one gram of cocaine.

The drug produced no change in the growth of the young rats, nor did it produce obvious physical defects.

But studies to assess the brain development of the rats when they were young adults, 60 days old, showed that their brains had excess levels of three neurotransmitters — dopamine, norepinephrine and serotonin. The surplus of these substances probably accounts for the hypersensitivity in the rats' brains, she said.

Philippine government fears rebel takeover

By The Associated Press

COTABATO CITY, Philippines — President Corazon Aquino, touring violence-ridden Mindanao island Sunday, offered peace talks to a Moslem rebel faction whose attacks last week killed 46 people.

In Manila, troops went on alert to keep Moslem violence from spreading to the capital.

The Moro Islamic Liberation Front gave no immediate reply to the offer.

The group on Saturday ended five days of attacks on the island which left at least 46 people dead and 89 injured. It said it launched the attacks because it had been shut out of talks between the government and a rival Moslem faction, the Moro National Liberation Front.

Both groups seek Moslem self-rule on Mindanao, but disagree on the terms.

Of Mindanao's 11 million people, about 60 percent are Christian and the rest Moslem.

Two Manila newspapers reported that the military fears Moslem rebels might join forces with dissident officers and supporters of deposed President Ferdinand E. Marcos in a plot against the government before the ratification plebiscite for the draft constitution Feb. 2.

About 800 Marcos loyalists burned an Aquino effigy Sunday at a Manila rally as part of their campaign against the constitution, which guarantees her a six-year term.

Aquino met for 10 minutes with Haji Murad, deputy leader of the Moro Islamic Liberation Front, during a stop in Cotabato City, a Moslem stronghold on Mindanao. It was her fourth stop on a five-city, weekend tour of the island to muster support for the costitution.

Murad said he would have to check with the organization's chief, Hashim Salamat, who is in Saudi Arabia, before responding to the invitation for talks.

He said later he gave Aquino a flower "as the symbol of peace" and handed her a paper containing his group's demands. "She thanked us and invited me to a longer talk in Malacanang," the presidential palace.

Kidnappers return leader, take general

By The Associated Press

QUITO, Ecuador — President Leon Febres Cordero flew back to this Andean capital Sunday after declaring he will fight any attempt to impeach him for giving in to his kidnappers' demands and freeing a jailed air force general.

Febres Cordero and Defense Minister Gen. Medardo Salazar, who also had been kidnapped, arrived aboard an army plane Sunday afternoon at a small army air field near Quito. The president was received with full military honors by the commanders of the army, navy and air force. His 12-member Cabinet also was present.

"Long live Leon, long live Leon," shouted dozens of supporters gathered to welcome the president.

Asked by reporters to comment on reports that Febres Cordero's political enemies may try to seek to impeach the president, Interior Minister Luis Robles said, "There is a legally constituted government. I don't see, except on the part of prejudiced people, how they can distort the process."

Andres Vallejo, president of the unicameral Congress controlled by the opposition, said earlier Sunday,, "The government cannot continue being run in the form it has been Radical changes are indispensable."

Vallejo called an extraordinary session of the Congress for Tuesday.

Febres Cordero, who was held hostage by renegade paratroopers for 11 hours Friday at an airport in Guayaquil, told journalists Saturday, "I intend to complete my term of office." His term expires in August 1988.

He flew to Quito from Guayaquil, the country's largest city and main port 170 miles southwest of the capital, for the burial at Quito's Military Cemetery of two of his bodyguards.

They were killed when about 40 paratroopers surrounded the presidential party at Taura air base outside Guayaquil and, after a firefight, took Febres Cordero, his defense minister and about two dozen other people hostage. Seven people were reported wounded.

The 55-year-old president was at Taura for a military ceremony.

Febres Cordero, a conservative and one of the Reagan adminsitration's staunchest allies in Latin America, agreed Friday evening to his captors' demand for the release from jail of Gen. Frank Vargas Pazzos.

'Fortunate' K-State sneaks past ISU

Wildcats blow 10-point lead

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

Despite a performance that could only be described as lackluster at best, K-State's men's basketball team captured its second consecutive Big Eight Conference win Saturday, beating Iowa State 68-65 in front of 10,025 fans in Ahearn Field House and a Raycom Sports television audience.

"We're getting some practice at fighting off comebacks," said K-State coach Lon Kruger.

Iowa State never would say die, and fought back from a 10-point deficit with 3:48 left in the game to take the outcome into the final seconds.

In the first half, it looked as if the Wildcats were on their way to another big win. K-State built a 10-point lead midway through the period behind the hot hand of Norris Coleman. "Sarge" was unstoppable around the basket, and scored 17 of his game-high 24 points during the first 20 minutes.

"Norris is a great shooter," said Cyclone Coach Johnny Orr. "Anytime you have a guy out there 27 years old, he should have been in the NBA six years by now."

K-State's aggressive man-to-man defense was also effective in holding down the Cyclones' top scorer, forward Jeff Grayer, for the first 14 minutes of the game. Grayer did not score a field goal until 5:48 was left in the half.

Grayer then led a Cyclones' surge and scored Iowa State's next 12 points which pulled the team to within five points, 36-31, at intermission.

In the second half, K-State stumbled and fell behind 46-45 with 12:32 left in the contest.

"Iowa State controlled the tempo in the second half," Kruger said. "At the end of the game, we didn't play at the point we've got to to make progress. Poor shot selection let Iowa State get back into the game."

Iowa State also took Coleman out of K-State's offense by playing a sagging man-to-man defense. Coleman scored only seven points in the half.

"I played Norris defensively in the second half by standing on his legs," Grayer said. "That means you put your butt on his legs and stay with him the whole time. It's the only way to play him."

"Grayer is a tremendous player," Coleman said. "His presence on the court and his leadership really helps them."

After the 'Cats regained the lead, Grayer again led a Cyclone resurgence and scored six of the Cyclones next nine points to pull them within one point with 25 seconds left in the game. Grayer paced Iowa State with 23 points.

K-State forward Mitch Richmond was then fouled on the next possession. The frustrated Richmond — seven points on 2-of-13 shooting from the field — canned two free throws with 24 seconds left to put the 'Cats ahead by three, 68-65. Iowa State got off one final shot, but to no avail.

"I was not happy with the game. Considering our poor

K-State forward Norris Coleman (44) and guard Steve Henson (12) battle with Iowa State University forward Elmer Robinson (25) for a second-half rebound during Saturday's game in Ahearn Field House. Coleman scored 24 points in the 'Cats' 68-65 victory.

Smith's loss opens door for backup

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Senior point guard Lynn Smith fell to the floor of Ahearn Field House Saturday after twisting his right ankle during a defensive play in the first half of the K-State-Iowa State Big Eight Conference match-up.

Smith hobbled off the floor and was immediately taken to the locker room and didn't return for the rest of the game.

Coach Lon Kruger wasn't sure of the severity of the injury following the game, but x-rays taken Saturday evening revealed no broken bones. Kruger said he remains optimistic about how soon Smith will return to the line-up.

"He'll probably be out one or two games," Kruger said. "Nothing's broken, it was just some stretched ligaments in his ankle."

This was a recurring injury for Smith who earlier in the week had sprained his ankle in practice. He said since the earlier injury his ankle has not been the same.

"It has been real weak since then (the sprain)," Smith said. "Every time I put pressure on it, it hurt."

> '(Lynn Smith) will probably be out one or two games. Nothing's broken; it was just some stretched ligaments in his ankle.'
> — Coach Lon Kruger

With Smith out, the door for 5-foot-11 junior reserve guard Mark Nelson is open for more playing time behind starter Steve Henson. Kruger indicated Sunday that Nelson will probably get more playing time. This is a nice break for Nelson who said that his role, on or off the bench, is to play his part in helping the Wildcats any way he can.

"Before (Smith's injury), I would support the team on the bench by spotting things that you can't see on the floor," Nelson said. "Now I'll be going in a couple of minutes to give Steve a break like I did in the Iowa State game."

The freshman Henson, who earned his first start in K-State's 10th game against Northern Illinois, said Nelson will do a fine job of substituting for Smith, but doesn't see his own role as changing much.

"Mark came in and did a pretty good job (at the Iowa State game)," Henson said. "(Smith's injury) probably means I'll have to play a little bit more. I'll have to quit getting some of the early fouls," he said.

Before suffering the ankle injury Saturday, Smith had played in all of K-State's 14 regular-season and conference games — starting in the first ten. Offensively, he hit 42.3 percent of his shots from the field, averaged 2.4 points a game and was fourth on the team in assists with 21.

Defensively, Smith has been strong on setting up the trap, shaking up opponents and gathering 18 steals in the process.

Lady Cats maintain perfect mark at Ahearn

Continuing their dominance at home this season, K-State's Lady Cats dumped Iowa State 63-56 Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

K-State's women's basketball team ran its record to 13-3 overall and 1-1 in the Big Eight Conference. Iowa State dropped to 0-3 in the conference and 10-6 overall.

The victory completed a doubleheader sweep over Iowa State, as the K-State men's team defeated the Cyclones prior to the women's contest. The win also kept the Lady Cats perfect at home this season with an 8-0 record in games played in the friendly confines of Ahearn Field House.

One difference in the Lady Cats' win Saturday and their other victories this year was Coach Matilda Mossman's team had to rely on defense.

Having scored 80 points or more in five of their last six games, the Lady Cats could only muster 63 against the much taller Cyclone team. But K-State held the Lady Cyclones to 19 points under the season average of 75 points per game coming into the contest.

Even though her team did not perform as well offensively, Mossman said she was pleased with the team's intensity on defense — especially that of forward Tracey Bleczinski.

"I am very pleased with the way we played tonight," Mossman said. "I thought we played with more intensity than usual, especially on defense.

"Bleczinski did a great job for us. A credit should go to her for shutting down (Stepanie) Smith."

Bleczinski, a 5-8 sophomore from Shawnee Mission, drew an assignment she is becoming familiar with — guarding the opponent's top scorer. She responded well in holding the 6-1 Smith to 14 points, three below her season average. Smith was forced to earn all of her points, however, as she was only 6-of-17 from the field.

After trailing the Cyclones early by as much as five points, K-State seized the lead at the 12:36 mark in the first half on a shot from center Sue Leiding.

It was all K-State after that. The Lady Cats steadily increased their lead through the remainder of the half, and went into the locker room leading 31-23.

K-State came out a little cold in the second half, and the Lady Cyclones cut the Lady Cats' lead to four, 37-33, with more than 14 minutes left. But K-State outscored Iowa State 9-2 during a three-minute span and then relied on the outside and free-throw shooting of Susan Green to hold off the Cyclones.

Green, a 5-8 guard from Anthony, led the Lady Cats with 18 points — 15 of which came in the second half. Green's backcourt mate, Theza Fitzpatrick, added 11 points for K-State, and Carlisa Thomas pulled down a game-high 11 rebounds.

Iowa State was led by senior forward Sandy Hafner with 19 points. Smith and Carmen Jaspers each were credited with 14 points and eight rebounds apiece.

The Lady Cats will travel to Boulder, Colo. to take on the Colorado Lady Buffs on Jan. 21, and then will put their perfect home record on the line when intrastate rival University of Kansas comes to Manhattan Jan. 24.

Track squads finish No. 2 at Nebraska; Suggs nails record

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

Opening the indoor track season without a full team in attendence didn't appear to hamper K-State's track teams as the men and women each took second place in the Nebraska Invitational Saturday at Lincoln.

"Overall, it was a good meet," said Coach John Capriotti. "The kids competed well and we had some good performances. Now we just need to get everyone healthy."

Nebraska, which has won the Big Eight indoor and outdoor track meet every year that it has been held, once again dominated the competition taking first in both the men's and women's divisions.

"We've been second to them (Nebraska) for the last three years," Capriotti said. "Our up-front people are as good as theirs, but I don't know if we have the depth to beat them."

Pinkie Suggs had the most impressive performance of the meet. The former Big Eight champion, who was redshirted last season, won the women's shot put competition with a throw of 53-1 1/4 and in the process qualified for the national meet later this year. The throw broke her previous indoor school record of 52-8.

K-State's women's team collected 48 points, but Nebraska stole the show with 80 points. Wyoming came in third with 32, followed by Wichita State with 30 and Drake with 29.

Kim Kilpatrick took top honors in the hurdles for K-State with a 7.9, while the mile relay team of Kilpatrick, Damita Jones, Karen McGaughey, and Joy Jones placed first in 3:53.66.

Second-place finishers were Damita Jones in the 500-meter dash (1:16.14), Nancy Hoffman in the two-mile run (10:55.8), and Joy Jones who lost out in the 60-meter dash in a photo finish (6.98).

Felicia Carpenter placed third in the long jump with a leap of 18-1 1/4, and Marge Eddy finished third in the mile run clocking a 5:01.22.

Nebraska's men's team was even more dominating than theLady Cornhuskers, collecting 112 points. K-State followed with 47 points, Drake scored 34, Wyoming tallied 31 and Wichita State collected 12.

Running to a first-place finish in the 500-meter dash was one of K-State's top junior college recruits, Jeff Reynolds, who took the title with a 1:03.18. In the process, he defeated Regis Humphrey, the defending Big Eight champion in the 800-meter run.

Dan Myers threw for first in the shot put (56-3/4), and Ron Stahl won top honors in the mile run (4:11.22). The one-mile relay team of Melran Leach, Reynolds, Kelly Williams and Aaron Roberson also took first with a 3:17.65.

Roberson also took second place in the 440-yard run at 49.22.

Taking third-place finishes for the Wildcat men were Dan O'Mara in the shot put (55-2½), David Warders in the two-mile run (9:12.79) and Melran Leach in the 300-meter dash (31.9).

Iowa State University forward Jeff Grayer runs into K-State forward Norris Coleman as they scramble for a loose ball during the first half of the Wildcats 68-65 win. Grayer scored 23 for the Cyclones and sparked a second-half rally which fell three points short.

play, we were fortunate to win," Kruger said.

"I thought Iowa State did a good job of controlling the pace and the tempo. They wouldn't let us into our rhythm offensively. We weren't finding Norris, and that concerns me. We went to him inside a lot early and we kept looking inside and they made adjustments. We relied on him a little too much," he added.

"We didn't play very well in this game," said K-State guard Steve Henson. "It does feel good, though, to win a game like this when you didn't play particularly well. This game proves that we can win without the three-point shot."

Henson, with nine points, scored the 'Cats' only three-pointers, as K-State was 2-of-10 on three-point attempts. The 'Cats shot 46 percent from the field in the game.

Iowa State's Orr wanted either Elmer Robinson or Tom Schafer to try a three-point shot, or he wanted the ball to go inside to Grayer in hopes that he could make a basket and get fouled.

Instead, Sam Hill tried and missed his first three-point shot of the season.

Riederer leaves K-State for Akers, Big 10 team

By The Collegian Staff

Russ Riederer, K-State's football strength and conditioning coach since 1981, has accepted a similar position with newly hired head coach Fred Akers at the University of Purdue.

Riederer, a former starting linebacker for the Wildcats in 1977, graduated in 1980 from the University and has been with the team's strength and conditioning staff since 1979. According to Riederer, the decision to leave K-State was not an easy one.

"This (Manhattan-K-State) is more of home to me than where I grew up (Holton). I've made friends here that will last a lifetime."

Riederer said he was leaving Parrish's staff to improve the odds in meeting some long-term goals. The former K-State coach eventually would like to become a strength and conditioning coach for an NFL franchise.

"I feel very selfish, but not because I'm leaving. I think good things are going to happen at Kansas State," he said.

However, the new governor denied he picked the four because they support his position that Washburn, one of only two municipal universities in the nation, should be brought into the state system. He said he didn't ask the four their positions on the Washburn issue when he interviewed them.

He said he did ask them if they had the "willingness and courage" to address the Washburn issue, making their own decisions whether to support it based on the facts once they've had time to study it.

Hayden said he was convinced the four he picked have an open mind on the Washburn question, adding, "I'm also convinced they have the toughness to make a decision on it" without being swayed by the controversy which surrounds it.

Supporters of the present six state universities generally oppose admitting Washburn to the state system because of the potential drain they see on limited state financial resources. However, Hayden campaigned for governor on a pledge to work to bring Washburn into the state system.

His primary consideration in selecting them, Hayden said, was his desire for "people who have an overriding concern about the future of higher education in Kansas."

Asked why he replaced three Democrats appointed by his predecessor, John Carlin, with three other Democrats, Hayden replied:

"I think it's important when we have a new administration that we bring in people with new ideas. Maybe it's time for some new and fresh ideas.

"I have told each one of them that my philosophy is...they, along with the other members, are the ones who must make the decisions for higher education. I also told them I need some people with the toughness to make these decisions."

Hayden said the most pressing issue facing the regents is "the overall welfare of higher education, especially our institutions and their role in the future of education in our state."

He said he was pleased the Board of Regents completed work at its December meeting on new statements defining the missions and roles of the institutions under their supervision, and said he sees no reason for the reconstituted board to back up and take another look at them.

"My desire is to have a very, very cooperative effort between our regents institutions and their future roles," Hayden said.

Sexton, 60, is public relations director and area sales mamager for Steffan Dairy Foods Co. in Wichita. After graduating from WSU in 1948, when it was Wichita University, he taught school four years in Wichita. He has served six years on the WSU Board of Trustees, and his wife is an elementary school teacher in Wichita.

Senecal, 51, who holds a master's degree from Notre Dame, served on the state Parole Board in 1969-77, was a magistrate judge in 1961-69 and is a former research attorney for the state Supreme Court. He formerly served on the Benedictine Board of Governors.

Palmer 43, teaches second grade at Winfield Scott Elementary School in Fort Scott, and was the 1982 Kansas teacher of the year. A member of Kansas-National Education Association, she holds bachelor's and master's degrees plus an educational specialty degree from Pittsburg State.

Jeter, 72, is senior partner in a Hays law firm, and is a former county attorney of Ellis County as well as past member and president of the Hays Board of Education. He also is a past president of the Hays Chamber of Commerece.

mending the 3.8 percent cut for the presidents and I think all the university presidents are concurring with that," he said. "Some are in favor of it and some are opposed to it, but I think all are going along with it."

The salary reduction is for the last five months of the fiscal year which ends June 30.

The affected officials, their salaries and benefits, and the amount cut are:

— Budig, $110,393 in salary and benefits, a $1,748 cut.
— Wefald, $100,566, $1,592.
— Warren Armstrong, Wichita State University president, $89,626, $1,419.
— Gerald Tomanek, Fort Hays State University president, $78,696, $1,246.
— Donald Wilson, Pittsburg State University president, $76,893, $1,217.
— Robert Glennen, Emporia State University president, $74,051, $1,172.
— Koplik, $73,778, $1,168.
— Tilmans, $63,394, $1,004.
— Corman, $54,444, $862.

of all state employees who made more than $50,000 yearly by 3.8 percent. The Senate voted the bill down after debating whether it would break binding contracts with employees.

The Senate, however, passed a related bill asking the Regents to recommend the pay cuts of university presidents.

"It's nothing short of a mandate," said Stanley Koplick, Board of Regents' executive director.

"I not only accept it (the pay cut), but I fully support it," University President Jon Wefald said.

The board also heard a request from the students' advisory committee to adopt a statement opposing President Ronald Reagan's proposed cuts in federal assistance to students.

The cuts would affect work-study, guaranteed student loans and federal grants, the committee's report said.

"It would cause low-income, working and scholarship students to go more heavily in debt or drop out of school," the report said.

Communities prepare for King day activities

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — A crowd at a Boston church chanted "Now is the time" as Sen. Edward Kennedy recalled the goals of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. Sunday in one of several observances around the country leading up to the second federal holiday in King's honor.

"It is a national tragedy and a national disgrace that after 200 years of progress, the goal of racial justice now seems to be receding, not advancing," Kennedy told the crowd of about 400 people.

The Massachusetts Democrat used the church's celebration of King's birthday to accuse the Reagan administration of creating an environment that spawns racial incidents like the beating of blacks in the Howard Beach section of New York City.

Monday is a holiday for federal workers around the country, and for employees of the District of Columbia and most of the 40 states that have a public holiday for King.

The day will be marked with the ringing of bells in state capitol buildings, churches and schools across the nation as Housing and Urban Development Secretary Samuel Pierce Jr. taps the Liberty Bell at ceremonies in Philadelphia.

But financial markets are open and even in states where schools, banks and state offices are closed, some town halls may be open, along with many stores, restaurants, and bars.

Memorial walk, songs recall King's dream

Staff/Greg Vogel

Bowing their heads in prayer, David Sims, sophomore in architectural engineering, and Patrick Heard, junior in interior design, hold candles during a memorial service honoring slain civil rights leader Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Nearly 200 people participated in the candlelight service Monday night in All Faiths Chapel.

By DANA BRADLEY
Collegian Reporter

Monday evening "We Shall Overcome" rang throughout the campus as nearly 200 students, faculty and children clasped hands for a memorial walk from Cardwell Hall to All Faiths Chapel.

The men of Alpha Phi Alpha and President Jon Wefald and his wife, Ruth Ann, led the march. Students and faculty talked among themselves about the hope, the dream, and the work left to do.

"We are getting together as one, trying to relive what Martin Luther King started," said Joslene Wakefield, sophomore in apparel and textile marketing. "We have different goals, but we are still brothers and sisters. My dream is that one day prejudice will be completely wiped out."

"It is really special; we all come together," said Michelle Ragland, sophomore in industrial engineering. "We aren't separate. The white people are coming together with the blacks.

"My dream is to not only get a degree, but for other black students to have an opportunity to get ahead. I just want to share everything I've had with them."

K-State President Jon Wefald said everyone should rejoice and celebrate commitment, liberty and equality.

In tears, Wefald talked about non-violent peace marches; of Rosa Parks, the black woman who refused to give up her seat on a bus in Montgomery, Ala.; and the separate facilities existing for blacks and whites during the '60s.

Hakim A. Salahu-Din, assistant director of admissions, told how King was important to blacks and whites alike. He spoke of personal experiences as a child growing up in Miami, such as eating and swimming in segregated facilities.

His reflections of King were about the excitement he stirred in people and the need to keep moving forward. He stressed King's concern for education, the need to think and that character is the goal of education.

Earlier, nearly 50 people attended a noon religious observance in All Faiths Chapel, marking the beginning of the week-long celebration.

Observing the birthday of King, captures the civil rights leader's significance but points to the work which remains, said American Baptist Campus Minister Dave Stewart.

"This (the observance) serves two very important functions," he said. "It reminds us of Dr. King and the significance of his contributions to all of our lives. It also reminds us that we still have a lot of work to do."

To celebrate the birthday of the slain civil rights leader, the group sang hymns, and Stewart lead a responsive reading titled "Litany of Hope."

Politicians wary of hostage trade

By The Associated Press

BONN, West Germany — Prominent politicians cautioned officials Monday against swapping a Lebanese suspect in the 1985 TWA hijacking for a West German abducted in Beirut. They said a trade would inspire more terrorist attacks.

Government spokesmen in Bonn played down reports that the kidnapping in Beirut of businessman Rudolf Cordes was aimed at forcing the release of Mohammed Ali Hamadi, accused of being one of the terrorists who seized the jetliner in June 1985.

A U.S. Navy diver on the plane was shot to death at Beirut airport after the jet was commandeered during a flight from Rome to Athens.

Hans Stercken, chairman of Parliament's foreign affairs committee, said in a radio interview: "Those who are aware of the tendency toward terrorist acts in the Middle East know that the acceptance of blackmail increases the chances of new acts."

The Justice Ministry said Hamadi's extradition to the United States would be accomplished quickly. It had been delayed pending a pledge from the Americans not to apply the death penalty if Hamadi is convicted. West Germany does not have a death penalty.

Foreign Ministry officials renewed a warning against traveling to Lebanon and urged the approximately 200 West Germans living there to leave.

Hamadi, 22, was arrested last Tuesday at the Frankfurt airport after arriving from Beirut. U.S. officials have asked that he be extradited to stand trial in an American court.

Authorities said he was identified by fingerprints as one of those who seized the TWA aircraft June 14, 1985, shot Navy diver

Department of Defense to test fee for certain military outpatient care

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Office of Management and Budget, over strong Pentagon opposition, has forced the Defense Department to begin planning a test next year of charging fees for outpatient medical care delivered to military dependents and retirees.

Although the description of the plan in the fiscal 1988 budget calls only for a test with "nominal" fees, Pentagon officials are viewing the matter with trepidation.

They worry the test could lead to a permanent system of outpatient fees, reducing a key military benefit and in the process, undermining morale and damaging recruiting and retention efforts.

The size and location of the experiment have yet to be determined. Pentagon officials are determined, however, to keep it small and to have proceeds from fees plowed back to military personnel as contributions to the morale and recreation fund or improvements to medical facilities.

All told, 7 million retirees and military dependents are eligible to use military hospitals and clinics without charge if space is available. Active-duty personnel are guaranteed free medical care at all times, and the new test would not affect them.

Military medical facilities handle some 50 million outpatient visits every year.

"This is rather obscurely buried in the budget and the word is only now starting to seep out," said one top Pentagon official who requested anonymity.

"But it's already sending people up the walls. The general public might view this as reasonable. But it's an incredibly emotional thing to the military. Rational people get unrational on this."

Another Pentagon source acknowledged "that from the standpoint of health care policy, it's probably sound."

"You can understand the genesis of it," this official continued. "But the military has certain obligations to its people.

"For example, the sailor goes off to sea, leaving behind a teen-age wife and new baby. The wife doesn't know how to take the baby's temperature so she brings him to a clinic. It happens. So how are you going to charge her for that?"

"We're very concerned about this," agreed Chapman Cox, the Pentagon's top official for personnel issues.

"It was absolutely not suggested by the Defense Department. We're good soldiers and we'll do it (the test) if we're told to. But we will do the best we can to protect the interests of our people."

The plan to test outpatient fees is outlined in a single paragraph in supporting documentation sent to Congress with the 1988 budget. It refers to two projects "to improve conditions for servicemen and women and their families as well as to reduce costs."

One project will involve an experi-

Decline in computer students duplicates nationwide trend

From Staff and Wire Reports

Declining enrollment figures in the field of computer science at K-State seem to be following a national trend, said Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computer Science.

"We've lost maybe 10 percent of the undergraduate population over the last two years," Wallentine said. "That's a nationwide trend, and in many places it's higher than that."

Officials at universities around the nation agree.

Last fall, the 5-year-old computer science program at Northeastern University in Boston saw its freshman class drop 40 percent, to 120 students, said Paul Kalaghan, dean of the College of Computer Science at Northeastern University in Boston.

"When we started, we had upwards of 300 freshmen come in," he said.

The real problem behind the declining enrollment is a slump in the personal computer market, Wallentine said.

"Students tend to think that if people aren't buying PCs (personal computers), there aren't any jobs in computer science," he said.

Not true, Wallentine said.

"The demand is just as high or higher now than it's ever been for computer science majors."

Another cause for the declining enrollment is the misconception that the demand for computer science graduates has decreased, he said.

"The market is just as strong or stronger than it ever has been," Wallentine said. "The decline was due to a misconception on the part of the students."

He said a 1982 University of California at Los Angeles study indicated about 4.4 percent of all high school students wanted to become computer scientists.

In late 1985, a similar study showed only 2.2 percent of all high school students had the same goals.

No lack of demand for computer science graduates was indicated by the survey, Wallentine said.

Computer science students graduating in May should have no more problems finding jobs than those who graduated last year, he said.

"The demand is still there," Wallentine said.

A third cause for the enrollment decline was a misunderstanding by students who entered the program in 1982 and 1983.

'Five years ago, computers looked like they were the land of good money and easy opportunity.'

— Paul Kalaghan

"A lot of high school students came in thinking computer science meant playing games," Wallentine said. "But now that students experience computing in high school, they realize it is work — it's not games."

"Five years ago, computers looked like they were the land of good money and easy opportunity," Kalaghan said.

"I think today people understand it's a scientific discipline," he said. "Students found it was more difficult, that the mathematical rigor was large. It's not an easy business, really, when you couple that to the negative press the computer industry is getting."

"They found that they had to take calculus, they had to take physics," said John Rice, chairman of the Department of Computer Sciences at Purdue University in West Lafayette, Ind. "It's not a video games major."

Kalaghan said some students apparently confused computer science with computer programming, a less scientific endeavor by which people translate the work of the computer scientist into instructions for the computer.

Computer science was a "fairly specialized, technical field," said Jay Nievergelt, chairman of the Department of Computer Science at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. "Then five years ago, personal computers hit the home, and everybody thought you had to be a student in computer science. It was a fad."

Annapia Niedzielski, a 22-year-old Northeastern University student, said she transferred from the computer science program to the business college after two years because computer science was not what she expected, not because she couldn't do well.

"I had taken a BASIC (computer language) course in high school and I liked that," said Niedzielski. But once in the Northeastern program, "I didn't like the fact that it seemed very narrow-minded. It's very technical, and that's all that you did."

While the enrollment figures have decreased, K-State's department has noticed a sharp increase in the quality of students entering the program, Wallentine said.

"We're getting higher ACT scorers than we did in the past," he said. "We feel it is a very positive thing."

Computer science professors at other universities also believe a decline in enrollment is healthy.

"I think it's an excellent development," Nievergelt said. "There was an unreasonably high flooding of computer science curriculums, and fortunately that is evening out now."

Enrollment in UNC's computer science program has dropped by half in the past few years, from a high of about 100 students a year, Nievergelt said.

Ortega advocates more peace talks

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — President Daniel Ortega, meeting with 10 Latin American diplomats, called Monday for a resumption of bilateral talks between his government and the United States.

U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar of Peru, Secretary-General Joao Baena Soares of the Organization of American States from Brazil, and foreign ministers of the four Contadora nations and their four-member support group met with Ortega in hopes of persuading his leftist government to help revive regional peace talks.

Ortega, in presenting what was called a peace proposal, said Nicaragua wants "to arrive at bilateral accords that guarantee the legitimate security concerns of the United States in the region." A summary of the proposal was read on a government radio station.

The Reagan administration suspended talks with Nicaragua in January 1985 after nine rounds of meetings.

Journalists visit Iraqi battlefront

NAFT KHANEH, Iraq — An Iraqi general said Monday that thousands of Iranian soldiers died during the past week in charges against the Iraqi defenders of these dusty, ravine-cut hils.

"Theno-man's land and hillocks are filled with bodies and equipment," Brig. Gen. Abded al-Mutlak al-Jabouri told reporters as artillery fire shook his headquarters.

But a busload of journalists taken to the site 75 miles northeast of Baghdad saw no dead Iranians nor any Iranian prisoners.

The government provided the escorted trip to Naft Khaneh to reporters who have been pleading for a week to vist another battle site — the major struggle east of Basra, on Iraq's southern tip and the country's second-largest city.

Iranian invaders have established a beachhead on Iraqi territory and are hammering the port city of Basra with artillery and rocket fire.

Both Iraq and Iran generally bar foreign reporters from going to the war front, and the action around Basra remained off limits.

Stations refuse evangelist's show

TULSA, Okla. — Viewers of evangelist Oral Roberts' weekly television program saw different versions of his "Expect A Miracle" show Sunday, depending on what city they were watching in.

A handful of the 240 television stations that air Roberts' program had indicated they would not allow the show to go on if it contained further pleas for contributions to "extend Oral Roberts' life."

Roberts said on his program Jan. 4 and Jan. 11 that God told him he would die by March unless he raised $4.5 million by then to complete funding of an $8 million medical missionary scholarship program.

The program sent by Roberts' ministry for airing Sunday was edited for consumption in some markets. The show was comprised of taped segments from the daily program hosted by Roberts' son, Richard.

At the end of the program aired in Kansas City, Mo., for instance, Richard Roberts said:

"Say yes, Richard, I'll stand with you, I'll stand with Oral Roberts, I'll extend Oral Roberts' life, I'll answer that mandate."

In a version shown in Richmond, Va., and some other cities, the phrase "I'll extend Oral Roberts' life" is not present.

Roberta Benegre, assistant program director at Kansas City's WDAF, said her station ran the program as received because "we are taking a totally neutral stand" on the message it contains.

Soviet enters U.S. for treatment

WASHINGTON — Soviet dissident Inna Meiman arrived from Moscow on Monday to begin cancer treatment and said, "I've been tortured for three years" by the refusal of Soviet authorities to let her go sooner.

She left behind her ill husband, Naum Meiman, 75, a mathematician and human rights activist who has been denied permission to leave the Soviet Union.

"It was such anguish for me to leave alone that I can't talk about it," she said after arriving at Washington Dulles International Airport.

"What is all the cruelty for?" she said of Soviet officials. "It is not understandable."

Meiman, 54, planned to enter Georgetown University Hospital for evaluation and treatment of cancer, said Jerry Strober, spokesman for the National Conference on Soviet Jewry.

She was taken from the airplane in a wheelchair and wore a neck brace.

Senator asks federal wage increase

WASHINGTON — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy suggested Monday he would press for an increase in the federal minimum wage of at least $1.25 above the present $3.35.

An increase in the minimum wage is a priority for the Massachusetts Democrat as he sets his agenda as chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee.

Kennedy discussed his plans for the committee in an interview in his Senate office.

In addition to the minimum wage proposal, Kennedy said he would support proposals for catastrophic health insurance for Medicare recipients, would resist Reagan administration plans for deep cuts in spending for education and would press for greater increases in AIDS research than proposed by the president.

Reflecting a prevalent mood among the Democrats who have taken control of the Senate for the first time since Reagan became president in 1981, Kennedy emphasized in almost every instance the minimal impact his proposals would have on the federal budget.

At a hearing last week at which Labor Secretary William Brock testified, Kennedy said he favored an increase in the minimum wage which hasn't changed since Jan. 1, 1981.

Soviets invite defector to perform

NEW YORK — Mikhail Baryshnikov, who defected from the Soviet Union in 1974, has been invited to dance again in his homeland, his manager and a Bolshoi Ballet official said Monday.

Yuri Grigorovich, the Bolshoi's artistic director, disclosed the invitation to Baryshnikov at a news conference announcing the Bolshoi's four-city U.S. tour next summer.

"I've met with Baryshnikov and Misha (Baryshnikov) will be dancing at the Bolshoi Theater," Grigorovich said through an interpreter. "I'll be very happy on that occasion."

Baryshnikov, however, has not decided on whether he will accept the invitation, said his manager, Edgar Vincent.

Grigorovich extended the invitation Sunday night, and "Misha said, 'Let me think about that,'" according to Vincent.

Asked under what conditions Baryshnikov might return, Vincent replied: "I don't think that was even discussed. Grigorovich wanted Baryshnikov to know the Russian government would not frown about him coming, that detente is on, and they are trying to get some of the great Russian artists to reappear in Russia."

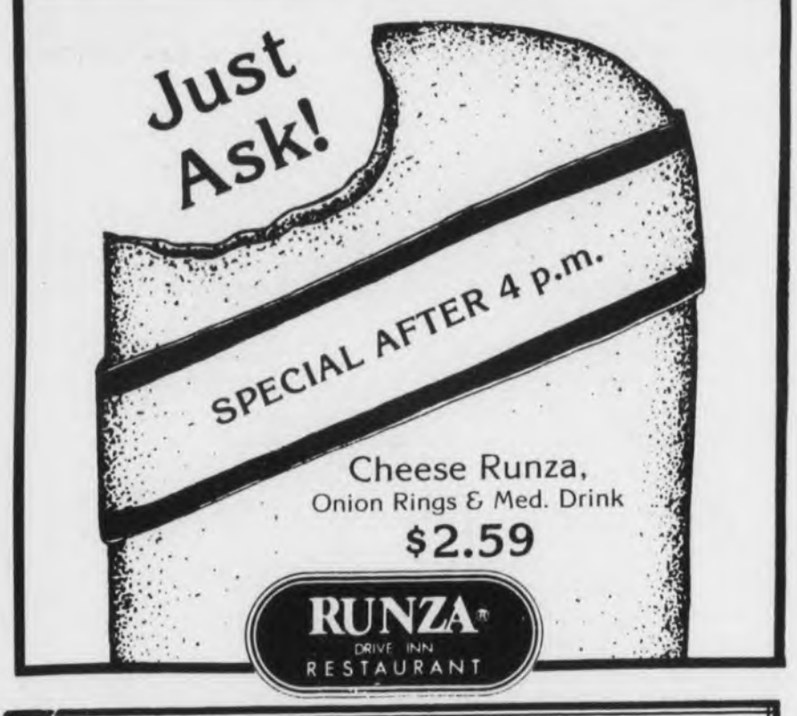
Official says K.C. may lose Republican convention bid

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Missouri Republican Party Chairman Hillard Selck said Monday he would not protest a decision to have the GOP National Convention in New Orleans if Kansas City gets only three votes as he expects.

Selck said Monday that it appears Kansas City will lose out to New Orleans for the convention because New Orleans has the support of the chairman of the eight-member site selection committee, Frank Fahrenkopf.

The site selection committee will vote today. The Republican National Committee will ratify the selection Friday.



Selck had said last week that he would file a minority report with the National Committee if Kansas City lost. He said Monday that three votes would not be a strong enough position from which to file a minority report.

Fahrenkopf apparently supports New Orleans because the South is believed to hold the key to the 1988 presidential election. Republicans also think the Superdome in New Orleans, which seats 70,000 people, would be a great place to hold the convention.

"For the first time in the history of political conventions, it would seat all the guests that could possibly want to attend," Selck said.

Jim Hutchinson, president of the Convention and Visitors Bureau of Greater Kansas City, said the city had met all requirements and had made a good presentation to the Republicans.

"If the Republicans go to New Orleans, it'll be because they want to strengthen their political base in the South, and that's something we can't do anything about," Hutchinson said.

STUDENT SPOUSE ELIGIBILITY FOR CARE AT LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER

All students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene Health Center.

STUDENT SPOUSES can be eligible for care to include all the available services at Lafene Student Health Center simply by paying the SPOUSE HEALTH FEE each semester. This SPOUSE HEALTH FEE is for the same amount as the STUDENT HEALTH FEE. This SPOUSE HEALTH FEE must be paid within 10 days of the time the student's own health fees are paid. This SPOUSE HEALTH FEE is to be paid at the Lafene Health Center's Cashier desk.

Lafene Student Health Center sees only students and their spouses who have paid their Health fees. Children cannot be seen.

For more information contact Lafene Health Center at 532-6544.

In spite of recent inclement weather, workmen continue construction of the Manhattan Town Center mall as planned and have 85 percent of the structural steel work completed. The mall, which is scheduled to open in October, will be anchored by Dillard's and J.C. Penney Co.

Mall construction on schedule despite weather

By CHRIS HALL
Collegian Reporter

In spite of recent periods of bad weather, construction on the Manhattan Town Center mall continues on schedule.

The mall is scheduled to open this October, with a grand opening ceremony planned for Oct. 26.

"The work is going really well. We're on schedule at this point, but knowing the weather in this part of the country we could fall behind at any time," said Doug Kimple, assistant superintendent for the Law Construction Co. of Wichita, the general contractor working on the mall. "We're doing everything we can to prevent that from happening."

Eighty-five percent of the mall's structural steel work is complete. The construction crew is working on the exterior walls and the roofing so the building will be waterproof, and work can continue without being affected by the weather, said Kimple, a 1983 K-State graduate in construction science.

A topping-off ceremony will be held at 10 a.m. Thursday near the entrance of the mall at the east end of Poyntz Avenue. This ceremony will mark the setting of the last steel post for the mall.

"Everything is running smoothly," he said. "We have a very good bunch of subcontractors and the people involved in this project have a lot of experience building malls."

Kimple said the architects for the project, RTKL Associates in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., did an excellent job designing the mall, and he believes the residents of Manhattan will be pleased with the finished product.

J.C. Penney Co., one of the anchor shops in the mall, is under a separate contract to The Osborne Co., a local contractor.

"We have a cooperative effort with Osborne," Kimple said. "Because our projects do tie together, sometimes questions arise about who does what. But there is never a problem."

Work on the J.C. Penney section of the mall started in December and is about 20 percent finished, said Bob Lansdowne, project manager.

The foundation and structural steel work is complete, while construction is continuing on the roof deck, masonry and underground plumbing, Lansdowne said.

Construction is a little ahead of schedule for the J.C. Penney project, which has the same completion date as the rest of the mall.

Construction on Dillard's will begin in March.

Pentagon report shows secret nuclear exercises

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The United States and Britain have conducted secret exercises designed to cope with nuclear weapons accidents and nuclear bomb threats by terrorists, The Independent newspaper reported Monday.

The story from Washington said details of the joint exercises were contained in a Pentagon report obtained under the Freedom of Information Act by U.S. nuclear weapons analyst William Arkin.

A Ministry of Defense spokesman, when asked to confirm the report, said: "We have plans for a wide range of contingencies particularly where public safety is involved. We would be irresponsible if we did not.

"And obviously it is prudent to exercise contingency planning, which we do from time to time. We involve all those people who would be involved in the contingency, so in certain cases the participation of U.S forces is welcomed." He spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Independent said the Pentagon report, dated 1984, is an annual assessment to the president of the security and safety of U.S. nuclear weapons at military bases in Britain and elsewhere in Europe. It also focuses on the transportation of uranium and plutonium, which are used in making nuclear weapons, the paper said.

The possibility of terrorist attacks on U.S. nuclear bases in Europe has become a top priority in NATO, the paper said.

The report said U.S. allies have become more sensitive to nuclear-related problems, but also found that nuclear accident response teams in Europe "still lag behind our own national capability," the paper quoted it as saying.

In a 1984 British exercise codenamed Cinder, the report was quoted as saying Americans watched a "field test of the United Kingdom diagnostic capabilities against an improvised nuclear device."

The paper said this means a British radiation detection team was given the task of trying to find a purported terrorist bomb using special monitoring devices.

The results weren't included in the Pentagon report but the paper quoted some U.S. officials associated with the American Nuclear Emergency Search Team as saying the capability of such teams is limited.

The Independent said there were six threats in the United States in 1984 involving improvised nuclear devices but none was considered credible enough to call out the U.S. team. It gave no details of the purported threats.

Apart from stepped-up security at all NATO bases, The Independent said the alliance is adopting a new series of safety devices in nuclear weapons designed to make them virtually impossible for a terrorist group to explode.

Officials halt active underground unit

By The Associated Press

SOMERVILLE, N.J. — Law officers say they have cracked the most active unit in the domestic armed underground with convictions in a New York bombing case, a mixed verdict from a New Jersey trooper slaying trial and a pending sedition case in Boston.

But a lawyer for one of the avowed revolutionaries in the New Jersey case says of the United Freedom Front: "It's out there. I'm sure you'll hear from them."

"Where there is repression, there will always be resistance," said the lawyer, Lynne Stewart.

A mistrial was declared Sunday for her client, Richard C. Williams, when a jury failed to reach a verdict.

Co-defendant Thomas W. Manning was convicted of felony murder, which is committing homicide while committing another felony, robbery and escape. But he was acquitted of the separate charge of murder, leaving in question who fired nine shots that killed Trooper Philip Lamonaco in December 1981.

The state alleged that Manning was driving a car Lamonaco stopped, and that the trooper confiscated a gun before being shot by Williams, a passenger in the car.

Manning contended he shot the trooper in self-defense. Williams denied he was even at the murder scene. The state is considering whether to retry Williams.

Despite the mistrial, which the defendants hailed as a victory for "anti-imperialist freedom fighters," law enforcement agents say the United Freedom Front is essentially destroyed.

"I think they're pretty well wiped out," said New Jersey Detective Sgt. Richard Ryan, who worked on the case for four years.

Manning and Williams face lengthy prison terms for their March 1986 conviction with five other United Freedom Front members in the bombing of New York-area corporate and military offices from 1982 to 1984. The seven also face trial in Boston on charges of plotting to overthrow the federal government.

It has taken law officers more than a decade to get this far in efforts to break the United Freedom Front.

"These guys were good," said an FBI agent, who spoke on condition of anonymity of the nearly three years it took to arrest Williams, with four other people in Ohio, and the almost 3½ years it took to find Manning and his wife in Virginia.

The search involved more than 24 officers full-time and hundreds of others when there was a lead.

Police traced Williams, Manning and his wife, and two other couples through a maze of aliases, safehouses and mail drops through at least seven states.

Investigators say the fugitives took countless precautions to avoid capture. For example, the couples' children were always out sick on the day school pictures were taken each year, and the children learned to change their names overnight.

The families lived apparently typical lives in rural areas, but had caches of weapons in bedroom trunks. On every gun, except those used at public firing ranges, the serial numbers were destroyed.

But the group also had a penchant for saving things, and raids on the Ohio houses yielded a bonanza of evidence.

Kansas won't benefit by regent-imposed cut

Hooray for the Kansas Legislature, which last week failed to pass an amendment that would make state employees making over $50,000 annually take a 3.8 percent pay reduction.

Hisses to the Kansas Board of Regents, which did impose a 3.8 percent cut in pay on the system's university presidents.

Mandatory pay cuts for state employees are hardly worth the effort.

What would it accomplish? Nothing but hard feelings.

Sure, voters might get the impression that it is a noble gesture for the leaders of our state to take a pay cut to help Kansas rebound from its financial woes. But don't listen to Gov. Mike Hayden's peer-pressuring remarks.

Keep in mind the pay cuts are only symbolic and will have virtually no effect on soothing the sting of Hayden's $60 million budget cut.

On Friday, the Regents cut the university presidents' salaries 3.8 percent. Just how much will it save the state? A measly $11,428.

What do pay cuts ultimately cost the state? Unhappy employees, loss of morale and possibly the eventual loss of a good employee.

Managers will attest that a high turnover rate is a sign of unhappy employees. It would be a shame for Kansas to lose its most talented employees, who do have employment contracts, over this incident.

Kansas already produces some of the finest people to only lose them across the state's boundaries. To lose those valuable employees Kansas has managed to keep is something the state can ill-afford.

It is fine for employees to voluntarily trim their own paychecks, but for the state to take the paper cutter to them is asinine. It is hard to believe that even those who have voluntarily taken a pay cut are not just a little bit disgruntled by having to succumb to Hayden's misdirected wishes.

AIDS awareness week to increase education

Through the efforts of the Gay and Lesbian Resource Center and the State Department of Health and Environment, a deadly disease that has been selectively ignored by segments of the population will be brought to the fore of consciousness for at least one week.

In March or April, the GLRC will sponsor an AIDS awareness week. The week is made possible by a $1,400 grant from the Department of Health and Environment. GLRC will also work with similar organizations at the University of Kansas and Wichita State University.

GLRC President Patrick Orth, senior in interior architecture, said AIDS is no longer just the "gay plague," and he's right. The disease has become significantly more pervasive across the country, and its death sentences no longer discriminate on the basis of sexual persuasion.

Although much remains to be done before we approach a cure for AIDS, simple education about how it is — and isn't — spread will dispel many of the ludicrous notions people hold regarding its transmission. Education will also help slow the disease's deadly, ugly march.

The Department of Health and Environment should be commended for donating its dollars, and the GLRC should be commended for donating its efforts. Similar efforts all across the nation will have a positive effect in bringing AIDS out of the closet and into public discussion.

Congress should stop troubled B1-B project

In the late 1960s, the idea of a strategic bomber, named the B-1, was born.

Now, almost 20 years later and at a price tag of $283 million per plane, the aircraft has met with considerable controversy.

The B-1B has been a "problem child" for quite some time. In 1977, President Jimmy Carter put a temporary end to the B-1B, however in 1981, President Ronald Reagan reinstated the project and ordered 100 of the supersonic aircraft.

Total cost will be nearly $30 million by the time the last one is finished. But worse, the bombers won't even do the job for which they were built.

Problems include fuel leaking from the wing tanks, faulty onboard computers and the inability of the aircraft to perform defensive maneuvers when fully loaded. These and other drawbacks have led many in the Pentagon and elsewhere to nickname the plane the "flying Edsel." Hence, the Pentagon has requested $600 million for repairs.

As production nears the halfway point, it can only be hoped the project will be scrapped again. Even if it wasn't plagued with difficulties, questions remain in the Senate and the Pentagon as to whether the B-1B can perform its designated mission.

For now, the least we can hope for is that the rest of the project's $30 billion will be spent on finding a system that works, sparing us the cost of a bomber that will only be scrapped down the road.

And the winners of 1986 are...

Collegian Columnist

At the end of each year, I have been mystified by the constant desire by some individuals to highlight the previous year with awards. It makes you wonder if some people are so shallow that only when achievements are minimized to an award are they given the opportunity to appreciate them.

But when I was given the chance to write a column, I saw the opportunity to offer such awards in a completely new light. It seems in our society that a short-term memory is a positively reinforced asset — just ask Ronald Reagan. Perhaps in our world of specialization we do require people to take a second look for us.

So with that cue, I humbly submit my honorable and dubious awards to those individuals and achievements that I noticed on our campus and around the world during the year that was 1986.

Honorable Faculty Awards:

— Nancy Twiss, College of Arts and Sciences. From one of the smallest offices on campus, this woman plays a vital role in nurturing some of the most significant distinctions given the students of this university, including the Rhodes and Truman Scholarships.

— Phil Anderson, Department of Speech. His campus issue speeches in the public speaking class offer a small glimmer of hope that student activism might still exist. But Phil, the sixties were fun, but the rest of us have given up the clothes.

Dubious Faculty Awards:

Are you crazy? I still need law school references.

Honorable Campus Achievement:

Kelly Welch and another Rhodes Scholarship for K-State.

Dubious Campus Award:

The purple trash cans. These continue to be as appropriate as the notion of establishing an art museum at this land-grant institution during a farm depression.

Honorable Political Award:

George Schultz. He's the only reason U.S. foreign policy might continue to have an audience outside Washington.

Dubious Political Award:

Mario Cuomo. Just examine this situation closely. This man is being billed as a presidential candidate because he defeated Ed Koch for governor of New York. Lyndon Larouche — even if he confessed to being a homosexual — could probably defeat Ed Koch in such a race. Let's get things in perspective before 1988.

Honorable Entertainment Award:

Whitney Houston. This woman was so hot, I even tried to drink Diet Coke when she started doing those ads. I'm still trying to get the taste out of my mouth.

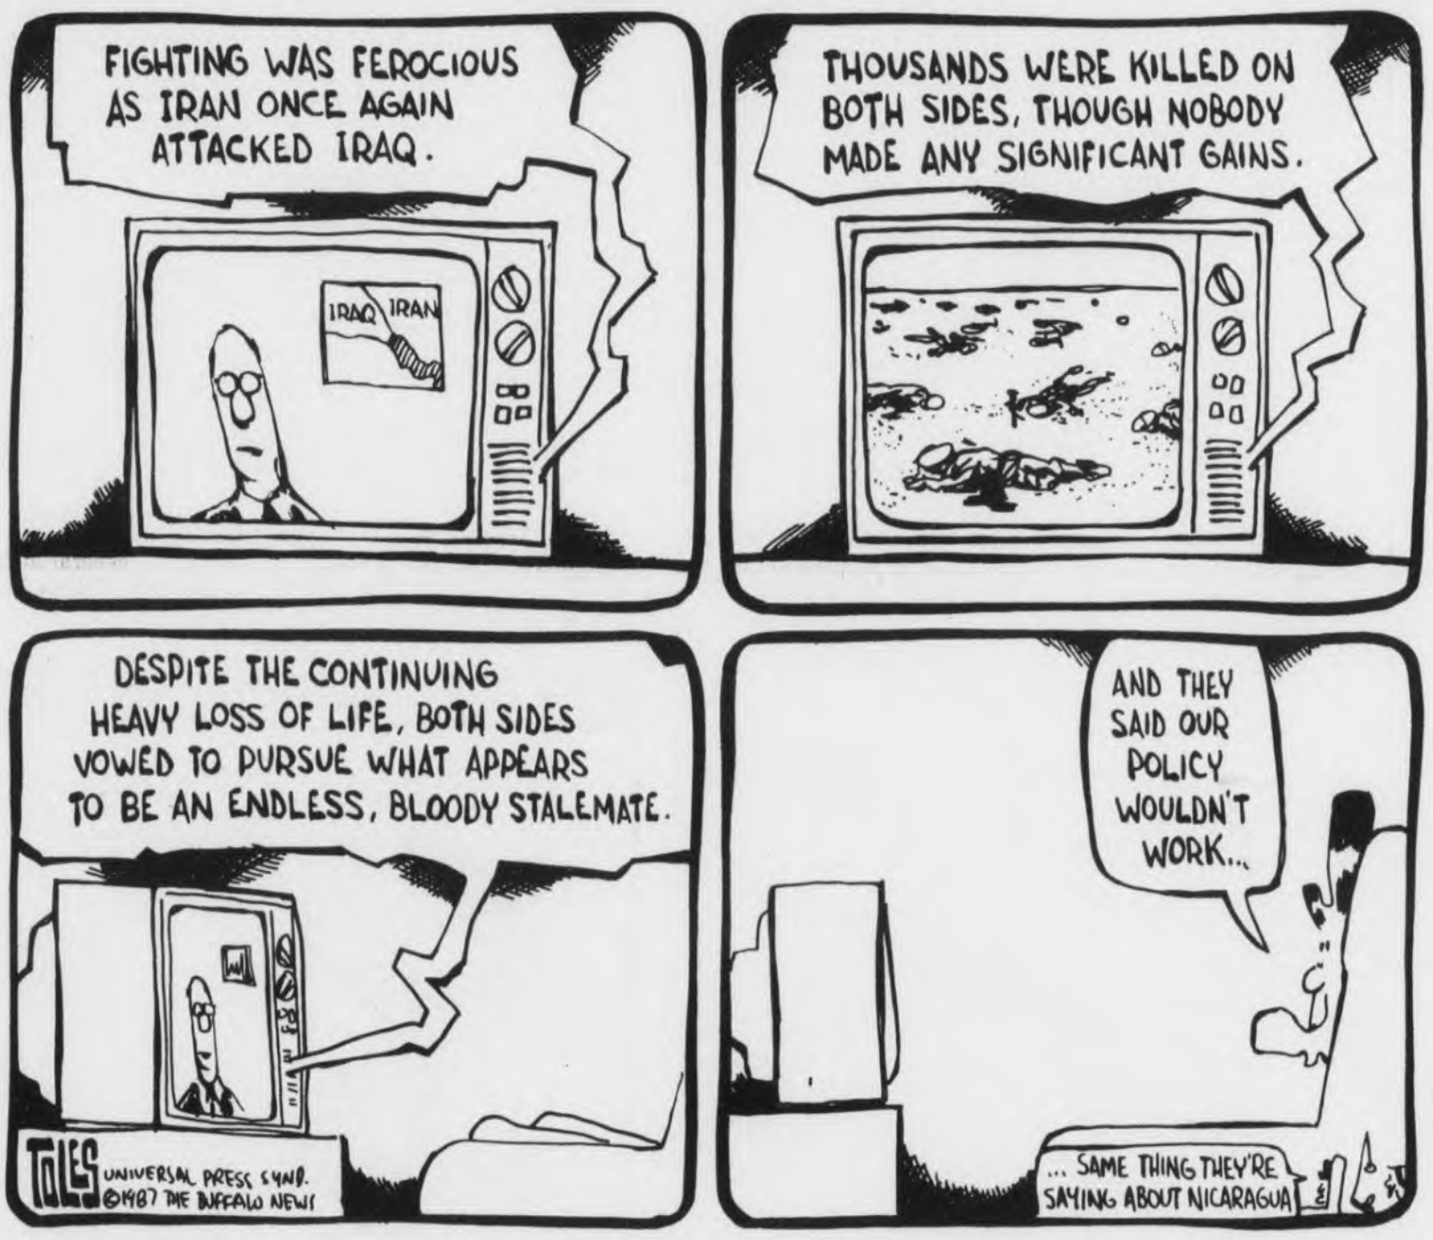
Dubious Entertainment Awards:

— Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. The shunning of "The Color Purple" for another Meryl Streep movie was the scam of the year. Can the woman act without an accent?

— "The Oprah Winfrey Show." The last thing I need is another new diet or tips on how to keep my man. Phil Donahue never looked better.

Honorable Sports Award:

Norris Coleman's patience.



Dubious Sports Awards:

— The New York Yacht Club. They showed us what happened when they couldn't make the rules for the America's Cup this time. They lost.

— The NCAA. They showed us what happens when "polyester-wielding glory day has-beens" continue to make the rules. We all lose.

The scope of these awards reflects the nature of 1986. We had many grand highs such as when the people of the Philippines taught us a few things about democracy in today's world. On the other side of the scale, we had many heartbreaks. For the first time in many years, the Challenger tragedy reminded us of the price of technology. And the Reykjavik summit did little to reassure the children of the world that we really do want peace someday.

And yet it was a year just like our own lives. It is only when we experience the lowest lows that we fully appreciate when the human spirit ascends to its full potential. If I have one wish for this year, it is that this disposition may begin to change — in other words, that we do not have to experience the worst to appreciate the best of what life has to offer.

Officials ignore student views

CATHERINE SAYLER
Guest Columnist

The long-standing marriage between the University and student-funded groups is being tested right now and may end with bitterness on both sides.

The cause of the dispute is the imposition of a 3 percent charge on income from auxiliary groups including certain student-funded groups. The charge, announced by President Jon Wefald last week, has left directors of the student groups and several students aghast.

The student-funded groups that were levied the charge include the K-State Union, $100,000; Student Publications, Inc. $20,000; and Health Services $13,500. These groups must fork over half the amount — a total of $66,725 — this month.

Anyone attending the Student Governing Association's yearly allocation of student monies knows that these groups have rapidly shrinking monetary reserves and have heard the drastic consequences of any money being taken from their budgets.

Since the $66,725 retroactive charge is clearly an "unexpected emergency" (the rather redundantly worded criterion for a special allocation), each group will be justified in asking the SGA to cover the charge.

Since SGA doesn't have $66,725 in its reserve accounts, it must ignore the requests now and later increase the student activity fee. The result of President Wefald's dictum — an increased activity fee — is why many believe student government should have been consulted about the charge.

Some students believe the charge is a way to circumvent student government altogether. Several years ago, when the University needed an academic support fee of $10, student government was directly consulted and the merits of such a fee were debated in Student Senate. The fee received approval of a majority of the senators and lasted for two years.

In the current case, Senate will never discuss the fee for which it will indirectly pay. Instead, Senae must only decide whether to allow the quality of student services to decrease.

This tactic of shifting the focus of the fee-increase debate is a manipulation uncharacteristic and unworthy of President Wefald's heretofore straightforward approach.

That such a charge can be levied on student-funded groups destroys the myth upon which student fee assessment is based. Student senators are told that only students can decide the mix of student fee funding vs. user-charge funding.

When the University can, at a whim, demand that user charges of student services be increased (at least until Senate decides it has no choice but to raise the fee), it is obvious students do not have sole control over the organizations they built and maintain.

For instance, officials at Lafene Student Health Center claim that increased user charges will decrease the availability of health services to many students. The University, with its recent action, has made health services less available to students. That action, in theory, should have been taken only by senators who voted to do so after input from the students.

In the case of the Union, Director Walt Smith has said several times the Union budget is so tight that if any money is taken away the first change to be made is to start charging for check cashing. With such a large amount demanded from the Union, students can expect that change to occur soon, again without student input.

The Union, however, does have another option for raising revenue — an increase in the Union use fee. The University's fee for the fiscal year 1986-1987 is $49,308, a bargain for how often the University uses the Union. A retroactive increase in the University's fee could cover the costs of the University's imposed retroactive charge.

K-State's budget is tight and, as President Wefald has said, we must be "team players." If he believes this philosophy, he should have convinced Senate of the need for a direct institutional support fee.

By using this roundabout method to get money from the students, he has demonstrated that students aren't thinking members of the team, but merely something that must be stepped around in order to accomplish objectives.

Education, vet school avoid class cuts

BUDGETS on the block

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

Instructional aspects of the College of Veterinary Medicine have not been greatly impaired by budget cuts, said James Coffman, dean of the college, but the college has made substantial reductions in many departments.

"I don't feel we are hurting the quality of the classes at this point," he said.

However, areas affected by the reductions include the purchase and repair of equipment needed throughout the college's departments.

"We won't be able to maintain the flow of necessary supplies to the classes," Coffman said.

In addition, the Veterinary Hospital, operated by the Department of Surgery and Medicine, will not be able to purchase equipment necessary to keep the hospital up to date and in good standing.

"We lack the equipment to do what a veterinary hospital should be doing," said Jerry Gillespie, department head.

The hospital was experiencing financial difficulties before the budget cuts. These difficulties, Gillespie said, caused further problems with the the hospital's accreditation.

When reviewing the college for accreditation, the American Veterinary Medical Association found the Veterinary Hospital to be marginal, lacking in sufficient faculty and equipment.

In order to save more money, the surgery and medicine department is freezing all unfilled staff, faculty and student positions, Gillespie said.

"This will be most injurious to the student employee program," he said.

Other departments will also have fewer staff and faculty members this semester.

"The college will be extremely shorthanded because of the unfilled positions," Coffman said.

The Department of Pathology is saving money by reducing its equipment purchases and operating funds, said J.E. Cook, department head.

"We are operating, but when service contracts need to be renewed, we'll have to check our funds to see if we can renew them," he said.

Travel funding is another area that will be affected by the cuts in the college.

Faculty in the surgery and medicine department will not be able to travel to out-of-state meetings and conferences that they have been invited to because there isn't enough money, Gillespie said.

In addition, the lack of money affects the surgery and medicine department's ability to assist post-graduate students going through the certification program, he said.

Although the College of Education did not cut any classes this semester, it will be reducing funds in other areas, said Michael Holen, associate dean of the college.

The mandated budget reductions will have a major effect on the quality and quantity of classes and student supervision, he said.

Because most students in the college are either in their last two years of undergraduate study or in graduate school, Holen said he did not feel the college could afford to drop classes in which students were enrolled and expecting to take.

The sections offered this semester, however, will be larger than in the past because class sections have been consolidated.

"This (larger classes) means there will be a little less individual attention for the students," Holen said.

In addition, faculty will be experiencing an increased work load because they will have more students to advise and more student teachers to supervise.

The quality and quantity of equipment will also be hurt, Holen said.

In order to save in other areas, the college took money out of a fund set aside to purchase microcomputers and microcomputer software.

All equipment purchases and repairs will have to wait until the budget is more stable, Holen said.

Several divisions within the college also found it necessary to cut back on student help.

Although no one was laid off, Holen said the college has reduced the number of hours the students work. In addition, the college was unable to hire more student help this semester as planned.

Other areas within the college have not yet been affected by the budget cuts, he said.

Vera Freeman, director of the Center for Economic Education, said the center is supported by a great deal of external funding that is not affected by the reductions.

"At the moment, I don't believe I'll see any cuts this spring," she said.

These two stories are the fourth part of a series on the impact of budget cuts on K-State's colleges.

Civil rights marchers vow to walk again

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Civil rights leaders vowed Monday to stage a second march in all-white Forsyth County on Saturday to challenge the hatred of Ku Klux Klan members who attacked the first march last week.

The attack Saturday was a reminder "that the struggle for freedom and justice is not over and Martin's dream is not fully realized," Correta Scott King said at the tomb of her assassinated husband, Martin Luther King Jr., on the second federal holiday honoring him.

Recent racial incidents at Howard Beach, N.Y., The Citadel military school in South Carolina and Forsyth County show that "racism, hate and bigotry are on the rise," Mrs. King said, echoing the comments of the Rev. Jesse Jackson and Southern Christian Leadership Conference President Joseph Lowery.

"In the spirit of Martin Luther King Jr., we must rise up to meet hatred with love, to match bigotry with courage and to resist violent acts with non-violence," she said at a news conference.

Eight people were arrested in Forsyth County on Saturday after about 400 counter-demonstrators, including KKK members, interrupted a "brotherhood anti-intimidation" march near Cumming. Police in riot gear could not control the crowd, and several of the 90 black and white marchers were slightly injured.

Finally, the marchers were placed on a bus to complete their march out of range of the counter-demonstrators.

The Klan then led a rally at the county courthouse, with speakers saying whites will not tolerate blacks in the north Georgia county.

The march originally was planned by white Forsyth County resident Chuck Blackburn to mark King's Jan. 15 birthday. But he backed off, saying he had received "dozens of death threats."

Two white residents of nearby Hall County, Tammy and Dean Carter, then took up the plan, and Hosea Williams, an Atlanta city councilman and former King aide, joined them and took marchers from Atlanta by bus.

Williams and Carter said at Monday's news conference that the second march would be held in Forsyth County on Saturday.

In Forsyth County, Roger Crow, president-elect of the Cumming-Forsyth County Chamber of Commerce, expressed concern that another large march could result in serious physical injury.

British actors make K-State first stop

Performances and lectures to highlight Shakespearean tour

By The Collegian Staff

Direct from the London stage, a touring ensemble of five British actors will bring the works of Shakespeare and other playwrights and poets to K-State next week.

The lectures and performances are sponsored by K-State's departments of speech and English, and is being funded by several groups, including the KSU Foundation, the College of Arts and Sciences, the College of Education, the Kansas Arts Commission and the Kansas Committee for the Humanities, said Rhonda Miracle, professor of speech and publicity coordinator for the speech department.

Miracle said the actors, Trevor Baxter, Bruce Alexander, Sarah Berger, Tom Mannion and George Raistrick, have appeared in the Royal Shakespeare Company, the National Theatre of Great Britain and the British Broadcasting Corporation's Shakespeare Series. She added that one of the actors in the troupe appeared in the film, "Return of the Jedi."

On previous tours by the Five Actors From The London Stage, such programs as "The Dream Of Peter Brook," "Who's Afraid Of The Sonnets," and "Chivalry, Treachery and Love" have been performed.

K-State will be the first stop on this particular tour, Miracle said, with later performances at universities in Texas, Pennsylvania and Georgia.

The performers will arrive Friday and leave Feb. 1 and will use their early time to adjust to the facilities and recover from jet lag.

"The group will be doing some rehearsing over the weekend in Nichols (Theater) and McCain (Auditorium) in preparation for the performances," Miracle said. "This will help them become accustomed to the theaters they will be performing in.

"As far as we know, this is the first school in Kansas the group has visited."

She said Lewis Shelton, associate professor of speech, and Don Hedrick, associate professor of English were the major forces behind asking the group to visit K-State. They began to put the project together about a year and a half ago.

While at K-State, the ensemble will present two performances of Shakepeare's "The Tempest" at 8 p.m. Jan. 30 and 31 in McCain Auditorium, Miracle said. "The Tempest" is a story of a shipwrecked group that experiences a fantasy of magic and love. In this production, each of the actors will play several starring and supporting roles.

Hedrick said the work will be presented in a minimalist fashion using few props and relying mainly on the acting ability of the cast.

In addition, the actors will present "Pinter This Evening" at 8 p.m. Jan. 29 in Nichols Theater. Miracle said this program will feature dramatic readings from several of Harold Pinter's plays as well as remarks from scholars and critics.

The two plays are from two distinctly different time periods. Shakespeare wrote during the 17th century and Pinter during the 20th.

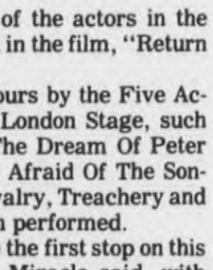
Admission charge for "The Tempest" will be $4 for senior citizens and students and $8 for the general audience. An admission of $3 for senior citizens and students and $5 for the general audience will be charged for "Pinter This Evening." The remaining events during the week are free to the public.

Other events include lectures in the Introduction to Shakespeare class which meets at 9:30 a.m. on Tuesdays and Thursdays in Eisenhower 226 and in the Philosophy in Literature class which meets Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays at 1:30 p.m. in Eisenhower 212.

On Jan. 27, there will be a demonstration of music and dance in Elizabethan theater at 11:30 a.m. in McCain 204. Also at 11:30 a.m., there will be a discussion of Pinter's "The Dumbwaiter" in Denison 220. At 1:05 p.m., there will be a lecture on comic acting in "The Tempest" in Eisenhower 15.

"English Verse, American Verse," a reading from the poetry of John Milton and poems of students in the Advanced Poetry Workshop will be at 7 p.m. Jan. 27 in Nichols Theater with Sarah Berger and Bruce Alexander.

At 9:30 a.m. Jan. 28, there will be a lecture on Shakespeare's characters in "The Tempest" in Eisenhower 226. At 1:30 p.m., acting styles will be presented in the Purple Masque theater, East Stadium 103.



Trevor Baxter will also give a performance on Jan. 28 in a one-man production, "The Sea and the Mirror." He will perform at 8 p.m. in the Wareham Theater.

"Jack and the Priest," the love and religious poetry of John Donne, read by Bruce Alexander will be at 10:30 a.m. Jan. 29 in Nichols Theater. A lecture on directing Shakespeare will be at 11:30 Jan. 29 in the Purple Masque theater.

Miracle said the group will also visit Manhattan High School.

'Cats advance in latest men's basketball poll

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State's men's basketball team, after struggling to a 68-65 win against Iowa State Saturday and with a 79-67 victory Dec. 12 against Wichita State, earned a season-high 21 points and was ranked 24th in the Associated Press college basketball poll released today.

K-State, which received less points in the others receiving votes category than Florida, Kansas and New Orleans, only received two votes in last week's poll.

"Last week was a good one for us with the wins against Wichita State and Iowa State," Coach Lon Kruger said. "Even though we struggled against the Cyclones, I hope we can rebound and continue moving in the right direction."

Kruger said the increase in votes won't make a difference to the 'Cats when they face Colorado and nationally ranked Oklahoma this week.

"We still have to line up and play them, and until we begin to play better, we still don't belong in the Top 20," he said.

The Wildcats, 12-3 overall and 2-0 in Big Eight Conference action, play Wednesday at Colorado. Oklahoma, K-State's opponent Saturday, improved from 16th to 11th in the poll.

The last time K-State received a top-20 ranking was in United Press International's 1981-82 final poll, after a season in which the 'Cats finished 23-8.

Kansas, 10-5, fell from the Top 20 after losing to Oklahoma 76-74. The Jayhawks rebounded with an 82-47 pasting of Miami, Fla. on Saturday.

Iowa replaced Nevada-Las Vegas, one-point losers at Oklahoma this weekend, as the No. 1 team, ending the Runnin' Rebels' six-week run as the top-ranked team.

The Hawkeyes, 16-0, took the No. 1 ranking for the first time in its history as the Hawkeyes received 34 first-place votes and 1,263 points from the nationwide panel of sportswriters and broadcasters.

Iowa edged North Carolina for the No. 1 spot as the Tar Heels, 15-1, received 28 first-place votes and 1,252 points. Indiana, 14-1, was third with 1,133 points, while Nevada-Las Vegas, which got three first-place votes, had 1,088 points.

Iowa's only game last week was its impressive 91-88 overtime victory at then-No. 8 Illinois in which the Hawkeyes erased a 22-point second-half deficit.

The Runnin' Rebels' first loss of the year came at Norman, Okla. as the Sooners prevailed 89-88 in the nationally televised game. Nevada-Las Vegas had a chance at pulling out the road victory but two shots in the final seconds wouldn't fall and Oklahoma avenged an early-season loss in Las Vegas.

Purdue, 14-1, was fifth giving the Big Ten Conference three of the top five teams. Iowa and Indiana are also members of the Big Ten, which also had No. 9 Illinois, 13-3, in the Top 10.

DePaul, 14-0, was sixth with 974 points, 200 more than Syracuse, which lost for the first time this weekend, a three-point defeat at Michigan. Temple, 16-2, was eighth with 696 points, 16 more than Illinois.

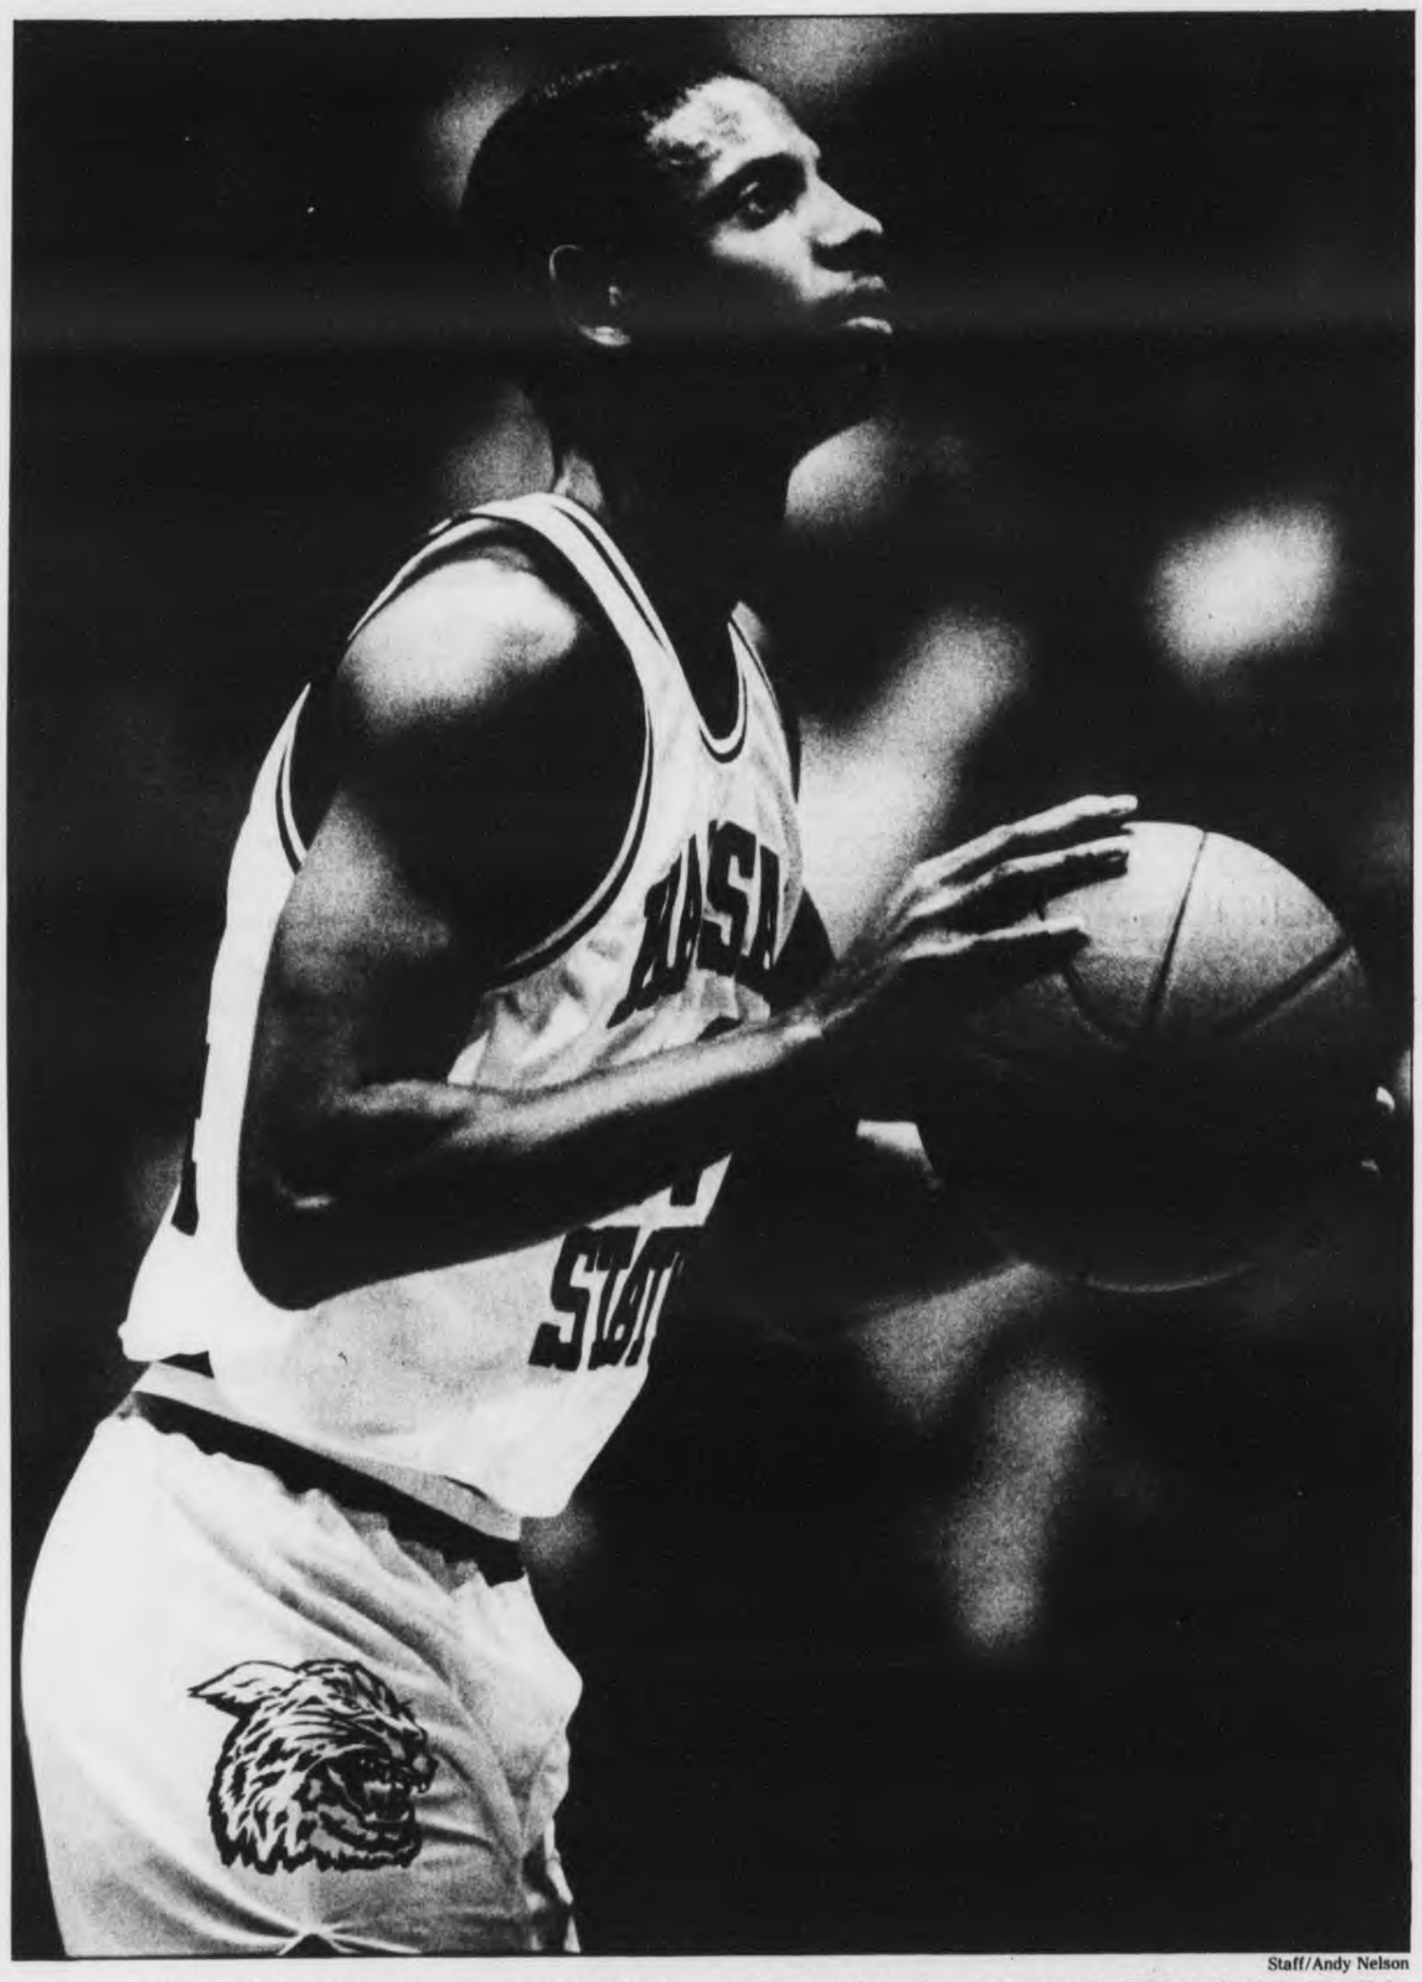
Clemson, 16-0, the third undefeated major-college team, rounded out the Top 10 with 670 points.

Oklahoma, 12-3, led the Second 10 with 655 points followed by Duke, Alabama, St. John's, Georgetown, Pittsburgh, Auburn, Navy, Texas Christian and North Carolina State.

Last week's Second 10 was Temple, Clemson, St. John's, Duke, Alabama, Oklahoma, North Carolina State, Pittsburgh, Navy and Kansas.

Georgetown, 12-2, fell from ninth to 15th after losing — for the second time this season — to fellow Big East member Seton Hall. The Hoyas, who lost by 21 at home earlier in the season, lost 66-65 to the Pirates last Saturday at The Meadowlands.

Auburn dropped from 10th to 17th after losing to Vanderbilt 91-75. Vanderbilt handed Indiana its only loss of the season.



Texas Christian makes its first appearance ever in the AP's poll. The Horned Frogs, 13-3, lead the Southwest Conference with a 4-0 record after victories last week over Texas A&M, 55-54, and Southern Methodist, 57-53.

Men's Top 20

These are the Top Twenty teams through Jan. 18 in The Associated Press' college basketball poll. First-place votes are in parentheses, followed by season records, points and last week's ranking. Big Eight Conference schools are in bold face.

1. Iowa (34)	16-0	1263	2
2. North Carolina (28)	15-1	1252	3
3. Indiana	14-1	1133	4
4. UNLV (3)	15-1	1088	1
5. Purdue	14-1	1063	6
6. DePaul	14-0	974	7
7. Syracuse	15-1	774	5
8. Temple	16-2	696	11
9. Illinois	13-3	680	8

K-State guard Will Scott has distinguished himself as one of the top three-point shooters in the country with a 59.2 percent average, second best in the nation. As a team, the Wildcats lead the Big Eight from the line 19 feet, 9-inches from the hoop at 43.1 percent.

K-State, Scott benefit from three-point goal

By BILL LANG
Collegian Reporter

Without a doubt, K-State has been one of the biggest beneficiaries of the three-point field goal adopted by the NCAA Basketball Rules Committee this season.

K-State, after Saturday's 68-65 win against Iowa State in Ahearn Field House, has the best percentage (43.1 percent) in the Big Eight Conference after converting 81 of 188 attempts from the stripe that lies 19 feet 9 inches from the basket.

The 'Cats also feature one of the nation's best "long bombers" in William Scott, a 6-foot-2 junior guard from Kansas City, Mo. Scott — in addition to leading the Big Eight — ranks as the second-best three-point percentage shooter in the country, according to the latest NCAA statistics. He has made 42 of 71 attempts for 59.2 percent.

Coach Lon Kruger expressed his satisfaction with the team's success with the three-point shot at the midway point of the season.

"They all have the green light whenever they find themselves open," Kruger said. "All of them shoot the ball real well and it justs adds an extra dimension to our game."

That extra dimension was noticed by Iowa State forward Tom Schafer.

"They play well together," Schafer said. "Their strength is inside with (Norris) Coleman, but now he has someone to kick it back out to."

Kruger, to no one's surprise, is pleased with the new rule.

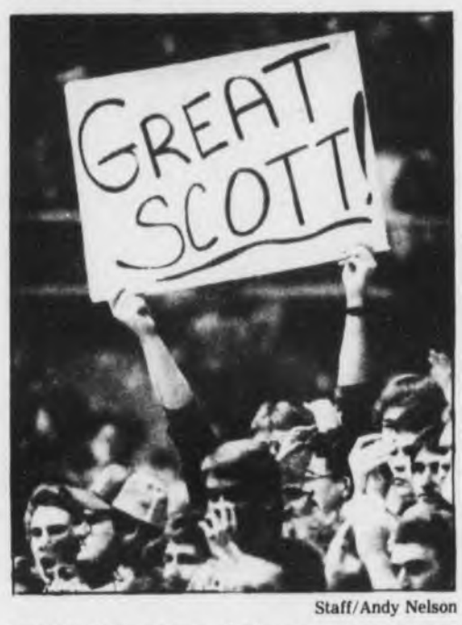
"I think it does what the rules committee intended it to do," Kruger said. "It makes people spread out defensively and creates less traffic inside. The game is difficult to officiate when people pack it down inside. I think it helps for a more consistently called game."

Leading the 'Cats in the modern three-point play is Scott, followed by junior college transfer Mitch Richmond at 38 percent (20-52), freshman Steve Henson at 34 percent (13-38) and sophomore Mark Dobbins at 26 percent (6-23).

Kruger said he was especially pleased with Scott's eye for the rim from that range.

"We knew when we recruited him that he was already a great shooter and this just shows that he is."

For Scott, though, he sees some of his success as being part luck and patience.



"Sometimes, when I put up a shot I don't think it will go through, then it goes through," he said. "It's tough getting open for the (three-point) shot, though. We just have to work it around and hope somebody gets open."

On Richmond, Kruger said the three-point shot was an "extra plus" to an already strong game.

"Mitch was shooting real well before he fractured his wrist last December," Kruger said. "But I think after removing the cast, he's starting to get the same touch back."

About Henson, Kruger said, "Steve is surprising a lot of people with his ability. The range on his shots is the biggest surprise. He'll get better with every game that he plays."

Dobbins has accomplished his three-point feats coming off the bench.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Scott's long-range shots garner approval from Ahearn Field House crowds.

"Mark's role is to basically come off the bench and provide the support that the team needs," Kruger said. "He may not get as many shots as the others but they're just as important as all the others."

Kruger was quick to point out that although the three-point play is an added assett, other parts of the game are necessary to provide wins.

Excluding Billy Tubbs of Oklahoma and Leonard Hamilton who each cast a "no vote" on the three-point issue, conference coaches remain divided on the subject. Larry Brown (Kansas), Johnny Orr (Iowa State) and Tom Miller (Colorado) vote nay. In favor of the ruling are Kruger, Norm Stewart (Missouri) and Danny Nee (Nebraska).

Voting represents the way a respective coach's team utilizes the three-point goal.

— KU (26-63), Iowa State (31-76) and Colorado (12-44) use it sparingly. All three teams have surrendered more three pointers than they've made.

— Missouri (36-94), Nebraska (48-150) and Oklahoma State (53-127) are in the middle of the pack and only the Cowboys have outscored the opposition in this category.

— The cream of the crop are K-State and Oklahoma. As mentioned earlier, K-State tops the conference in percentage of three-point shots made but the Sooners have converted more attempts (88 of 216).

Hoopla building as Denver, Giants prepare for Super Bowl

Opposing coaches might have traded places

By The Associated Press

PASADENA, Calif. — A year ago, Bill Parcells was watching a linebacker named Pepper Johnson work out at the NFL's evaluation camp for college seniors when he turned around and saw Dan Reeves standing behind him.

"You've got a pretty good eye for talent. I just want to watch who you're watching," Reeves told him.

The coaches in next Sunday's Super Bowl aren't exactly strangers to each other. In fact, were it not for a kind of toss-of-the-coin twist of fate, Reeves might be coaching the New York Giants in next Sunday's Super Bowl and Parcells might be coaching linebackers at New England?

Parcells' Giants, who arrived Sunday, began their workouts for the NFL championship game at the Los Angeles Rams' training complex in Fullerton on Monday.

Reeves' Broncos arrived later in the afternoon from Denver, after a celebration and pep rally at Mile High Stadium on Sunday.

But Reeves could also have arrived from New York.

It goes back to 1979, when the Giants were undergoing a complete housecleaning and George Young had just taken over as general manager. He narrowed down the search for a coach to two young offensive coordinators — Ray Perkins of San Diego and Dan Reeves of Dallas.

Young chose Perkins and Reeves, who had undergone nearly eight hours of interviews in New York went back to Dallas, worried that he might never get the call. "Don't worry, you will," Young told him and he did — two years later, when he replaced Red Miller as the Broncos coach.

Parcells, meanwhile, was the linebackers coach with the New England Patriots and joined the Giants as defensive coordinator in 1981. When Perkins quit at the end of the 1982 season to take the head coaching job at Alabama, Parcells was promoted to head coach.

Meanwhile, Parcells and Reeves have become friends who chat on the phone about once a week. Last spring, they agreed to have their assistant coaches meet in Denver to discuss and share scouting reports common opponents from the AFC West and NFC East, a practice that some of those opponents thought was a bit too chummy.

"It was just an exchange of information to facilitate both of our schedules," Parcells says.

'Junk' collector thrives on bowl's momentos

By The Associated Press

PASADENA, Calif. — To John Negley, the Super Bowl is America's best annual opportunity for him to indulge his passion.

"Basically," he says, "I collect junk."

Negley, from Graham, Wash., just outside Seattle, was among the first out-of-towners to arrive here for the Super Bowl. That event — have you heard? — takes place Sunday.

Negley, however, headed straight for nearby Anaheim.

"This is where to be," he was saying, his eyes darting about the lobby of the hotel where the National Football League has made its headquarters. "It's exciting. Impressive. May I look at your media pin? May I hold it?"

Media pins rank as top priority among the sort of things that John Negley collects, although nothing bearing the imprint "Super Bowl" is trivial to him — ticket stubs, programs, rosters, road maps, all the paraphernalia the NFL heaps upon the 2,500 people who wear the media pins.

"I plan to go to both the hotels where the teams are staying," said Negley. "Just look around. I'll try to get to some of the practices. Take in the scene. To me it's better than Disneyland."

An apt comparison. At the Marriott Hotel in Anaheim the atmosphere is one of unreality, of make-believe.

The NFL has taken over a carpeted room of about half an acre with tables strung around bearing the sort of things that John Negley collects along with news releases of great urgency.

"It's a week that isn't duplicated by any other event in the year," John Negley said. "I will make any sacrifice to be a part of it."

Negley is 33 but does not seem to have lost any of his boyhood innocence and fascination.

"I saved pretty marbles. Rocks. If I saw a pretty rock on my way to school I would put it in my pocket and save it in my room. Every time I looked at it I would remember where I got it and have a pleasant memory.

"That's what the Super Bowl memorabilia has become — the refinement of all my days of junk collecting.

"I went to my first Super Bowl game in 1972 when I lived near here and the Dolphins played the Redskins at the Los Angeles Coliseum. I bought my ticket on the sidewalk for $15. When I saw the ticket I said, wow, what a pretty ticket."

Soviets exceed SALT II agreement, launch missile-carrying submarines

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union has launched two new missile-carrying submarines, setting the stage for the Kremlin to exceed one of the limits contained in the SALT II arms accord, administration sources said Monday.

The sources, who agreed to discuss the matter only if not identified, said shipyard activity at the northern Soviet port of Severodvinsk indicated the two submarines had been launched in December.

One of the new subs is a Typhoon-class submarine — the largest such vessel in the world — and the other is a Delta IV-class submarine, the sources said. The Typhoon normally carries 20 multiple-warhead nuclear missiles, the Delta IV 16.

The new launches would bring to five the number of Typhoons completed by the Soviets and the number of Delta IVs to four.

The launching of the two submarines, assuming normal schedules are met, would mean that sea trials for the two vessels could start this spring or summer, one source said. Once sea trials begin, the submarines and their missiles would be counted as additions to the Soviet arsenal.

The addition of 36 new multiple-warhead missiles, in turn, would push the Soviet arsenal beyond one of the so-called "sub-limits" contained in the SALT II accord, absent the retirement of older weapons.

In another naval development, albeit one that has no bearing on arms control issues, the Soviets are also preparing to launch their fourth Kiev-class carrier "very soon," one source said Monday.

The Kiev-class carriers are much smaller than American aircraft carriers, capable of carrying only helicopters and vertical-takeoff jets. But they are the largest ships currently deployed by the Soviet navy.

The SALT II agreement was negotiated in 1979 by former President Carter but never ratified by the Senate. Until last year, however, both the United States and Soviet Union had pledged to abide by its terms.

Last spring, Reagan declared the United States would no longer be bound by the unratified accord given continuing Soviet violations. And on Nov. 28, the United States formally abrogated the pact by deploying a 131st B-52 bomber.

Night of old ballroom favorites to put dancers' feet into motion

By The Collegian Staff

A gala event is in the works as the K-State Orchestra tunes up for its second annual evening of ballroom dancing Friday, Jan. 23, in the K-State Union ballroom.

With a larger dance floor at this year's gala, there will be non-stop waltzes, polkas and various other tunes to keep guests moving on their feet, said Adrian Bryttan, professor of music and director of the Kansas State Orchestra.

"We've moved the orchestra up on stage to make the dancing area larger for more of a ballroom dance rather than a concert," Bryttan said.

Last year's event brought together nearly 800 people on a crowded floor of swirling gowns and formal suits. This year the dance will be run the same with refreshments and music for dancing at orchestra intermissions.

Bryttan said the orchestra will play the standard Strauss waltzes along with polkas, marches and old favorites including "Strangers in the Night" and "Stardust." Popular tunes by Barry Manilow and The Beatles will also be on the program.

Tickets are available in two areas: the promenade tables at $10 per person, and orchestra seating at $7 per person. For reservations call 776-5142.

Wefald's recruitment initiative aids enrollment, Bosco says

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

The fall semester revealed a change in recruitment programming — a change that some believe has helped draw students to K-State, said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president of institutional advancement.

Bosco said the new recruitment program, instituted by University President Jon Wefald, "hit the ground running."

"Market research has shown that K-State is well-known for its agriculture programs and some of its engineering programs, but particularly in metro areas, our human ecology, business administration and fine arts programs have not been communicated," he said.

"That's the state of the problem. We simply haven't communicated the scope and breadth of our programs."

Bosco said Wefald was instrumental in initiating the recruitment program.

"It was President Wefald's vision that in order to more effectively communicate the success of K-State programs, a coordinated Universitywide approach was necessary," Bosco said.

"With Wefald's initiative, we're a different organization," he said.

University budget cuts have affected the preadmissions program, Bosco said.

"We have less money for travel, and we have canceled several publications.

"We have nothing to service high school counselors. We have material (ready to be printed) — it's just sitting there, waiting (to be funded)," Bosco said.

"I wish our resources would allow us additional clerical support and help the deans' offices with recruitment, too," he said.

The new program includes funding for nine admissions representatives who visit high schools throughout Kansas and the Kansas City area.

Seven of the representatives are stationed in Manhattan, while two others are working out of their homes in Johnson County and Scott City, Bosco said. Each representative has been appointed to a specific region in Kansas.

"We've approximated (the admissions representatives) will spend one-third of their time visiting high schools, developing alumni programs and special activities in their regions," Bosco said.

Admissions representative Tim Balfour, a 1986 K-State graduate, said the program has worked well because all the representatives actually attended K-State.

"Since all of us have recently been K-State students, that gives us a little edge," Balfour said.

"(Prospective) students like it when you can say, 'Well, when I lived in the residence hall...'

"Other schools (colleges and universities) kind of lose the closeness that we have with the University," Balfour said.

Over the course of the semester, the admissions representatives visited high schools and college/career planning conferences and met with K-State alumni about admissions projects like the All-University Open House.

"From September to November, we spent a lot of time in gymnasiums," Balfour said. "Generally, we talk to small groups of kids — from one student to 200."

In addition to enjoying the "people-contact," Balfour said he liked the service aspect of his job.

"I guess I just enjoy trying to help people," he said. "When you use the word 'recruiter,' it seems you're trying to go out and 'grab' people.

"You know you're doing a good thing for the University. A small thing sometimes makes a big difference."

Balfour said the admissions representatives are able to talk to University officials about policy matters.

"We are in a position to say, 'Look. This is a problem we're encountering,' and offer suggestions," he said.

Although the initial focus is on the high school student and the community college transfer student, programs are also being developed for the non-traditional learner and minority and graduate students, Bosco said.

"This enrollment management program is complementing what the admissions office is doing," Bosco said.

Because the program is different from recruitment programs in previous years, it is difficult to measure its effects, he said.

"It is impossible to compare where we are this year and last year, because we don't have the vehicles available to measure (what we're doing)," Bosco said. "We didn't have computer capability or the staff to keep up with the computers before this year."

Nancy Hause, coordinator in campus visitation, said she thinks there has been an increase in potential students visiting campus.

"That's a real touchy area, because they didn't keep the same type of records before," Hause said. "It's like comparing apples and oranges. But, overall, I'd say there's been an increase."

Hause said in October about 755 potential students participated in guided tours through the campus tours program. In November, the figure was more than 600 students.

"That's just through our office," Hause said. "I know even more people actually toured campus."

Bosco said more than 28,000 potential students have expressed interest in K-State. These numbers were compiled by on-campus visitations, information requests and other special activities, Bosco said.

"But the only real way to compare will be in the end result," Bosco said.

Balfour said part of the difference is made through establishing contact on a one-to-one basis with each student.

"When you know that you've set a bonding with that student — you can't be sure of it — but it seems you have made a difference," he said.

The preadmissions program has a budget of about $240,000, Bosco said. That includes admissions representatives' salaries, two classified staff members' salaries and travel, publications and programming expenses.

"In the past, some community colleges' admissions offices in Kansas have had larger budgets than we have had," he said. "It's no wonder we weren't communicating.

"I'm convinced," Bosco said, "that without the new initiative, K-State enrollment would have continued to decline."

Unofficial enrollment figures from this semester indicate University enrollment has stabilized since the 1986 spring semester.

Summing up the preadmissions program, Becky Klingler, another admissions representative, explained her role.

"The whole goal is (for the potential student) to see a familiar face — first at the high school, then on campus, then at registration," Klingler said.

"I think the big reward will come next August when we see how many of our kids are actually here."

Storm continues trek throughout Midwest

By The Associated Press

A snowstorm blamed for at least 30 deaths plowed across the Midwest on Monday with more snow and ice, shutting down several Indiana counties after stranding hundreds of travelers and closing schools across the Plains states.

Winter storm warnings were up for parts of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, New York state and Pennsylvania, and a winter storm watch was extended for all of Massachusetts.

Heavy rain along the storm's southern edge caused flooding and washed out tracks that derailed 35 cars of a freight train in Alabama.

In the storm's wake, Oklahoma dug out after one of its worst snowstorms in decades, and New Mexico's National Guard continued hauling supplies to rural residents snowbound by up to 50 inches of snow and 7-foot drifts.

Slippery roads and blowing and drifting snow in Indiana led officials in six counties to close roads to all but emergency vehicles Monday. Chalmers had 10 inches of snow by midday.

Travelers had to wait out the storm at truck stops, churches and restaurants in Oklahoma and northwestern Texas.

"But these Yankees aren't too pleased with Oklahoma's snow removal," said Linda Kelly, owner of a restaurant and motel at El Reno. "I keep telling them this is the worst we've had since the 1970s and it doesn't justify the expense of buying those snow plows when we don't get snow like this."

The Highway Patrol said Interstate 40 west of Oklahoma City remained very hazardous Monday, and Ms. Kelly said only one lane was open in each direction.

About 200 schools and colleges were closed in Oklahoma, and schools also were closed in parts of Texas, Missouri and Indiana. Indiana State University at Terre Haute shut down. Some schools remained closed in New Mexico, where four counties were declared disaster areas after up to 50 inches of snow.

Cars and trucks were forced to stop along Interstate 70 in Missouri during the night because of reduced visibility in blowing snow, the National Weather Service said.

Rain, freezing rain and snow caused a rash of accidents in Ohio, and at least two highways were closed by overturned or jackknifed tractor-trailer rigs.

The storm cut off electricity to an estimated 11,000 customers Sunday in the Tulsa area and 17 crews from Kansas, Missouri and Louisiana helped Public Service Co. of Oklahoma restore power, said PSO spokesman Jim Goss.

Heavy snow collapsed roofs of some homes and businesses in Oklahoma City, where Sunday's 8.3 inches in 24 hours was the third heaviest on record. The National Guard helped take generators, heaters and blankets to a state prison and several nursing homes.

Robert Stethem to death and held 39 American passengers hostage for 17 days.

Gunmen seized Cordes, a 53-year-old Beirut manager of West Germany's Hoechst chemical company, after he arrived in the Lebanese capital Saturday from Frankfurt.

Friedhelm Ost, chief government spokesman, said the kidnappers had not identified themselves or made demands. He urged the media not to speculate about a possible link between the kidnapping and Hamadi's arrest.

Justice Ministry spokesman Juergen Schmid said the West German government awaited U.S. documents pledging that the defendant would not face a death sentence.

Such a promise is necessary in extradition cases under terms of a 1978 U.S.-West German treaty.

U.S. officials said Sunday they would provide the promise and speed up the paper work.

Schmid said the U.S. documents would be sent to a Frankfurt court for a ruling on whether the terms of the 1978 extradition treaty had been fulfilled.

"First we have to get the documents, then we have to wait for the court's decision," he told reporters. "Only then can we legally extradit him.

"When we do get the documents, then it can go very fast. It is in our interest to do it as fast as possible. We are under obligation to fulfill the terms of the treaty between the U.S. and the West German government as quickly as possible."

The day before Hamadi's arrest in Frankfurt, Italian authorities picked up Bashir al-Khodr, also Lebanese, at the Milan airport.

Computer

As for the common complaint by students that computer programming is less glamorous than they had expected, Wallentine said "media hype" was to blame.

"I wouldn't call programming glamorous anyway," he said.

Though he has not received the spring enrollment figures, Wallentine said the fall 1986 enrollment figures were about the same as those for the previous fall.

Wallentine said he is "not at all" concerned about the decline in enrollment in the department.

"From my perspective, fewer students with better quality is far to our advantage," he said.

If the department had a larger faculty, Wallentine said he would be concerned.

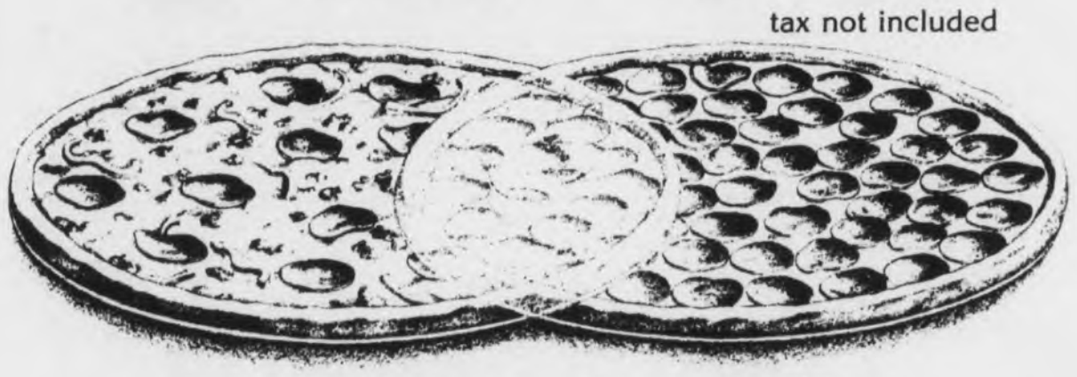
ment to determine if private firms can do a more efficient job of running military commissaries.



The other "is a plan to collect, on a test basis, nominal fees for outpatient medical care provided to non-active-duty patients to determine whether such fees can reduce costs and improve the quality of care in military medical facilities," the budget states.

Student Body President Steven Johnson believes that keeping in touch with constituents' concerns and being able to deal with unforeseen problems are necessary in his position. Johnson will leave office on Feb. 26. Future plans include increased studying and applying for internships.

Presidency broadens Johnson's views

By JODI SWENGEL
Collegian Reporter

Although the job of student body president has been both challenging and time consuming, it has been a positive experience, said Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics.

Johnson's term ends Feb. 26, when his successor will take office.

Johnson said some challenges faced by a student body president are "keeping informed with everything that is going on, remaining calm and finding logical reasons for whatever is up."

Representing the students as well as the University, acting as a mediator, attending a variety of meetings and being a part of the decision-making process are other important responsibilities inherent in the position, he said.

Johnson said some of his most memorable experiences have been meeting and working with new people. He said he has learned a great deal by interacting with students, especially the international students.

"The student body has been great and fun to work with," Johnson said, adding that he has enjoyed working with the University as a whole.

By working with different groups, Johnson said his views have become more broad since becoming president.

Moreover, Johnson said he has learned much more about the University, Manhattan and the state.

"I became more familiar with general University issues because you work with them so much more," Johnson said. "You understand the administration and the process there."

By visiting different organizations, he said he has tried to fulfill his main campaign goal of informing students about the issues.

In addition to trying to be accessible to all students, Johnson said he has always been willing to work on any problem that students might have.

Future projects of Johnson's include an amendment to the Student Governing Association Constitution. The amendment, scheduled to be heard at Student Senate Thursday, would limit a student body president to serving two consecutive terms.

Currently, the constitution prohibits a person from being student body president more than once.

Johnson said the amendment to allow a person to run again would provide students with an experienced president who would work more effectively in his second term.

Even if the bill passes, Johnson said he doesn't have the time to be dedicated throughout another term. But he said he believes the bill is a good idea for those who would want to run for a second term.

Staff/Robert Squires

Johnson speaks with Jon Levin, president of Varney's Bookstore, at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce meeting Tuesday afternoon.

As for hints to presidential candidates, he said they should be organized and maintain the support of their constituents after being elected.

Maintaining the kind of contact he wanted to with his campaign supporters has been difficult, Johnson said. After being elected, he said a person loses contact with them but gains the student body president's cabinet as a second group of supporters.

In addition, Johnson said he would like to see the next president continue establishing one-on-one communication between himself and the students.

But "the main thing is being able to deal with unforeseen issues that come up," Johnson said.

To help the next student body president make a smooth transition into office, Johnson said he has kept a file on items with which he had problems.

"I don't want to be a nuisance or a pain, but I want to be available for help," Johnson said.

Johnson said he didn't foresee himself being as involved in student government after he leaves office.

Reagan details Iran arms sale

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan was described Tuesday as helping to stitch together places and dates spelling out the Iran-Contra connection as his point-man on the furor declared "there is absolutely no stonewalling."

White House deputy press secretary Albert R. Brashear said Reagan has met twice with Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan for lengthy discussions touching on the president's recollection of events chronicling the clandestine sales of U.S. arms to Iran.

At the same time, retiring NATO ambassador David Abshire, brought to the White House from Brussels to help coordinate responses to an array of investigations, pledged that Reagan will meet "in the very near future" with a commission investigating National Security Council operations.

A spokesman for the Tower Commission said late Tuesday that Reagan has a date to meet with the panel, which he named to investigate the workings of the National Security Council and its role in the Iran-Contra crisis.

Spokesman Herbert E. Hetu said the White House proposed a date for such a meeting on Tuesday and the three-member panel accepted. Neither Hetu nor White House spokesman Brashear would disclose the date.

Hetu said the three-member panel also decided to ask for an extension on their Jan. 29 deadline for completing its investigation and reporting to the president.

Brashear said Reagan held "at least one lengthy meeting" since the first of the year attended by both Regan and White House counsel Peter Wallison. The spokesman described the session with the president as "a serious discussion of all the issues."

Regan also met with the president on the same topic "at some length" at the end of November, Brashear said.

Reagan, who returned Monday from a three-day holiday weekend at Camp David, Md., has not answered questions from reporters about the matter since a presidential news conference on Nov. 19.

White House officials say they do not know when the president will again meet in formal session with reporters. The White House has contended that Reagan, recuperating from prostate surgery, should not be asked to recall the events until he has a full chronology to work from. Before that can be done, they have said, the White House staff must compile such a chronology.

Brashear described Reagan's Jan. 5 operation as a "major surgical procedure" and said his recuperation impeded the president's ability "to come down here, or in any other

Planes collide in flight over Missouri arsenal

By The Associated Press

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — A military plane and civilian plane collided in clear skies 7,000 feet above the Lake City Army Ammunition Plant Tuesday, killing all five people aboard the two aircraft, the Army said.

The main part of the military plane — a twin-engine U-21 fixed-wing aircraft — crashed and burned within 20 feet of a building where workers change clothes, but there was no one inside at the time.

Army Lt. Col. John Garlinger said there were three people on the military plane and two on the civilian craft, a twin-engine Piper Navajo, when the planes collided above the 3,900-acre ammunition plant 20 miles east of Kansas City, Mo.

In a statement released Tuesday night, the Army in Washington identified one of the victims as Brig. Gen. David H. Stem, commandant of the military police school and deputy commandant general of Fort McClellan, Ala.

Also believed killed was the pilot, Maj. Michael G. Johnston, 36, of Alexandria, Ala., according to a statement by Army spokesman Maj. Bill Auer. The name of the civilian co-pilot was expected to be released Wednesday.

The names of the two victims in the civilian aircraft were not released pending positive identification.

Garlinger, public affairs officer at Fort Leavenworth, said there were about 2,200 civilian workers on duty at the ammunition plant when the collision occurred, but no one on the ground was injured.

The civilian plane landed about 1,000 yards away from the main wreckage of the military plane, which was scattered over an area of about one mile.

The craft was en route from Fort McKellan to Fort Leavenworth, Auer said. It was not known where the flight of the civilian plane originated, but Robert Houtz of the Federal Aviation Administration said air space above the plant is not restricted.

Garlinger said the military plane was en route to the fort at the time of the collision, but he would not say where the flight originated.

The victims were not identified, and Garlinger refused to say

Tour gives Slattery, K-Staters insights of Central America

Congressman says Contras pose no threat to Sandinistas

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., came home from his 10-day trip to Central America convinced of three things.

The revolutionary Contras are not a threat to the Sandinistan government, the United States needs to supply economic aid to Nicaragua and negotiations must be made to end fighting in the war-torn country.

"I came home convinced that the Contras are not today, nor will they be in the foreseeable future, a significant threat to the Nicaraguan government," Slattery said at a press conference Tuesday in Topeka.

The best investment the United States could make in the Nicaraguan crisis is to channel funds to aid the economy, he said.

"If we could spend just 1 percent of our annual defense budget on economic assistance to respond to the needs of the people who live in the countries of Central America, that would be the best investment from a national security standpoint," Slattery said.

Supplying monetary support to the Contras only makes sense in the context that it is a leverage to pressure the Nicaraguan government to negotiate, Slattery said.

But the United States has not yet used that leverage, he said.

"I have to tell you I've come home not convinced that our government has made the kind of diplomatic effort it should have made and must be made in the next few months to resolve this conflict in a diplomatic arrangement," he said.

The Central American countries are important to the future of the United States, Slattery said.

"It is important to our national security, and we shouldn't walk away from that," he said.

To stabilize the unsettled region, Slattery said the United States must first address the social and economic problems in Nicaragua.

"If we're going to be concerned, as we should be, about the future of that part of the world, we need to be responding to the people's problems there, and we haven't done that," he said.

Seven of the 17 Kansans who accompanied Slattery on the trip told of their impressions about the problems in Nicaragua.

Student, faculty member say trip reveals complex issues

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Staff Writer

Both a K-State faculty member and a student who have recently returned from Central America said their trip revealed that the issues surrounding American policy toward that country are not as black-and-white as some people like to claim.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy, and Denise Grimm, senior in economics, accompanied Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., to Central America. Eighteen Kansans spent 10 days in Honduras and Nicaragua visiting with leaders of both the Sandinista government and the Contradora camps.

Both Exdell and Grimm were impressed by the people, but for different reasons.

"The Sandinista leaders appeared confident and determined. The people are gaining confidence in them because they aren't giving in to pressure," Exdell said.

Grimm was impressed with the Nicaraguan's attitudes toward Americans.

"We didn't run into any anti-American feelings. The people realize that national policy is not what all Americans believe. They see many Americans coming down to find out for themselves what is going on," Grimm said.

Both Exdell and Grimm said they realize the Sandinistas aren't perfect, but they do not believe the Sandinistas are as bad as they are made out to be.

"There are many things the Sandinistas are doing which I dislike. They are bullying their legitimate opposition in ways I regret. Also, they have pressured La Prensa, an opposition newspaper. I hope this will change once they become more stable," Exdell said.

"The Sandinistas are not perfect," Grimm said. "But that doesn't justify the United States calling it a totalitarian government. We should let them operate, and help them to move in a positive direction."

Exdell said the trip made the reality of the trouble in Nicaragua more vivid.

"We think a lot about theories, but the trip gave me the opportunity to see how these principles are played out. What is going on down there is concrete," he said.

Officials link kidnapping to arrest

BONN, West Germany — Officials said the kidnapping of a West German businessman in Beirut is linked to the arrest in Frankfurt of a Lebanese man, whose extradition to America on hijacking and murder charges was formally requested Tuesday.

The officials refused to say if the link could delay extradition to the United States.

Businessman Rudolf Cordes, 53, was abducted Saturday, four days after Mohammed Ali Hamadi's arrest.

Chief government spokesman Friedhelm Ost said West Germany received the official U.S. request for extradition on Tuesday, and State Department spokesman Charles Redman confirmed this in Washington.

Hamadi, 22, is wanted on U.S. charges of air piracy, murder and more than a dozen other crimes in connection with a June 1985 hijacking. A U.S. Navy diver was shot to death after the TWA jet was commandeered between Athens and Rome and forced to land in Beirut.

The U.S. extradition request included a pledge Hamadi would not face the death penalty in an American courtroom, a key legal prerequisite to his extradition, officials said.

"In the interest of the kidnap victim, we have been asked not to speculate on this," Justice Ministry spokesman Hennig Gehr told The Associated Press when asked if the Cordes kidnapping could hold up Hamadi's extradition.

West German security sources, speaking Tuesday on condition of anonymity, said Cordes is believed to be in the hands of Hezbollah, a radical Shiite Moslem group whose name means the Party of God.

Waite remains to talk with captors

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Anglican Church envoy Terry Waite canceled his flight home to England on Tuesday to stay in Beirut for face-to-face negotiations with kidnappers of American hostages.

He scrubbed his midmorning departure plans after returning to his hotel from a late-night meeting with Islamic Jihad, sources close to him said.

"It looked like he has had a breakthrough," one source said, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He will have further meetings with the captors."

Meanwhile, a hitherto unknown group threatened Tuesday to carry out terrorist attacks against Italy for allegedly mistreating two jailed comrades. In a typewritten statement in poor Arabic, the group, God's Partisans, threatened to kill the Italian justice minister and the warden of Spoleto Prison, where it said the two were held; to blow up the Italian Embassy in Beirut; to kidnap Italians and to hijack Italian jetliners.

Reports differ in attack on capital

Iran said Tuesday its invasion force killed or wounded 1,500 Iraqi soldiers in fighting near Basra, provincial capital of southern Iraq. An Iranian missile exploded in Baghdad, and the Iraqis said it killed civilians.

Iraq's communiques claimed its troops repulsed an Iranian ground assault Thursday night outside Basra and left corpses of Iranian attackers "littering the battlefield."

The Baghdad government's official Iraqi News Agency quoted a military source it did not name as saying Iranian claims of an advance toward Basra were "cheap lies."

Reports carried by Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency said Iranian forces ambushed Iraqi troops overnight west of the Jasim River. That would put the Iranians within six miles of Basra, which has been an Iranian objective since the war began in September 1980.

Survey results favor sex education

NEW YORK — A large majority of the 534 adults polled by Parents magazine say they favor sex education in public schools, the magazine reported Tuesday.

Two-thirds said contraceptive devices should be available through schools with parental consent, Parents said.

The survey also found that 29 percent of those polled thought sex education programs should teach students that sex should be saved for marriage. Sixty-six percent felt it should be an individual choice.

"That reflects what's happening in reality," Sol Gordon, professor emeritus of child and family studies at Syracuse University said in the February issue of the magazine.

"Very few couples wait for marriage: 80 percent of women and about 95 percent of men have had premarital sex," Gordon said.

Seventy-seven percent of the respondents favored sex education in public schools.

Forty percent said such programs would reduce teen-age pregnancies but not sexual activity; 17 percent thought they would reduce sexual activity and 20 percent believed they would encourage sexual activity and experimentation.

Seven percent said the programs have no effect, and 16 percent said they had no opinion.

GOP rejects K.C. convention site

WASHINGTON — Missouri and Kansas Republican leaders expressed disappointment Tuesday that the GOP will bypass Kansas City as the site of the party's national convention, but said they would not fight the selection of New Orleans.

Missouri GOP Chairman Hillard Selck predicted that the Republican National Committee would follow the recommendation of the site selection committee, on which he was a member, when it meets Friday to ratify the choice of the southern city. In fact, Selck said he probably would vote for New Orleans.

"We fought the hard fight. We lost," Selck said. "I think part of the competition, be it football, basketball or whatever, is the loser has to take it on the chin. So I'm prepared to take it on the chin."

New Orleans emerged as the preference of the committee on a 6-3 vote. Selck, Marynell Reece, a national committeewoman from Scandia, and Montana GOP Chairman John C. Brenden supported Kansas

Supporters of death penalty testify

TOPEKA — Regardless of its effect as a deterrent, the death penalty is a fitting sentence for people who would callously slaughter other human beings, capital punishment supporters told a panel of House lawmakers Tuesday.

The death penalty backers, some of whom compared convicted murderers with vicious animals, testified as the House Federal and State Affairs Committee began two days of hearings on a bill that would impose death by lethal injection as a possible sentence for people convicted of first-degree murder.

Rep. Robert H. Miller, the chairman of the committee, said opponents were scheduled to testify Wednesday afternoon and the panel would begin deliberations on the measure Thursday. Miller, R-Wellington, said it's possible the committee will approve the proposal and send it to the House floor by the end of the week.

"Capital punishment is the mark of a society which holds dear the lives of its citizens," said Rep. Clyde Graeber, R-Leavenworth, one of the primary sponsors of the bill. "It is a society which holds life cheap that imposes weak penalties for the taking of human life."

Task force to assess athletic fee surveys

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

Members of the Athletic Fee Task Force received the forms needed to conduct a survey concerning the proposed athletic fee Tuesday.

Task force members plan to conduct a telephone survey of 500 K-State students, said Jennifer Leeds, sophomore in political science and task force member.

It is hoped the survey will be completed within two weeks, Leeds said.

Also during the meeting, points to be included in the Athletic Fee fact sheet were considered by the committee.

Included were:

— The $400,000 deficit in the 1986-87 athletic budget and the reasons precipitating that deficit.

— A list of other schools' athletic fees.

— The possibility of a tuition increase in the future.

— A list of non-revenue sports and their scholarships.

Three points need to be clarified before the fact sheet can be written, said Doug Folk, junior in electrical engineering.

He said the group would need to find out how many scholarships in non-revenue sports are endowed, the percent decrease in the sports' budgets and a clarification of the athletic fees at other schools.

The task force also heard a proposal from the Sports Club Council that 25 cents to 30 cents be added to the proposed athletic fee.

However, members of the task force advised Queen that the council might be better off seeking funding elsewhere.

Adding an extra charge to a proposed athletic fee might be confusing to some people, said Bill Majerus, graduate student in agronomy.

He said some people are already confused by what the fee would be used for, and then adding more sports and more money to it might make matters worse.

The next meeting of the Athletic Fee Task Force will be at 4:30 p.m. Friday

Inmates tell of CIA, Contra drug deals

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Two federal inmates say they flew arms to the Nicaraguan Contra rebels and drugs back to the United States with the knowledge of the CIA and the Drug Enforcement Administration. "It was guns down, cocaine back," one inmate said.

A spokeswoman for the CIA denied the charge Tuesday, as have a DEA spokesman and two top leaders of the Contras fighting Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government.

Jorge "George" Morales Garcia is scheduled for trial Monday on charges of smuggling 461 kilograms or 1,014 pounds of cocaine from Costa Rica to the Bahamas. The second inmate, Gary Betzner, flew two missions for Morales and is serving a sentence for cocaine smuggling and facing attempted escape charges.

Morales' attorney, Andrew Hall, says his client is the source referred to as "a Colombian narcotics trafficker" in last year's U.S. State Department report acknowledging that some Contra officials were involved in the drug trade. Morales and Betzner also have been interviewed by House and Senate committee staff members investigating the Iran-Contra scandal.

Morales said he received some of his instructions on the guns-for-drugs trade from a CIA contact in Costa Rica.

"The CIA was very, very aware of it," Morales told The Associated Press. He said his CIA-directed arms flights continued even after Congress banned such aid.

CIA spokeswoman Kathy Pherson denied the accusation Tuesday.

Morales said the DEA also was aware of the drug flights and made no move to stop him from supplying planes and pilots for the operation.

Morales also said he met frequently from 1984 until his arrest last year with Contra directors Adolfo Calero and Alfonso Robelo, including talks about the arms-for-drugs swap.

The two rebel leaders have strenuously denied any drug dealing, most recently at a Jan. 7 news conference. The AP reported in December 1985 that Costa Rica-based Contras and U.S. supporters were involved in drug smuggling.

The long-standing drug allegations are under investigation by congressional committees as well as the FBI and could be taken over by the independent council appointed to investigate the Iran-Contra affair.

In recent months, the Justice Department also has received testimony from a witness who claims to have watched the loading of cocaine on a Southern Air Transport plane in Barranquilla, Colombia, in October 1985, according to knowledgeable sources who insisted on anonymity.

Flight crew logs belonging to Wallace Blaine Sawyer Jr., a longtime Southern Air pilot killed when an arms-laden plane was shot down over Nicaragua on Oct. 5, showed him flying a Southern Air L-382G from Barranquilla to Miami three times in early October 1985.

Morales and Betzner said arms were flown to John Hull, a U.S. citizen with a ranch in Costa Rica on the Nicaraguan border. Hull has said he provided humanitarian aid to the Contras, but has denied acting as a conduit for arms.

Betzner identified Hull as a CIA operative. He said that on his two trips, in the same week in 1984, after dropping off the arms and two Americans, he picked up 1,500 kilograms of cocaine from the farm and flew back to the United States.

After the first flight, Betzner said he landed in North Florida with the drugs because he was not certain the DEA and CIA were participating. But after seeing the path smoothed for that deal, he brought the second shipment into Opa-locka as instructed.

He said he later saw Morales talking to men wearing DEA shields.

"I do not deny that as a pilot I smuggled my share of illegal substances," Betzner said. "But by the same token, I also smuggled my share of weapons in exchange for illegal substances with the full knowledge and cooperation of the DEA and the CIA."

Profits from the drugs were intended to finance the Contras' war, said Morales, but he said he became disenchanted when he saw the money was not reaching the front lines.

Instead, the funds went to "the leaders, some of them who are getting wealthy, who are getting profit from the situation," Morales said.

Train wreck sparks drug, rail safety concerns

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senators called Tuesday for expanded drug testing of train operators and new authority for federal regulators to deal with what an official described as widespread tampering with automatic safety devices on trains.

Federal railroad officials, appearing at the first in a series of congressional hearings prompted by the Amtrak accident, said the government is severely limited in what it can do at present.

Both drug use and equipment tampering have been implicated in the Jan. 4 collision of an Amtrak passenger train and three Conrail freight locomotives near Baltimore. Sixteen people were killed and 175 others injured in the worst accident in Amtrak's history.

Top Amtrak officials, in their first extensive public comments on the accident, put the blame directly on the Conrail crewmen.

"The evidence is overwhelming that the sole cause of the accident ... was the outrageous conduct of the Conrail crew in violating not one but a whole series of important operating rules," Amtrak Chairman W. Graham Claytor declared. He said at least six safety rules were violated.

During questioning he said he was convinced the Conrail engineer and brakeman "must have been impaired" by drug use, although investigators have not yet made such a conclusion.

"To have done the things they did, I think, can hardly be explained any other way," Claytor said.

Tests on the engineer and brakeman aboard the Conrail locomotive involved in the collision have shown marijuana in the blood and urine.

Witnesses told the Senate transportation appropriations subcommittee a signal warned the Conrail engineer nearly a mile before the track intersection he should slow to 20 miles an hour and stop.

Instead, testified John Riley, head of the Federal Railroad Administration, "the Conrail freight actually accelerated to a maximum speed of 62 mph." He said at least four properly-working slow-down signals were ignored.

That information and the results from the drug tests "clearly call" for Congress to require new drug detection measures in the railroad industry, said Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, R-N.Y.

"To put it mildly, these people certainly were under the influence and were impaired," D'Amato added.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., chairman of the subcommittee, also called for expanded testing programs to root out drug use among railroad employees, including possible random testing, which is strongly opposed by rail unions.

Lautenberg also said railroad engineers should be licensed. However, Riley suggested licensing might have little impact, saying the Conrail engineer involved in the Amtrak accident had performed well in training tests.

Riley said he would not oppose random drug testing if Congress required it and would welcome new authority that would allow the agency to better deal with rail workers tampering with safety equipment.

Since the Amtrak accident, he said, his agency has found 10 instances where locomotives had speed signal whistles taped over so they were muffled. The whistle on the Conrail train, which would have alerted the crew to a slow-down requirement nearly two miles short of the track intersection, had been similarly taped.

Riley said other safety devices also are being tampered with regularly in the rail industry.

Israel jeopardizes aid by spying against U.S.

For years, Israel has been regarded as one of the United States' most valued allies in the Middle East. Israel receives more foreign aid from the United States than any other nation in the world — to the tune of $3.5 billion in fiscal year 1986. The total combined American aid to Israel has been estimated at about $10 billion a year, much of which is in the form of grants that Israel never has had to repay.

Moreover, the United States shares a substantial amount of its technology and weaponry with Israel, and Israel is given priority where its imports into the United States are concerned. What more could Israel possibly want from Americans?

More, and lots of it. Obviously what it has received is not enough, because Israel is now stealing national secrets from the United States. Case in point is Jonathan Jay Pollard, former civilian analyst working for U.S. Navy intelligence. In June, Pollard pleaded guilty to spying for Israel against the United States.

Four Israelis — two Israeli intelligence officials, one senior officer of the Israeli air force and a worker at the Israeli embassy — were named in court documents of the Pollard investigation as co-conspirators, yet none were charged with any crime. It is reported that Pollard, with the help of his Israeli co-conspirators, gave more than 1,000 highly classified U.S. government documents to Israeli intelligence during his 18-month "shopping spree" in the immense intelligence stores of the American government. But since Pollard's arrest in November 1985 and his subsequent guilty plea in June, Israel has returned only 163 of these top secret documents.

Not only is the American government facing severe embarrassment over the Pollard case, but it has suffered a great blow to its intelligence (especially anti-terrorist) efforts in the Middle East and Mediterranean region. How can the United States justify sending so many dollars to one of America's "greatest allies" when that ally has seen fit to put America's national security at perilous risk?

The United States should seriously re-evaluate the importance of its great "ally" in the Middle East, and Israel should be reminded how much it owes to the United States. Such pathetic back-stabbing should not be tolerated.

If this case alone is not convincing enough, consider the following: In the 20 years preceding Pollard's arrest, U.S. officials have on the books 40 cases of Americans spying for Israel against the United States.

Drugs not necessarily to blame for collision

The recent Conrail-Amtrak disaster is yet another example which illustrates the futility of drug testing and the "conclusions" such testing purports to offer.

Results of tests performed on two crewmen of the Conrail train that slid into the path of an Amtrak passenger train indicated both men had marijuana in their systems at the time of the wreck.

Despite the presence of marijuana, the actual effect the drug could have had on their performance is not clear. Studies have shown that traces of the drug are detectable in the body up to 30 days after its use. Furthermore, even the positive identification of marijuana is not certain since other chemicals, including prescription and over-the-counter drugs, can produce positive results on drug tests.

Current blood and urine tests are not technologically advanced enough to pinpoint if the drug was taken recently enough to impair the mens' reactions upon seeing warning lights that signaled the approach of the Amtrak train.

In opening remarks at Congressional hearings which began Tuesday to sort through possible causes for the disaster, Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said the accident makes clear that the train industry should be required to comply with a broad drug- and alcohol-testing program. However, considering the inaccuracy of tests currently used, this move would accomplish nothing.

The wreck, which killed 16 people, injured 175 and was the worst in Amtrak history, must not be dismissed as just another drug-related incident. Other flaws in the construction of both trains contributed to the tragedy and must be corrected.

The Wall Street Journal recently quoted Ross Capon, the executive director of the National Association of Railroad Passengers, as saying it was a "failure of public policy that the government has spent the past decade arguing over whether Amtrak should exist instead of deciding how we could improve it."

Improvements necessary for the safety of Amtrak passengers in case of a collision include revisions in baggage racks that would prevent heavy luggage from striking and injuring passengers and the addition of more secure seat moorings that would prevent seats from being ripped up and thrown across the car.

The Conrail train did not have an automatic-braking device which would have stopped the train automatically even if the brakeman and engineer failed to notice a warning light.

The accident was an unfortunate technological and human failure caused by many problems that can and must be corrected. To dismiss the incident by saying the crew was on drugs without looking at other safety shortcomings would be a mistake.

Ag dependence cripples state

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

It is a brand new year, and Kansas has a brand new governor in Mike Hayden. Hayden ran a bizzare campaign to get elected, or at least that is the way it appeared to me. I don't recall ever having witnessed a campaign where the candidate promised to kill people if elected. The fact that he won leaves the impression that maybe we watch too many Chuck Norris movies.

While Hayden may have made a big deal out of the death penalty, the policy that is having the most effect on us now is the 3.8 percent budget cuts. These cuts are designed to help the state out of its financial troubles. Hopefully, when times get better, these cuts can be restored and we can all live happily ever after. If you believe this is all you have to do to get to Shangri-la, I have some wonderful beach property in Nevada you might be interested in.

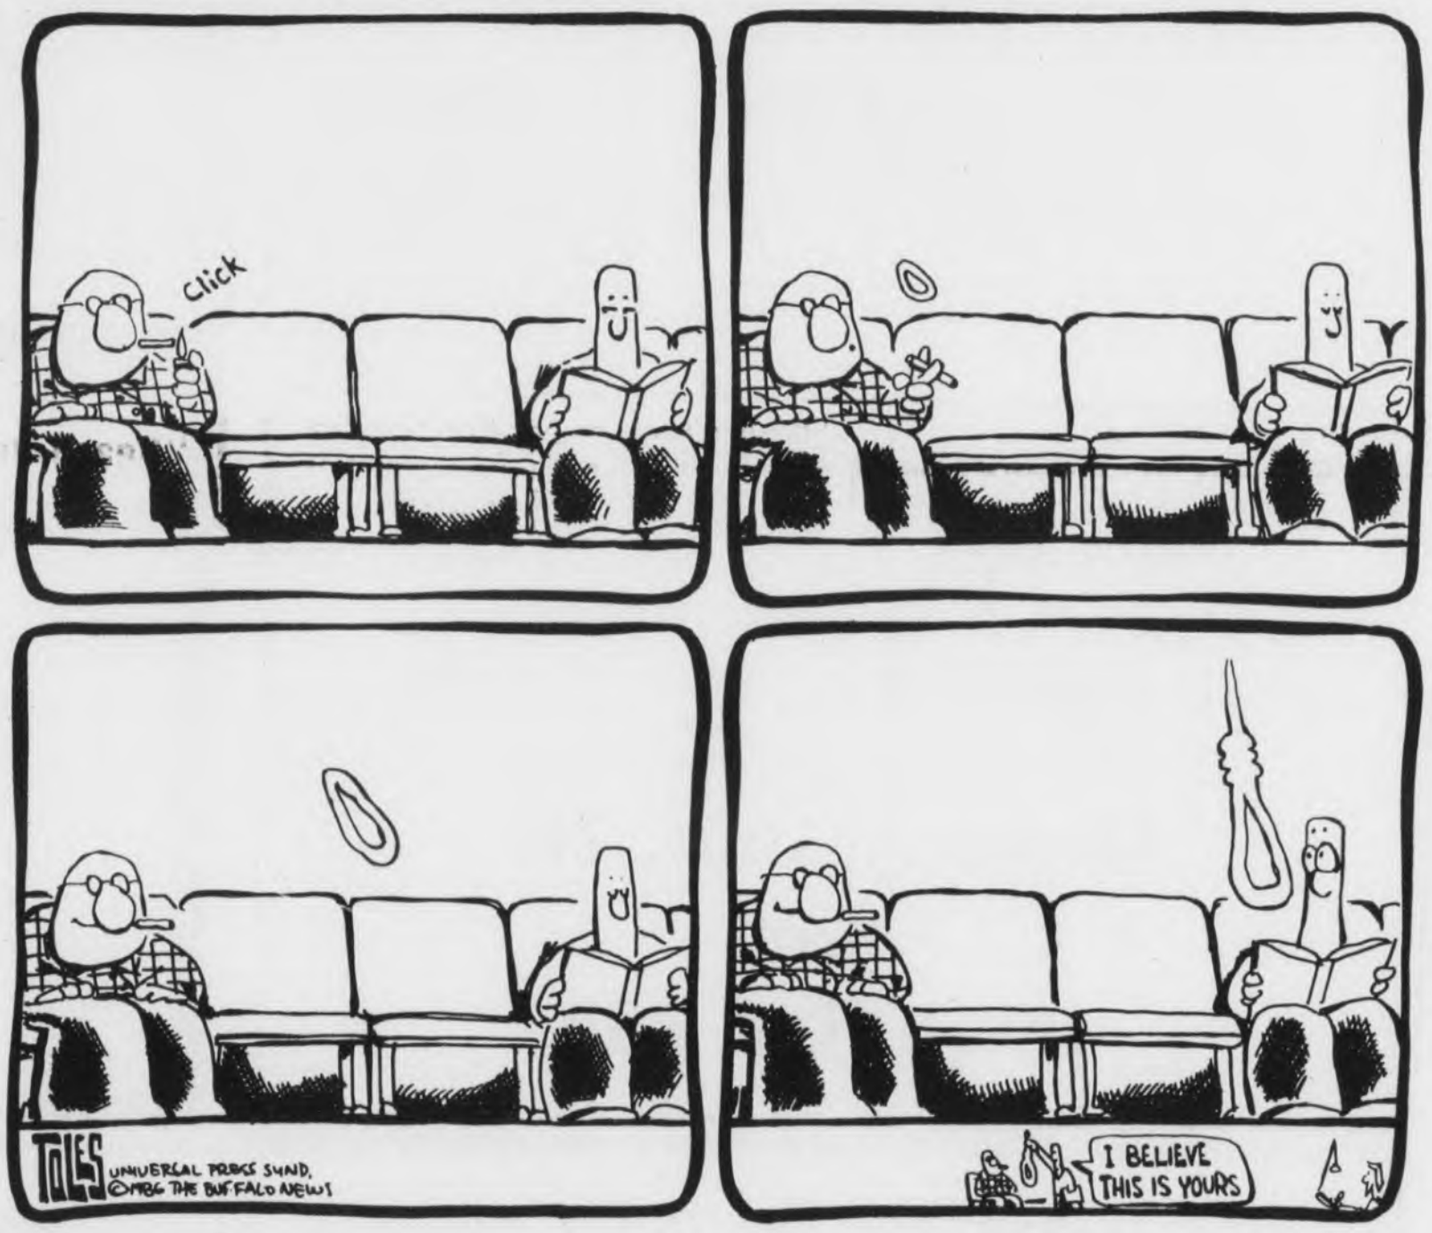
People like Hayden think that in order to restore the Kansas economy, all we have to do is cut the budget, keep taxes the same and wait for the storm to blow over. But in order for this approach to work, a couple of things must happen. First, we must hope that good times do return. There is no guarantee this storm is not a permanent fixture. Second, we must hope the programs cut will still be around when and if the storm subsides.

I'm not sure if the economic storm in Kansas will ever clear up under the present structure. This is due to our heavy dependence on a few agricultural products. When these crops fail due to either natural disaster or a falling market, the Kansas economy also fails. To get away from this, the state needs to concentrate on diversifying its economic interests. This will help to stabilize the state's economy and will lessen those wild swings in the market. This has worked well in California, which is the largest agricultural producer in the United States, yet it is not suffering the bad times Kansas is.

Hayden's budget policy does not address this problem of the lack of economic diversity. His "solution" of cutting the budget is no more than a patch job on an antiquated system. If Hayden really wants to solve these problems, he needs to go to the problem-solvers, the Kansas educational system.

This state badly needs to invest in its educational institutions. This is an investment in the state's future. As it stands now, our brightest students are leaving Kansas to attend other schools, and these people are not coming back to work on the farm. It would be to our benefit to get these people to stay in Kansas.

Not only is the state losing its intellectual resources to other states, it is wasting the resources it has. It is becoming increasingly expensive to go to college these days. Also, considering the problem of a lack of money due to the economic slump, people are facing not being able to afford a college education. Add to these the proposed cutbacks in federal student financial aid and we then have an impossible situation. These people who could be helping the state out of its slump can't do so for they can little afford the cost of their education.



So what can be done about this? That is fairly simple. Since educated people are a valuable resource that should not be wasted, and since they also give more to this country than it costs to educate them, the state and federal governments should provide this and all education free to everyone.

A drastic step, I know. But I also believe this to be a necessary step toward our future. With the world moving toward high-tech areas, a person will not be able to survive with just a high school diploma. The government already funds education up to high school because it sees it as being in its interest to do so. But the world has changed, and the government must change with it.

Not only will providing free education help us economically, but it will also help us politically. How do we expect a democracy to work when a majority of the people don't know what is going on? This is a world where the president can lie to the people and still win re-election. A country of morons will always choose a moron to lead them, for they know no better.

This program would not only benefit Kansas, but the entire country as well. The state governments could not handle the financing of such a large project, so the federal government would have to help out. Taxes would go up, but the economic benefits provided by this program would more than pay for it in just a couple of years.

While Hayden can't accomplish something like this by himself, he could quit trying to go the opposite direction. Education would be a way to get this state back on its feet. We have to move into other areas besides farming to achieve stability, and we will never get there unless we teach the people how to do something else. Diversification is the key to a better economy, and education is the way to get there.

Editor,

Re: "After Hours" by Carol Lenkner with photos by John LaBarge, Collegian, Dec. 11, 1986.

I am a senior at the K-State College of Veterinary Medicine and also am a live-in student. I am concerned that the article contained some rather glaring errors. Either Ms. Lenkner was misinformed, or she inferred a lot from what was told to her.

Yes, the live-ins are on call from 5 p.m. to 8 a.m. weekdays and from 5 p.m. Fridays until 8 a.m. Mondays on weekends, but only two of us are on at any one time, either evenings or weekends. From 5 p.m. to midnight weekdays and 8 a.m. to midnight weekends, we are responsible for running electrolytes and manning the pharmacy when necessary. There are senior student interns responsible for all emergency cases during this time in the various areas of the hospital. From midnight to 8 a.m., we are responsible for emergencies and the previous duties mentioned.

We are not responsible for routine care of cases, as they are reassigned the following morning to one of the 106 seniors in whichever rotation the case belongs. For example, if a case came in for emergency surgery after midnight, the live-ins would be responsible for receiving that animal, getting a good history from the client and performing a physical exam on the patient.

The surgeon and surgery students would be called in for the actual surgery and aftercare. There are a lot of people involved in any case that enters the hospital, including students, faculty and staff. The live-ins provide a vital service to the hospital, but we are merely support to the rest of the hospital.

During school vacations, we take turns covering our duties. We tried to make things as fair as possible for all our vacations so that no one student is doing more than anyone else in the long run.

I feel there would have been fewer problems and dissension with this article if the reporter had spoken to more of us who are live-ins. Taking all of the material from one person's viewpoint is a frequent failing of the Collegian. I realize we did not spend much time with your photographer, but we usually had little notice before he came and often this was at inopportune times.

It always seemed to be nearly bedtime, and the last time was just after the seniors had finished eight hours of exams and had four more the next morning. I believe that a journalist's responsibility is to be as accurate as possible, and I feel that this information will help to clarify and correct the original article "After Hours."

Thank you for letting me voice my opinion and this extra information.

The value of life

Editor,

I feel there is a certain irony in this week's activities in honor of Martin Luther King Jr. We praise a man, and rightly so, who gave up his life to bring an end to discrimination on the basis of race. Yet we support and promote, through University services, a form of discrimination on the basis of age and place of residence. In our society, this discrimination is called legalized abortion.

Say an American woman was nine months pregnant and delivered a healthy baby. Then a man runs into the hospital room and stabs the infant to death. What would happen? The man would go to jail as a murderer.

Yet if that same woman had decided only one day earlier to get an abortion, a man could have inserted a knife inside her womb and cut the child apart under the full protection of the law. Because there was no significant difference in the child itself from one day to the next, the change of legal protection revolves almost exclusively around the child's age and place of residence. I admit that discrimination is too mild a word for this incredible injustice.

The racial discrimination that Martin Luther King fought affected a person's dignity, status in society, educational opportunities and livelihood. Abortion today literally affects whether a person will live or die.

The racial discrimination that Martin Luther King fought denied Americans their Constitutional rights of equality, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Abortion today denies Americans their most fundamental Constitutional right — to life!

We honor Martin Luther King because he understood the true value of all people in the sight of God, no matter what age, sex, race or religion. In that same spirit, understanding the value of each tiny baby in the sight of God, I will be marching with many others in the Pro-Life March on Thursday, Jan. 22, sponsored by Great Commission Students. I hope that many of you will join with us in choosing life for the next generation of Americans.

Mayor sets date to 'Reach for Stars'

By RICH BROADFOOT
Collegian Reporter

Jan. 28, 1987, has been named "Reach for the Stars Day" in Manhattan, said Mayor Rick Mann at the city commission meeting Tuesday night.

In a proclamation read at the meeting, Mann stated that Jan. 28 is to be reserved to honor the 10 men and women who lost their lives in the U.S. space program.

The three astronauts who died in the 1966 fire aboard the spacecraft AS-204 and the six astronauts and teacher who died aboard the space shuttle Challenger will be honored. The first anniversary of the Challenger explosion is Jan. 28.

Accepting the proclamation was Manhattan area teacher Bill Warner, who represented a group of teachers who applied for the Teacher in Space program.

In other business, the commission heard a presentation by Mike Butler of the Schwab-Eaton architectural firm dealing with a proposed master plan for the West Anderson Sports and Recreation Park.

The concept, which calls for construction of a large soccer, softball and picnic facility in west Manhattan, was tentatively approved by the commission.

The West Anderson complex is part of a greater "Quality of Life" program that was passed by Manhattan voters last year.

A public meeting will be held Feb. 2 to discuss other segments of the "Quality of Life" program, including the construction of the CiCo Park and Northview pools.

The commission then approved a petition from a group of Kimball Avenue residents requesting street improvements. The petition called for the city to utilize funds to pave Kimball Avenue from Plymouth Road to just west of Little Kitten Creek, and to construct sidewalks along both sides of the street. Ten petitioners attended the meeting.

Also receiving considerable discussion was an ordinance calling for the annexation of 15.2 acres of land located north of Stagg Hill Road.

Also approved was an application for a private club license by the Dark Horse Tavern Inc., 1619 N. Manhattan Ave., and a request from the Sunset Zoo for funds for sidewalk improvements.

A measure on the agenda, but not discussed, was a request by Manhattan resident Kevin Converse for a $5,000 allocation from the Special Alcohol and Drug Program Fund. Converse, who did not attend the meeting, would utilize the funds to subsidize the operation of a non-alcoholic bar in Aggieville.

Dean in intensive care after having chest pain

By The Collegian Staff

Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture, was admitted to the The Saint Mary Hospital Monday afternoon as a "precautionary" measure after experiencing chest pains earlier in the day, a University spokesman said Tuesday evening.

Cy Wainscott, director of University Relations, said, based on information he has received, he does not believe Lapping suffered a heart attack.

"I don't think (there is) cause for alarm," Wainscott said. "I know for a fact he has some business meetings scheduled for Wednesday in his (private hospital) room."

Lynn Ewanow, assistant dean of the college, said Lapping drove to the hospital at about noon on Monday.

Lapping was in the intensive care unit Monday evening, and hospital officials said he was still there Tuesday afternoon.

Speaker says money to help create zoo agenda

By CHRIS HALL
Collegian Reporter

Any zoo should have a master plan to work from when making changes to an existing zoo or developing a new facility, said Ron Blakely, director of the Sedgwick County Zoo and Botanical Gardens.

Having a master plan is important because a zoo must have a goal — a philosophy. The goal of most zoos today is "to interpret nature for the visitor," he said.

Blakely presented a lecture at the Winter Education Program Series Tuesday at the Manhattan Holiday Inn & Holidome, 530 Richards Drive. The series is sponsored by the Friends of the Zoo.

The Sunset Zoo is developing a master plan to renovate and improve the facility and is now basically "just a concept," said Steve Matthews, director of the Sunset Zoo. Eventually, a written description will be developed, plans will be drawn, and the work will begin. Many questions need to be answered before this happens, he said.

Some of the questions include: whether the Sunset Zoo should aspire to become a regional attraction; the feasibility of charging a gate fee; focus of exhibits; which structures to renovate; and future financing of the zoo, Matthews said.

Friends of the Zoo donated $7,000 to the project. This amount was matched by the city, and an additional $3,000 was donated by other sources.

Zoo administrators will be meeting with the Manhattan City Commission to discuss the project. Results from a survey of zoo visitors and feedback from the community will also be considered in the decision-making process, Matthews said.

Matthews said the first step is to hire a zoo consultant. Applicants for the position will submit proposals describing their ideas for the development, and candidates will be interviewed in Feburary. The selection of the consultant will be a joint decision of the zoo administrators and the commission.

"Our goal is to have an innovative zoo for Manhattan," Matthews said.

Blakely, who has been involved in zoos for almost 40 years, said the advantages of having a master plan are: to have a concept of what you are working toward; to have a selling point with which to get supporters; and to be able to correct errors while they are still on paper.

"It is cheaper to correct something with an eraser than a bulldozer," he said.

Blakely emphasized to the zoo staff present that the money they deal with belongs to the city residents and the zoo supporters and they have an obligation to get the most value from their dollars as possible.

The next series lecture is scheduled for Feb. 17.

Class views Greek structures

By TIM STALEY
Collegian Reporter

While many students celebrated New Year's Eve with parties in their hometowns, 12 students from K-State, the University of Kansas and Iowa State University celebrated in Athens, Greece.

These students accompanied Lefteri Pavlides, assistant professor of environmental design, on the winter intersession course, Architecture and Planning of Greece.

"For an architect, Greece is an architectural smorgasbord," Pavlides said. "You get a piece of the ancient and a piece of the modern architecture."

Pavlides, who was born and raised in Athens, led the students, including nine from K-State, on a 17-day trip visiting such sites in Athens as the Acropolis, the Temple of Zeus and the Olympic Stadium.

To complement the sites visited in Athens, the group also went on a three-day excursion to Corinth, Mycene, Tyrins, Epidaurus and Nafplion in Greece.

Both Pavlides and Jim Kurtz, senior in architecture, said the fortress at Nafplion was their favorite site.

"(The fortress) overlooks the Mediterranean (Sea)," Kurtz said. "It has a beautiful view."

Kurtz also said the water in the sea was so clear he could see 20 to 30 feet into the water from the 999-step fortress.

Students also said they enjoyed seeing Greece from a perspective most tourists miss.

"To me, the best part of the trip was that we didn't see Greece through a tourist bus window," said Jeffery Saffer, junior in architecture.

Saffer said the group went further than tourists when they had the opportunity to visit three Greek architectural offices and then the architects' homes.

"We discussed architecture, politics and the differences between our countries," Saffer said.

"We actually got to go and see how a Greek family would live," Kurtz said. "We got to experience the family lifestyles by being able to go visit the houses."

Kurtz also said the group enjoyed some Greek cuisine at Pavlides' parents' home.

The students were also treated to lectures by professors of architecture from the University of Athens on how an individual designs in such a visually and culturally rich context.

"We were invited to the office of Ari Constandinides, who is one of the best-known European architects, and also the dean of Greek architecture," Pavlides said. "He gave us a four-hour lecture.

"In addition to architecture, (the students) learned intercultural communication," he said. "It was one of the most successful courses I have ever taught."

Safety device for NASA shuttles needs more testing, officials say

By The Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston — A rocket-powered system designed to pull astronauts to safety from the space shuttle will not be installed until further tests are conducted, a space agency official announced Tuesday.

Rear Adm. Richard Truly, the NASA associate administrator for space flight, said the agency does not "feel comfortable" yet in committing to a proposed rocket escape system, and will fly the shuttle even if such a system is not installed.

Truly said the agency, however, will proceed with the design and installation of a system that could be used to blow away a space shuttle hatch to permit the crew to jump to safety in the event of an emergency.

Truly said that in an emergency on the ground or in a low-speed controlled flight, the crew members could blow the hatch away and then leave the craft. Parachutes and other personal safety equipment are being developed, he said.

Truly said NASA still plans to resume shuttle flights on Feb. 18, 1988.

JUGGLING
Time and Nutrition

After filling up with mom's good ol' home cooking over break, it's back to TV dinners, late-night pizzas, instant soup and anything else heated up in five minutes or grabbed at the nearest fast-food joint.

A "real meal" seems out of the question for the student on the go. The idea of a quick fix is usually a frozen burrito popped in the oven.

As a result, many students forget about food value when the rush of semester activities takes over. Those who pick up a hamburger and fries at a fast-food restaurant may be getting 40 percent to 60 percent more fat than home-prepared food. Sodium is abundant in several fast foods, while fiber and vitamins A and C may be scarce.

Believe it or not, there are a number of healthy main meals easily within reach of any "full-load" student.

K-State Extension Specialist Mary Clarke said one doesn't have to miss those precious vitamins and minerals necessary for a healthy body. She points out some easy nutritional meals made at home with just a little planning ahead.

"The main thing is to plan one main meal daily," Clarke said. "You should sit down with the money you have to spend and plan one trip to the grocery store for the week."

Clarke bases meal planning on four things: money, time, nutrition and what you like to eat.

"These are the four basics, plus your skills as a cook and whether or not you have a microwave and freezer space."

Clarke uses what she calls "planned overs," which are schedules of meals for the weekdays ahead.

"When I have more time, such as on the weekend, and I'm cooking something, I'll make extra to refrigerate for the rest of the week. Chili is a good example," she said.

"You can start with chili, which has your meat group and tomatoes and onions for the vegetable group. Then add spaghetti or eat it with whole wheat toast or crackers for your bread."

Clarke stresses whole wheat and other grains for their abundance of fiber, which many students' diet may be lacking. Wheat germ, which has little taste, sprinkled on food adds a dose of fiber as well.

"Top the chili with cheese for your milk group or have yogurt for dessert."

The beans in the chili are something most nutrionists are really pushing these days, Clarke said. They include fiber and starches, a wide variety of minerals and B vitamins. They're cheap and keep well.

"One-pot meals are great, too," Clarke said, adding that a slow cooker can come in handy for preparing in the morning and coming home to a meal at night.

Lectures analyze King's contributions

Forum addresses effects on education

By LAUREN BRUNO
Collegian Reporter

More than 50 people gathered at an open discussion forum Tuesday afternoon to observe and discuss the principles and philosophies for which Martin Luther King Jr. lived, dreamed, and died.

The forum, "Martin Luther King, Non-Violence and Education," was sponsored by the College of Education. The featured speakers for the event were James Boyer, professor of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction; David Byrne, dean of the College of Education; Jan Wissman, associate professor of the Department of Adult and Occupational Education; Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president of minority affairs; and Chad Litz, professor of the Department of Administration and Foundation.

Boyer said the purpose of the forum was to initiate discussion concerning King's life and how the outcome of his philosophy of non-violence has affected public education.

"The life of Martin Luther King is its own testimony for a national holiday," Byrne said.

Byrne referred to King's most famous speech, "I Have a Dream," and said non-violence represents the form of activity necessary for achieving that dream. Byrne said although non-violence does not mean to be passive or non-active, nothing can be accomplished socially through violence.

"Let us focus on action, mentally, and assertiveness, intellectually, and serve the cause to rededicate ourselves and examine the accomplishments we have made," he said.

Litz said the root of King's non-violent philosopy was the idea that "justice is nothing more than love distributed. The heart of King's philosophy was his commitment to non-violent coercion."

King was a man who searched to find a balance between militancy and moderation — advocating coercion without hate and militancy without restraint, Litz said.

"Martin Luther King was an intellectual, not an activist. King's major goal was to mobilize legitimate anger without losing support and to do so within the confines of the constitution," he said.

To be a good leader, Switzer said people must be able to stand alone and be counted without their peers.

"We must be able to speak individually," he said.

Panel relates equality to design world

By SUSAN STAGGENBORG
Collegian Reporter

The establishment of equality among women and minorities in the design profession was the theme of a public forum of architectural professionals Tuesday evening in the Big Eight Room.

The forum, "Equity in the Design Professions," organized by the College of Architecture and Design in cooperation with the Design Council, was scheduled in conjuction with the celebration of Martin Luther King Jr. Week.

A panel of four design professionals reflected on the efforts Martin Luther King made in the attainment of equality. The panel consisted of Peggie Livingood, architect for the Kansas Department of Economic Development; Versie Stephenson, Kansas City architect; Becky Cotton Zahner, Kansas City architect; and Jane Rowlett, director of Affirmative Action at K-State.

"Martin Luther King was a central figure in American efforts for greater equality," said Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture and moderator. "Our nation is far from equality and harmonious relationships with ethnic groups."

Women and minorities do not receive equality within the design profession in a survey conducted by the American Institute of Architects. According to the survey, for every dollar males earned, white females earned 68 cents, while black females received 58 cents, he said.

"Women and minorities experience a chilly environment on campuses nationally," Rowlett said. "This has a negative effect on student attrition, which may cause these students to drop classes. This chilly climate exists also in the professional field."

"It's 1987, nobody likes to talk about discrimination, equality, or ERA (Equal Rights Amendment)," Zahner said. "Real progress comes with the steady advance of all, not just a few."

Civil rights advocate to give convocation

By The Collegian Staff

Eleanor Holmes Norton, former chairwoman of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, will speak at a University-wide convocation today in McCain Auditorium.

The address is part of the week-long campus events honoring the birthday of Martin Luther King Jr.

After answering questions at a 9 a.m. press conference in the Union Director's Conference Room, she will deliver her address at 10:30 a.m.

Norton, currently a professor of law at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., is a graduate of Yale Law School and the recipient of 22 honorary degrees.

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services and chairman of this week's activities, said Norton was selected as speaker for the convocation because of her involvement in a broad range of issues related to King's work.

"King's work focused on many areas of equality — equality of the sexes, employment, races," he said. "Norton, too, has a vast background in many aspects of civil rights, which is why we chose to have her speak at this year's convocation.

ELIGIBILITY FOR CARE AT LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER
1. Health fees are established upon the recommendation of the Student Senate with approval by the Board of Regents.
2. All students who are enrolled and attending classes during a regular semester or summer session who have paid health fees are eligible for care.
3. Those enrolled in Special Courses, for varying periods of time, who have made previous arrangements for health care coverage at Lafene are eligible for care. (Lists of these students must be furnished prior to being seen at Lafene.)
4. Only students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene; however, they must pay the spouse fee within 10 days of the time their own health fees are paid. (Children cannot be seen.)
5. Emergency care, prior to referral, will be given anyone who comes in.
6. Students enrolled in 6 hours or less, electing not to pay the health fee during the Fall or Spring semesters, who wish to be seen, will be charged $20 for each office visit. This charge continues until the full health fee has been exceeded, then that student will be afforded the same privileges as the regular fee paying student for the remainder of that semester.
7. Students who were enrolled in the Spring and pre-enrolled for the Fall semester but not attending summer school may pay $15 and be eligible for care during the summer. This fee may be paid within 30 days prior to summer registration and ends the day classes begin. A late fee of $20 will be accepted for the remainder of the summer.
8. Health fees are good until 12 o'clock the night the next semester begins.

NOTE: In addition to the above mentioned fees, there are minimal charges for certain supplies and services and the charges are subject to change without prior notice.

Colorado forward Matt Bullard (50) is second in the Big Eight in blocked shots — with 21 rejections — and rebounds, averaging 9.5 per game. The Buffaloes face K-State tonight in their fourth conference game.

Buffs attempt to snap 20-game losing streak

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Colorado, 6-9 overall and 0-3 in Big Eight Conference play, would seem to be the perfect opponent for K-State's men's basketball team after its lackluster performance Saturday against Iowa State.

K-State Coach Lon Kruger doesn't see it that way.

"Boulder is always a tough place to go and win," said Kruger. "Traditionally, people just don't go there and win easily."

K-State, 12-3, plays at Boulder, Colo. tonight looking to improve its conference record to 3-0. Tipoff is 9:10 p.m. (CST) and broadcasts can be heard on the K-State Radio Network.

Colorado has lost 20 consecutive Big Eight games — dating back to Feb. 27, 1985 — but the Buffaloes' losing record is deceiving, Kruger said, with the entrance this season of Tom Miller as head coach.

"He's a pretty tough guy," Kruger said. "This year's CU team "play(s) all man-to-man defense and are pretty compact with it. They are similar to Iowa State. Offensively, they are very patient with a motion offense. They'll handle it for 20 to 30 seconds and are very content not to be in a hurry to shoot it."

Under Miller's guidance, the Buffs are 2-8 on the road and 4-1 at home. Four of Colorado's eight road losses have been heartbreakers with one-point affairs at Santa Barbara and Detroit and three-point decisions at Colorado State in overtime and at Kansas.

Kruger isn't concerned with Colorado's road record. The Buffs are 4-1 at home and lead the Big Eight in team defense (64.4 points per game) which leaves him skeptical of anticipating a runaway ball game by K-State.

A weakness in the Buffs' play lately, which the 'Cats could capitalize on, is Colorado's ineffectiveness in handling the press. Miller said his team acts "like we have never seen a press before."

Miller said K-State is "as talented as anyone in the league, and they may be the most talented team. They have a good mixture of quickness, inside and outside play and shooting. Right now, they've got the whole package, and they're playing that way."

Colorado is led by 6-foot-10 sophomore forward Matt Bullard, who averages 18.8 points and 9.4 rebounds per game. Scott Wilke, a 6-9 junior center, averages 14.3 points and 5.3 caroms.

NOTES: This is Colorado's first home conference game this season...K-State leads the series 68-22...K-State has won the last two meetings including a 77-69 overtime battle in Boulder...The last time the 'Cats opened Big Eight play 3-0 was in 1981-82 when they won their first four games...Will Scott leads the Big Eight from three-point range with a .592 average...Scott and Steve Henson rank one and two in free throws averaging .868 and .853 respectively.

Winning road contest challenges Lady Cats

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

After enjoying a four-game home stand, the Lady Cats are finally leaving home.

Heading off to its first road game in more than two weeks, K-State's women's basketball team will attempt to raise its Big Eight Conference record to 3-1 Wednesday night when the Lady Cats battle the Lady Buffs of Colorado in Boulder.

Tip-off time is set for 6:35 CST and will be broadcast live on 580 AM, WIBW-Radio.

K-State, 13-3 overall, has won eight of its last nine games. But all of the Lady Cats' losses this season have been on the road, and the last time they left Ahearn Field House Oklahoma whipped the Cats 70-47 in Norman.

With a win tonight, this year's Lady Cats will move ahead of the 1983-84 squad which started with 13 wins.

Colorado, after a 74-72 loss to Nebraska, posts a 9-7 overall record and is 1-2 in the conference. The Lady Buffs' roster includes 10 players of freshman or sophomore standing.

"They are a young team, but they are an experienced team," said Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman.

Bridget Turner, Tracy Tripp and Crystal Ford are returning starters from last year's Lady Buffs team which finished second in the Big Eight and defeated the Lady Cats 57-56 in the second round of the Big Eight Tournament.

"Anytime you go there (Boulder), it's going to be a tough game," Mossman said. "Last year we went up there and beat them, but they turned around and defeated us at home."

With four of Colorado's five starters averaging in double figures, the Lady Cats will need a balanced defensive effort to win. Tripp leads the Lady Buffs with 13.3 points per game, but Gretchen DeWitte and Erin Carson aren't too far behind with 13.9 and 13.2 points per game, respectively.

"We need to pressure them early and control the tempo of the game," Mossman said. "The fact that they are a young team isn't going to hurt them, because several of them have a lot of experience from last season."

Sue Leiding paces the Lady Cats with 15.3 points per game while Carlisa Thomas averages 10.9 points and 9.6 boards per game.

Giants' line consists of all varieties

By The Associated Press

COSTA MESA, Calif. — One's a stockbroker. Another is an engineer. A third is studying to become an attorney. There also is the banker and the auto dealer.

An odd collection for the Super Bowl. An even odder group to form the New York Giants offensive line.

"I've got a bunch of guys blocking for me named Bradley (Benson), William (Ard) and Christopher (Godfrey)," Giants Coach Bill Parcells said. "They come from schools like Wake Forest and Brigham Young. They're the stockbroker types who after practice head to their suburban homes.

That's very true. And it's also true that this group of suburbanites can be the key Sunday when the Giants meet the Denver Broncos in Pasadena, Calif. for the NFL title.

And the Broncos know it.

"They are a pretty good group," said Broncos linebacker Tom Jackson. "They also know their role. The Giants have a great, great defense and the role of the New York offense is to make the big play when it can and not turn the ball over."

Most of the Giants big plays come on either Joe Morris runs or passing plays set up by Morris' rushing.

"The key to their offense is the run," said Jackson. "You stop the running game and you can control the offense."

Broncos defensive end Rulon Jones said stopping the Giants' running game is difficult because the offensive line rarely lets itself be isolated and because the line is basically two different units, left and right.

The left side of Benson and Ard are power blockers, while the right side of Karl Nelson and Godfrey play a more finesse-type game.

"As a whole, the Giants' line isn't overly physical, even though they are big," said Broncos' linebacker Jim Ryan. "I think their technique is very good. They get in the way of you all the time and cut off your pursuit angles. I don't think I would have such a tough job if they didn't put (tight end Mark) Bavaro in front of me."

Bavaro is one of the extras of the Giants' offensive line along with fullback Maurice Carthon.

Besides being an excellent receiver, the 6-foot-4, 245 pound Bavaro is an outstanding blocker.

"He's like having another lineman on the field," said Oates, the center who is studying for a law degree. "Some of the blocks I have seen him make are devastating."

Morris, who has set club rushing records in each of the past two seasons, says the same thing about Carthon.

"Now I know how Herschel (Walker) felt with Maurice around (they were USFL teammates)," said Morris.

Benson, the auto dealer, credits three things to the development of the offensive line; better personnel, better weight training and injury-free seasons.

In the personnel department, the Giants in the past four years have drafted Nelson, the engineer, on the third round, and signed Oates and Godfrey, the banker, as free agents from the USFL.

K-State, Kruger return magic to Ahearn's friendly confines

TOM MORRIS
Sports Editor

Welcome fans to the Ahearn Field House "magic" show starring Coach Lon Kruger and his band of magicians — the K-State Wildcats.

Yes, it's true, the magic is back this season. Fans have already shattered last season's best attendance figure (10,986 against Kansas) when 11,011 attended the Manhattan appearance of Wichita State Dec. 12. As K-State's media guide phrases it, area basketball fans are "Proud to be a Wildcat...Again!"

There's a rich tradition at K-State and 11,220-seat Ahearn Field House. And with the return of Kruger, twice the Big Eight's Player of the Year, students renewed the tradition of camping out for season basketball tickets.

Kruger's enthusiasm for the game has spilled over to his team, 12-3 overall and 2-0 in the conference, and to the fans. Attendance figures were well above the season average of 8,576 per game at the last three home contests against WSU, Nebraska and Iowa State.

In addition, the Kansas game on Feb. 4 is sold out and only 150 seats were left as of noon Tuesday for Saturday's game against Oklahoma.

"The crowds have been outstanding...just fantastic," Kruger said. "Crowds like that really give the player a lift, especially late in the game when they come out of the huddle and both teams are tired. The home crowd gives the player an extra boost."

Kruger and his 'Cats aren't the only ones noticing the increase in attendance as of late. The Lady Cats, 13-3 overall and 2-1 in the Big Eight, attracted a season-high 2,524 fans Saturday against Iowa State following the men's contest.

"The popularity of the men's team has definitely helped our attendance," Lady Cat Coach Matilda Mossman said. "The fans not only get involved with the men's team but get involved with basketball as a whole. That enthusiasm has seemed to carry over to our team."

Since Ahearn Field House was opened in 1950, K-State teams have compiled an amazing 374-81 win loss-record at home. In 16 years under former head coach Jack Hartman, K-State's record in Ahearn was 179-44 for an .803 winning percentage. That mark included two, 12-0 seasons (1972-73 and 1974-75).

"There might be some (arenas) that compare to it, but there are none that are any better. It is a difficult place for opponents to play in, but I believe the crowd is appreciative of the brand of ball that's played there," Kruger said.

Eddie Sutton, head coach of the Kentucky Wildcats, said, "(Ahearn's) crowd is worth...I don't know how many points to (K-State)."

Kruger echoes Sutton's thoughts. The first-year 'Cat coach remembered a Kansas-K-State matchup at Ahearn during his career when the Wildcats were trailing by more than 10 points with five minutes left in the game.

"I remember the crowd really getting involved and we went on to win by one," Kruger said. "There's no doubt we wouldn't have won without the crowd."

Even the tempermental coaching great Bobby Knight of Indiana said

Celebrity golf tourney set for May

After a one-year break, the Jim Colbert Celebrity Golf tourney will be held May 11 at the Tallgrass Country Club in Wichita.

Jim Colbert, while competing for the Wildcat golf team during the early 1960s, was an NCAA runner-up and currently is a member of the PGA tour. Proceeds from the tourney will go to K-State's men's and women's golf programs.

This year's format will allow for the biggest field ever. As many as 150 K-State boosters, golfing professionals, celebrities, University administrators and coaches will be able to participate in the event. This is the first time in the tourney's 12-year history that it will be staged in Wichita.

Additional information can be obtained by contacting K-State's athletic department, or by contacting Mark Hilyard, golf professional at Tallgrass.

Big Eight honors OU's McCalister

Oklahoma guard Tim McCalister Tuesday was named Big Eight Conference player of the week for the second time this basketball season, after standout performances in three Sooner victories last week.

McCalister, a 6-foot-5 senior from Gary, Ind., had 65 points. His 21 points against Kansas included the game-winning shot in a 76-74 victory over Kansas. McCalister had 14 as OU upset top-ranked Nevada-Las Vegas and contributed 29 in a triumph over LSU.

McCalister also had 16 assists, 7 steals and 8 rebounds in the three games.

Also nominated for this week were Jeff Grayer of Iowa State, Norris Coleman of Kansas State, Lynn Hardy of Missouri, Brian Carr of Nebraska, Matt Bullard of Colorado, Todd Christian of Oklahoma State and Danny Manning of Kansas.

Tigers bow to KU by 1 on late FT

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Junior forward Chris Piper sank the front end of a one-and-one with five seconds remaining and Danny Manning rebounded his missed shot as Kansas defeated Big Eight rival Missouri 71-70 Tuesday night for its 42nd straight victory at Allen Field House.

The victory, which raised the Jayhawks' record to 3-1 in the Big Eight and 11-5 overall, spoiled Missouri's bid for its 1,000th win as well as Coach Norm Stewart's 52nd birthday. The Tigers fell to 2-1 and 12-7.

In other Big Eight action, Iowa State dumped Nebraska 91-75.

Missouri forward Mike Sandbothe threw the ball away with 20 seconds to go and the score tied 70-70. Sandbothe then fouled Piper to send him to the free throw line.

The Tigers led 48-41 with 12 minutes remaining in the game. Derrick Chievous scored six of Missouri's first eight points of the half and finished the game with 29 points.

Manning took control for Kansas in the second half, scoring 11 points.

the fans at Ahearn have "got to be the greatest basketball crowd in America."

K-State's faithful fans and the friendly confines of Ahearn even pursuaded Norris Coleman to endure an NCAA probation until mid-February instead of transferring to a non-Big Eight school where he could have played for a full season.

"There are caring people in Manhattan and I guess that's why I stayed here," Coleman said.

There was a time when arenas such as Ahearn and Allen Field House at the Univeristy of Kansas were considered the class of the Midwest. But if construction progresses as planned, by next season the magic of Ahearn will be shoved aside for the Fred Bramlege Coliseum.

Thanks to Wildcat fans, this season is a fitting farwell for a friend that has served K-State well.

Meals

"For one-pot meals, you have a meat, vegetables, rice and/or potatoes." Local grocers stock a wide variety of vegetables to use if the standard carrots and beans don't satisfy the taste buds.

"Chow mein in a can makes a good basic for adding ground beef, leftover chicken and rice already cooked (which refrigerates well)," Clarke said. "You can just cook it all together."

A baked potato made in the microwave with toppings such as chili or ground beef and gravy is a quick meal, she said. "Put a tossed salad with it to get your green leafies.

"Simply a big chef salad is great. Use tuna fish or sandwich meats and keep hard-boiled eggs on hand for these." For the lettuce, Clarke recommends green leaf lettuce rather than iceberg, the lighter-colored type.

"Sometimes if you're really in a hurry, pick up the main dish from a fast-food place — a plain hamburger or a slice of pizza. Take it home and add a salad (the one slice of lettuce and tomato on a hamburger doesn't suffice for the daily vegetable requirement), fruit and milk to it."

Keeping fresh fruits and vegetables, cheeses, tinned meats such as salmon and sardines on hand is easy for no-preparation meals. "It doesn't have to be hot to be nutritious," Clarke said.

"These meals take little time or skill. Find a variety of main meals that you like and keep those rotating so you don't get tired of the same thing."

An added plus to any student kitchen is a blender and a pressure cooker. A variety of soups can be mixed up and stored ahead of time with a blender.

The best way to get through the semester is to keep a regular routine and not neglect the essential foods for good health, Clarke said.

Many students may have deficiencies in iron and vitamin A from green leafy vegetables, and calcium, she said. "If they take a bunch of vitamin pills to make up for what they're not getting, they may be getting too much of some vitamins."

"With good food you can work at your peak level. While others get sick, you can avoid it," Clarke said.

"If you don't prepare ahead you may find yourself looking into the fridge and saying, 'Oh my goodness, what am I going to eat tonight?' and you take anything that's there."

Planes

whether the military victims were officers or enlisted personnel.

Garlinger said a civilian employee at the ammunition plant heard a popping sound around 12:30 p.m. CST and looked up to see two planes falling, one with a wing missing.

A farmer, Glenn Van Dyke, said he was driving his tractor in a field near the installation when the collision occurred.

"I...saw a bright flash and looked up and saw these pieces raining down out of the sky," Van Dyke said. "I didn't really know what happened at first. I went back to see what the pieces were and...found that big piece of carpet and...insulation and stuff. I wasn't really sure it was airplanes or not...I found an oxygen mask out in the street."

William Melton, an official at the plant which produces small-caliber Army ammunition, said there was no particular danger after the planes hit the ground because there was a limited amount of propellants in the closest buildings containing explosives.

Garlinger said units from the U.S. Army Safety Center at Fort Rucker, Ala., the Federal Aviation Administration and the National Transportation Safety Board would investigate the collision. He said no one would be allowed near the scene of the crash until they arrive.

GET INVOLVED ON CAMPUS WITH THE UNION PROGRAM COUNCIL
Volunteers Wanted: Individuals interested in serving for the '87-'88 year as committee chairs to coordinate social, recreational, educational and cultural programs for the benefit of the KSU community.
Union Program Council is a student volunteer organization consisting of approximately 100 students who select, plan and promote 500 programs (films, trips, entertainers and more) each academic year. UPC is broken up into nine committees: Promotions, Travel, Special Events, Outdoor Recreation, Kaleidoscope Films, Issues and Ideas, Feature Films, Eclectic Entertainment, Arts.
President—Presides over the UPC Executive Council, sits on the Union Governing Board, coordinates events and activities that involve the total UPC membership. Our highest leadership position.
Arts—Coordinates Union Art Gallery exhibitors, print sales, art rentals, the Arts and Crafts Sale, the Photo Contest and Mid-Day Arts.
Eclectic Entertainment—Provides the best in live entertainment, professional comedians, singers and student entertainment.
Issues and Ideas—Selects, organizes and publicizes lectures highlighting current events or popular topics of interest. Organizes the "Let's Talk About It" series.
Kaleidoscope Films—Selects and publicizes innovative, artistic and international films on Wednesdays and Thursdays in the Union. They also show weekend matinees and midnight films.
Outdoor Recreation—Offers a wide variety of outdoor-related trips and programs based on a "cooperative wilderness adventure" structure.
Travel—Coordinates and publicizes winter and spring break trips for the K-State community. Sells an International Student I.D. card and maintains a Travel Resource Center.
Feature Films—Selects and publicizes popular films every Friday and Saturday night in the Union. They also show weekend matinees and midnight films.
Special Events—Selects coordinates and publicizes desired events or activities that do not fall under another committee area, including dances, the Activities Carnival, "Late Night at the K-State Union" and some types of live entertainment.
Promotions—Deals with the visual image of the entire council. Pastes up Collegian ads. Publishes the "Programmer" calendar and other publications to promote UPC.
Applications for Leadership (Committee Chairs) are available beginning Wednesday, January 21. Deadline: 4 p.m., Friday, February 6th. Applications may be picked up and submitted in the Activities Center, 3rd floor of the K-State Union. For more information, call 532-6571 forum, and take individual questions."

But the spokesman, reading a statement from Reagan's physician, Col. John Hutton, said the president "feels great" and that his recuperation continues on course "without problem."

Wallison has been compiling the chronology since shortly after the clandestine arms sales and alleged diversions of profits to Nicaraguan rebels came to light at the end of November.

Brashear said the Regan and Wallison meetings with the president touched on issues that were expected to be brought up during an anticipated interview with the members of the Tower Commission.

Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter, Reagan's national security adviser, resigned Nov. 25, and a top deputy, Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, was fired, as Attorney General Edwin Meese III publicly disclosed that from $10 million to $30 million in proceeds from the sales of arms to Iran was transferred to the Nicaraguan rebels known as Contras.

Abshire, accosted by reporters as he left a Senate committee hearing on North Atlantic Treaty Organization affairs, said Reagan's meeting with members of the Tower commission will be "...after the State of the Union speech (on Jan. 27)."

To Grimm, the trip revealed insight to some "common misconceptions."

"There is internal oppostion to the Sandinista government. And the groups don't mind voicing their opposition. I think that says something about the system (in Nicaragua). If the Sandinistas were as totalitarian as we keep hearing, the people would be afraid to speak out.

"Wherever you walk, you see slogans and pictures of political leaders. Despite such labels as totalitarian and Marxist-Leninist, the political system is very diverse. And it has advantages for the smaller parties," she said.

Grimm cited the Liberal-Independent party as an example. Despite vocal opposition to the Sandinistas, they hold nine seats in the congress, she said.

Grimm said the people who support the Sandinistas still consider themselves a revolutionary faction, rather than a formal government, because they are still fighting for their country.

"The large number of soldiers constantly remind you they are at war," Grimm said. "It is so different to walk down the street and see people carrying guns."

Grimm and Exdell both said they felt no danger from the Sandinista militia. Grimm said he felt no danger because the soldiers were just commoners with guns and clothes.

"The military people mix freely and informally with the non-military people," Exdell said. "They (the soldiers) are numerous, but after you get over the initial shock of seeing them, it becomes clear they are friendly. That is utterly different from what I hear about other Central American countries."

However, both Exdell and Grimm experienced disturbing moments.

While visiting Contra refugee camps in Honduras, Grimm and four other members of the Slattery delegation got lost in a mix-up with a group from Philadelphia. Although they had to wait in the camp for five hours before being reunited with their group, Grimm was more worried about her mother back home.

"I knew she would be scared if the story made the national news. It did, and she was," Grimm said.

For Exdell, the trouble was an everyday occurrence.

"Traffic there is scarey. They use a two-lane highway like it is a three-lane highway. Even on curves and hills. The only thing to do is not watch," he said.

Most agreed all Nicaraguans are anxious to end the war.

"Everyone down there, whether they're for the Sandinistan government or opposed to the government, is in favor of ending the war," said George Paley, a Lawrence merchant. "It's something that really has to be done now."

Bill Hund, principal of the Most Pure Heart of Mary School in Topeka, spent some time at a Nicaraguan refugee camp.

"Speaking to the refugees, one point came across," Hund said. "Their only wish was that the war would be over so they could leave. That's the tragedy of the situation down there."

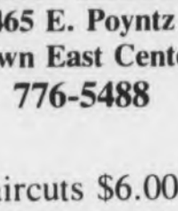
The Rev. James Richards, minister of the First Presbyterian Church in Topeka, said he was most affected by the deterioration of the economy in Nicaragua.

"Yet at the same time, there were smiling faces and they were receptive to Americans, whom they understand to be portrayed in a war against them," he said.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy at K-State, said despite their image, the Sandinistas are "quite willing to negotiate seriously with opposition groups inside their country."

The Sandinistas are democratic, pragmatic and political, Exdell said.

"The only party that has trouble taking the Sandinistas seriously is the party located in Washington, D.C., in the White House," he said.



Though Slattery supports an economic aid package for Nicaragua, he said the United States must first pressure the Nicaraguan government to "make good its promises to the people."

"We should challenge them to do what they say they're going to do, and to date I don't think the administration has done that," he said.

The challenge should include a Nicaraguan commitment to its promises of free elections, freedom of the press and a reduction in military personnel and equipment, he said.
